embracing, as might well happen, but one-fourth part of the people of the United States, have it in their power to arrest any legislative measure which should seem to them to infringe upon their reserved powers. Here, then, we have not only one security for the rights of the States, but an efficient check to the domination of that numerical majority, which has, of late, been so frequently held up to the jealousy and denunciation of the States.

The President, also, is elected by the "States in their political capacities; the votes allotted to each State being in a compound ratio, which considers them partly as distinct and co-equal societies, partly as unequal members of the same society." Being thus chosen by the States, he cannot be supposed to be indifferent to their rights; and the constitution has armed him with a veto, which the experience of our political history, and especially of the last four years, has shown may be effectually wielded for their defence.

But if all the branches of the Federal Legislature, the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, should concur in the passage of an unconstitutional measure, there is still another resort within the pale of the General Government itself. The Judiciary, holding their offices by an independent tenure, and sworn to support the constitution, may declare such an act of the legislative authority null and void, and refuse to carry it into execution. Whatever leaning the courts of the United States may be supposed to have in favor of federal authority, examples are not wanting, nor very few, of their having pronounced against the validity of acts of Congress, on the ground of their unconstitutionality; nor is it to be doubted that they will continue to do so, whenever the independent and conscientious exercise of their judgments shall require of them such an act of duty.

If all these securities, provided in the organization of the General Government itself, should fail, it would then be the right, as well as the duty of the States, to interpose their conservative influence. Though the Federal Judiciary should have decided the acts complained of to be constitutional, still the States, as sovereign parties to the compact, would have the right to judge, in the last resort, whether the compact had been pursued or not; to declare, in the most solemn form, their opinions that the acts in question are unconstitutional; and to invite the co-operation of each of the others in such measures as should be necessary and proper either to obtain a repeal of the offensive acts, or procure an amendment of the constitution itself. These are modes of State interposition clearly within the limits of the constitution. There may be others also within the limits of the constitution. I am not prepared to say that the States might not constitutionally, by the exercise of their acknowledged legislative powers, on subjects clearly reserved to them, oppose very serious impediments of one sort or another to the execution of unwarrantable measures on the part of the General Government. In this respect, it is not easy to mark the exact limit of the rights of the States; and as in the case of the privileges of Parliament in England, high considerations of policy may require that they should be left undefined. But one thing is certain: a State can never, as South Carolina has done, directly and formally annul a law of the United States, without an open departure from the constitution, and a total renunciation of all its obligations.

The moral interposition of the States, of which I have spoken, Mr. President, resting on the force of reason and appeals to public opinion, will, I am persuaded, be found sufficient to redress every real grievance in the practical operations of our system, whenever it shall be resorted to by any respectable number of States, though short of a majority of the whole. The success of this constitutional remedy does not merely depend on its intrinsic force, however great that must be in every free Government; but it derives a decisive efficacy from the knowledge of those ulterior, though dormant, remedies which lie in the hands of the States, above and beyond the constitution. I refer, sir, to those natural rights and powerful means of self-defence and active resistance, which the States possess in their complete municipal organizations, civil and military. It is in this view that, in all the contemporary discussions on the adoption of the constitution, the State Governments were constantly referred to as "affording, in every possible contingency, a complete security against invasions of the public liberty by the federal authority."—(Fed. No. 28.) They were to be ultimately not only the voice, but, if necessary, the arm of the public discontent.—(Fed. No. 26.) The advantages they possessed through their civil and military organizations, for "combining all the resources of the community in a regular plan of opposition," "of communicating with one another, and uniting their common forces for the protection of their common liberty," "for collecting the public will, and directing the public force;" all these advantages and means of self-defence, on the part of the States, were constantly referred to, and insisted on, as demonstrating the extreme improbability of any serious attempt, by the General Government, upon the liberties of the people or the States, and the certain triumph of the public cause, should such an attempt be made. The remedies here alluded to are clearly revolutionary—"above and beyond the constitution." They are such as, I do firmly believe, there never will be any occasion, in the progress of our system, to call into exercise. But their potential existence is of value, as giving a certain efficacy to the moral remedies which are within the limits of the constitution, whenever those milder remedies shall be resorted to by any respectable portion of the States; and it is in that view I now refer to them.

There is another extra-constitutional remedy for the ultimate vindication of the rights of the States, (when they shall have been dangerously and perseveringly assailed,) which also deserves to be borne in mind as adding to the force and efficacy of those constitutional remedies, of which I have spoken as resting on the moral influence of reason and opinion. This remedy deserves to be so much the more considered in this connexion, because, though extra-constitutional, it is at the same time peaceful and complete. One-half of the States, whenever fundamental invasions of their rights by the General Government shall seem to them to justify it, may peacefully suspend its operations, by simply declining to perform the function assigned to them of electing Senators; as, in that case, the majority requisite to constitute a quorum of one branch of the Legislature, essential to the integrity of the Government, would be wanting. This opinion, at least, has been expressed by the highest judicial authority in the Union. I refer to what was said by the distinguished chief justice of the Supreme Court, in the famous case of Cohen vs. Virginia.

With all these means of ultimate practical control resting in the hands of the States, it cannot be presumed that their solemn remonstrances, in the character of sovereign parties to the constitutional compact, would be long disregarded by the Government of the Union. It is true, that neither the complaints nor the opposition of a single State might carry with them a decisive influence. But if the usurpation or the grievance complained of were a serious one, the denunciations of it would not be confined to a single State. Others would unite. Their concurrent appeals, bottomed on reason and justice, would be sustained by a growing public sentiment in the mass of the nation; and to this progressive moral power, enforced and strengthened, as I have shown, by other considerations, the councils of the Union must always ultimately yield. It was thus, sir, in the great struggle of '98 and '99, in relation to the alien and sedition laws, which fell beneath the moral power of the States as the pioneers and organs of public opinion. The salutary efficacy of that same moral power has already manifested itself, in the most encouraging manner, in relation to that system of policy which is the present subject of our remonstrances and complaints. Have we not seen, in the North, the Legislatures of Maine, of New Hampshire, and New York, one after another, responding to the argumentative appeals of the Southern States, and uniting with them in demanding an essential modification of the existing tariff? In the centre of the Union, likewise, the altered tone of Pennsylvania gives us assurance of an auspicious change of opinion already commencing there. In these results, due alone to the moral force of the remonstrances and appeals which have proceeded from the Southern States, we have a certain guaranty of the speedy redress of the inequality and injustice of which they have complained.

Let us contrast with this the effects which have been produced by the violent and illegal opposition of South Carolina. Have we not all seen and felt that the attitude of open hostility to the authority of the Union, assumed by that State, is the great obstacle to the present adjustment of this distracting question? Is it not the objection constantly urged by those otherwise manifesting the best dispositions for justice and conciliation. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has told us that, for a long time, he considered the position of S. Carolina towards the Union as presenting an insuperable obstacle to any legislation for relief during the present session of Congress. I am most happy that that honorable Senator has, at last, seen cause to entertain other views, and that he now feels the injustice of withholding relief from the aggrieved States of the South generally, on account of the violent and improper proceedings of a single one of them. I do not, certainly, participate in the indulgence which that distinguished Senator seemed to feel for the errors of South Carolina, when he assimilated her conduct to that of Virginia in the case of Cohens, and of Ohio towards the Bank of the United States. Sir, I can see nothing in common between the cases referred to and the present attitude of South Carolina.

Mr. CLAY here said, that he had admitted that the acts of South Carolina were much more offensive; the measures of the States referred to were, in principle, the same, though in degree widely different; he meant nothing—he felt nothing, in apology for South Carolina.

Mr. RIVES continued: I am not now disposed, Mr. President, to moot these questions with the honorable Senator from Kentucky. Though there did seem to me to be an indulgent tone in his observations towards South Carolina, in which I could not sympathize, and while I am still unable to see any resemblance, either in principle or degree, between the course of Virginia and Ohio on the occasions alluded to, and the conduct of South Carolina, I am yet too much disposed to co-operate with the honorable Senator in the effort now to adjust this most distracting question, to raise any points of needless discussion between us. In one thing, we are perfectly of accord—that the conduct of South Carolina, whatever may be its true character, presents no proper obstacle to doing justice in a matter which as deeply concerns the interests of other members of this confederacy as of that State.

But, sir, the proceedings of my State, on another occasion of far higher importance, have been so frequently referred to in the course of this debate, as an example to justify the present proceedings of South Carolina, that I may be excused for saying something of them. What, then, was the conduct of Virginia in the memorable era of '98 and '99? She solemnly protested against the alien and sedition acts, as "palpable and alarming infractions of the constitution;" she communicated that protest to the other States of the Union, and earnestly appealed to them to unite with her in a like declaration, that this deliberate and solemn expression of the opinion of the States, as parties to the constitutional compact, should have its proper effect on the councils of the nation in procuring a revision and repeal of the obnoxious acts. This was "the head and front of her offending"—no more. The whole object of the proceedings was, by the peaceful force of public opinion, embodied through the organ of the State Legislatures, to obtain a repeal of the laws in question, not to oppose or arrest their execution while they remained unrepealed. That this was the true spirit and real purpose of the proceeding, is abundantly manifested by the whole of the able debate which took place in the Legislature of the State on the occasion. All the speakers, who advocated the resolutions which were finally adopted, distinctly placed them on that legitimate, constitutional ground. I need only refer to the emphatic declaration of John Taylor, of Caroline, the distinguished mover and able champion of the resolutions. He said "the appeal was to public opinion; if that is against us, we must yield." The same sentiment was avowed and maintained by every friend of the resolutions throughout the debate.

But, sir, the real intentions and policy of Virginia were proved, not by declarations and speeches merely, but by facts. If there ever was a law odious to a whole people by its daring violation of the fundamental guaranties of public liberty, the freedom of speech and freedom of the press, it was the sedition law to the people of Virginia. Yet, amid all this indignant dissatisfaction, after the solemn protest of the Legislature in '98, and the renewal of that protest in '99, this most odious and arbitrary law was peaceably carried into execution in the capital of the State, by the prosecution and punishment of Callender, who was fined and imprisoned for daring to canvass the conduct of our public men, (as Lyon and Cooper had been elsewhere,) and was still actually imprisoned when the Legislature assembled in December, 1800. Notwithstanding the excited sensibility of the public mind, no popular tumult, no legislative interference, disturbed, in any manner, the full and peaceable execution of the law. The Senate will excuse me, I trust, for calling their attention to a most forcible commentary on the true character of the Virginia proceedings of '98 and '99, (as illustrated in this transaction,) which was contained in the official communication of Mr. Monroe, then Governor of the State, to the Legislature, at its assembling in December, 1800. After referring to the distribution which had been ordered to be made among the people of Mr. Madison's celebrated report of '99, he says: "In connexion with this subject, it is proper to add, that, since your last session, the sedition law, one of the acts complained of, has been carried into effect in this commonwealth by the decision of a federal court. I notice this event, not with a view of censuring or criticising it. The transaction has gone to the world, and the impartial will judge of it as it deserves." I notice it for the purpose of remarking that the decision was executed with the same order and tranquil submission on the part of the people, as could have been shown by them on a similar occasion, to any the most necessary, constitutional, and popular acts of the Government." "The General Assembly and the good people of this commonwealth have acquitted themselves to their own consciences, and to their brethren in America, in support of a cause which they deem a national one, by the stand which they made, and the sentiments they expressed of these acts of the General Government; but they have looked for a change, in that respect, to a change in the public opinion, which ought to be free, not to measures of violence, discord, and disunion, which they abhor."

It is thus, sir, that the men of '98 and '99 then understood their own proceedings, and that the honored few, who survive, still understand them. Let us now, sir, look at the language of the proceedings themselves, and see if that fairly warrants any other construction. The proceedings of the Legislature of Virginia in '98 consisted of a series of resolutions, eight in number. The third resolution, which is the one that has been most frequently appealed to, asserts the right of the States, as parties to the compact, in cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise by the General Government of powers not granted by the compact, "to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them." The seventh resolution, after expressing the warm attachment of the people of Virginia to the Union and the constitution, proceeds: "The General Assembly doth solemnly appeal to the like dispositions in the other States, in confidence that they will concur with this commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the acts aforesaid" (the alien and sedition acts) "are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures will be taken by each for co-operating with this State in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Now, sir, it is a fundamental rule of interpretation, in regard to acts and documents of every description, that, in order to arrive at their true sense and meaning, the whole must be taken together; the parts must be construed in reference to each other. The two resolutions just cited, then, must be considered in connexion with each other. The former asserts the right of the States to interpose for maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to the respective States. But in what manner, by what measures, are these rights and liberties of the States to be maintained? The latter of the two resolutions gives the answer: "by necessary and proper measures to be taken by each for co-operating with Virginia, in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties reserved," &c. The measures were to be not only necessary and proper, but such as admitted of co-operation; measures to be "taken by each for co-operating with Virginia in maintaining," &c. This language obviously excludes all measures which have their full and complete effect within the limits of the respective States. Kentucky could not, for example, co-operate with Virginia in an act by which Virginia should nullify a law of the United States within her own limits; because, there, the measure would receive its full and complete effect by the separate and independent action of Virginia. Such measures, therefore, must have been contemplated by the resolutions of Virginia, as, although adopted separately by each of the States in the inception, were yet to have their final effect beyond their respective limits, in being directed to a common object, for the attainment of which the States could co-operate with each other. That object, in the case of the alien and sedition acts, was the repeal of the obnoxious laws; and the measures by which it was to be sought were to be legislative protests against their unconstitutionality, instructions to the representatives of the States in Congress, direct remonstrance to Congress, and such other modes of interposition as might be deemed most eligible to bring the public opinions of the States to bear, with united weight, on the councils of the Union.

The important question which has arisen on the Virginia resolutions of '98, is not what modes of redress might be justifiable in extreme cases, and on the principles of natural right, but what measures of State interposition were deemed to be consistent with the constitution itself. Besides the evidence on this point furnished by a proper attention to the resolutions themselves, as just explained, the question is conclusively settled by the subsequent report of '99, which is known to have been drawn by the pen of Mr. Madison, then a member of the Virginia Legislature, as the previous resolutions of '98 were also from him, though he was not then a member of that body. The report, in reviewing that part of the 7th resolution already cited, which refers to the necessary and proper measures to be taken by the States for co-operating with each other in maintaining their rights, specifies the various measures of that sort which are deemed to be "within the limits of the constitution." After insisting that a declaration by a State Legislature of the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress, and an appeal to other States to concur in the declaration, is a measure of State interposition "within the limits of the constitution," the report also mentions, as being of a like character, a direct remonstrance of the Legislatures of the States to Congress, instructions to their respective Senators to propose an explanatory amendment of the constitution, and applications from themselves to Congress for the call of a convention. At the end of this specification, the report adds: "These several means, though not equally eligible in themselves, nor probably to the States, were all constitutionally open for consideration." As the occasion called for a full exposition of the measures of State interposition, deemed to be "within the limits of the constitution," the specification here made must be considered, according to a well known rule of interpretation, as excluding, in the minds of the writer and those who adopted the report, all others not specified from the class of constitutional modes of State interposition. If there be passages in the report, or expressions in the resolutions, then, which seem to contemplate other modes of redress, not resolvable into these, they must be considered as referring to those extreme cases of governmental abuse or usurpation, which would justify a resort to original rights, paramount to all constitutions.

Sir, it has been sometimes tauntingly said, that if the Virginia resolutions meant nothing more than to assert a right of interposition on the part of the States, by declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional, and founding thereon appeals to the other States, as well as to the General Government, the able reasoning of Mr. Madison's report was very uselessly expended in maintaining a right which no one would contest. But, sir, this right was formally and explicitly contested by all the States which returned answers to the resolutions of Virginia, with the exception of Kentucky only. Let gentlemen look at the answers given by the Legislatures of Delaware, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont, and they will see that this right was boldly denied by them all; that they all contended that the right of pronouncing on the constitutionality of acts of the General Government was exclusively vested in the Federal Judiciary; and that a declaration by a State Legislature, such as Virginia had made, of the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress, was an unwarrantable interference with the constituted authorities of the Union.

Attempts have also been made, sir, to decry this right as utterly idle and worthless in practice. I have already had occasion to remark that the exercise of this right in '98 and '99, by rallying public opinion to the true principles of the constitution, and embodying its expression in imposing organized forms, was found adequate, not only to correct the particular usurpations of the alien and sedition acts, but to produce an entire and fundamental revolution in the administration of the Government. The striking and still progressive changes of public opinion in various quarters of the Union on the subject of the tariff, which I have also had occasion to notice, bear continued testimony to the efficacy of the same constitutional remedies. Sir, in a system like ours, founded on the moral force of public opinion, it is remedies of this sort, I am persuaded, that will be found most effectual; while violent and unconstitutional modes of redress, like that of South Carolina, will ever be attended with danger of re-action, excite prejudice, confirm the obstinacy of power, and raise up new obstacles in the way of relief.

Sir, I would appeal to gentlemen from the South, who profess attachment to the constitutional doctrines which are cherished in that quarter of the Union, and ask when was there ever less occasion to despair of the moral power and ultimate ascendancy of a sound public opinion?

When have more triumphs been won for the cause of State rights and of limited constitutional construction, than during the last four years, by the patriotic Chief Magistrate, in whom the public opinion of this country has found a firm and unflinching organ? Has he not, sir, by a courageous exercise of a power which had hitherto almost lain dormant in the constitution, annihilated the earliest encroachment of federal power? Has he not, in like manner, arrested the wasteful torrent of public expenditure for unconstitutional objects? And has he not nobly used, as he is still using, the high influence with which the confidence of his country has invested him, to relieve every portion of that country from the burdens of the unequal and oppressive system of taxation of which we complain? Sir, I refer to these topics with no wish to awaken any unpleasant recollections of past contests here or elsewhere, but simply to remind gentlemen, who come from that portion of the country where the political principles to which I have alluded so generally prevail, of the rapid progress which those principles have made, under the auspices of the present Chief Magistrate, towards a settled ascendancy in the public councils; and to ask them if there ever was less reason for the friends of those principles to distrust the peaceful influence of opinion, and, by flying to extremities, to hazard not only their triumph, but the existence of our institutions themselves?

I will proceed now, Mr. President, to state, very briefly, my ideas of what we are called upon to do, in the present circumstances of the country. If we were to separate without doing something, and something effectual too, to vindicate the despised authority of the laws, the Government and the Union would be thenceforward virtually dissolved. Our oaths to support the constitution—our highest duties to our country (which, having a right to equal laws, is entitled also to an equal execution of them,) demand, at our hands, proper and effectual provisions for the execution of the laws in question. My plan, then, would be simply this: I would take up this new code of nullification, I would examine it in all its inventions, and apply to every one of its devices an effectual counteraction. Whereas nullification provides that goods held for the payment of duties shall be taken out of the hands of the collector or marshal, under color of a fraudulent process of replevin, designed for the sole purpose of defeating the laws of the United States, I would say, as the bill now under consideration says, on well settled principles of jurisprudence, that goods thus in the custody of the law are irrevocable, and shall be given up only in obedience to the order or decree of a court of the United States. Nullification, while it subjects officers of the United States to heavy penalties and damages for discharging their duties, provides that all controversies, civil or criminal, which may arise under its ordinance, shall be drawn exclusively to the State courts, the judges and jurors of which are to be bound by a solemn oath to carry the ordinance into execution, prohibits, under high penalties, appeals from their decisions to the courts of the United States; and forbids, in like manner, the furnishing of any copy of a record to prosecute such an appeal. These provisions also should be effectually counteracted. The judicial power of the United States, which is expressly declared to extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, would, indeed, be a mischievous mockery if it could not be made to reach cases of this description. I would, therefore, declare, as the bill declares, that the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States shall extend to all cases arising under the revenue laws of the United States; that all suits or controversies of that character may be removed, as the third section of the bill provides, from the State to the United States courts, on the petition of the defendant; and that if a copy of the record be refused, it may be supplied by other means or secondary evidence. In regard to those clauses of the bill which provide for the removal of the custom-house, as has been significantly and properly said, out of harm's way, and for requiring payment of duties in cash, deducting interest, where it is apprehended that the payment of the bonds would be sought to be prevented, and thus cutting off in their source controversies of a very delicate and dangerous character, they are conceived in a laudable spirit of peace, and I can see no well-founded objection to them. The provisions are in general terms, applying alike to all portions of the country, in case of unlawful obstructions to the collection of the revenue. Whenever and wherever such obstructions shall arise, the law applies its remedy. If, in point of fact, it should, at present, apply to South Carolina only, the fault will be hers, in opposing unlawful obstructions which exist no where else, and not that of the law, which is equal and general in its provisions.

The art of calling hard names, Mr. President, has exhausted all its resources on the unfortunate bill on your table. But, sir, this is no novelty in our political history, as the similar and not less violent denunciations of the act for enforcing the embargo, during Mr. Jefferson's administration, bear ample testimony. My worthy colleague, [Mr. TILLY,] in his fervid eloquence, denominated it a Botany Bay bill, and founded his denunciation on the clause which authorizes the marshal, in certain cases, under the direction of the judge of the district, to provide a convenient place to serve as a temporary jail, and to make the necessary provision for the safe keeping of prisoners committed under the authority of the United States. Now, sir, let us inquire what was the motive of this provision. Heretofore, in South Carolina, as in other States, persons arrested or committed under the authority of the United States have been confined in the jails of the State; but, by her recent legislation, South Carolina has forbidden, under very high penalties, the use of her public jails to the United States, and has, moreover, prohibited all private persons, under pain of fine and imprisonment, from hiring or letting any place, house, or building, to be used as a jail by the United States. In this state of things it became absolutely necessary to make some other provision for the custody of debtors and others, who might be arrested or committed under the authority of the United States; and that provision is made in the very words of a resolution of Congress of the 3d of March, 1791, passed to provide for the case of a failure, on the part of any of the States, to comply with a previous recommendation of Congress respecting the use of their jails by the United States. By what process a provision so simple and natural can be metamorphosed into a Botany Bay bill I am at a loss to conceive; and I think my honorable colleague, when he comes to review it more calmly, will be not less at a loss to explain.

But, sir, the most vehement denunciations have been directed against those clauses of the bill which authorize the employment of military force, in certain cases, to repel attempts, by force, to obstruct the execution of the laws. We have been told that it is making war upon South Carolina. Now, sir, while I do not concur in the policy of these provisions, at the present moment, for reasons which I shall presently state, I utterly deny the justness of this qualification of the bill, as well as the principle on which it is founded. There is no proceeding whatever, in any part of this affair, against South Carolina. The Government of the United States, in the execution of the laws, can have no proper reference to States. It acts upon individuals, not upon States, as I have already had occasion abundantly to show; and the constitution of the United States, when it declared that nothing in the constitution or laws of a particular State should control the laws of the United States, has not permitted the Government of the Union, in executing the laws of the United States, to inquire if opposition to them is, or is not, authorized by a particular State. If the laws be opposed by combinations too powerful to be overcome in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, there is the same right, under the constitution, to execute the laws by calling in the aid of the military power, whether such combinations be authorized by a law of the State, (which the constitution has declared, in such a case, to be a nullity,) or whether they be purely voluntary. I have not, then, the slightest difficulty in regard to the right and the power of the Government to employ the physical force of the country, in a case like the present, if it should be necessary. I am also aware that the provisions in the bill now alluded to are strictly defensive, authorizing force only to repel force; that, amended as they have been, they give a far less extensive power over the military force than was given during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, for the enforcement of the embargo; and, that, in fact, they give no power of that sort which does not already exist under the acts of 1795 and 1807. I have likewise the fullest confidence, not only in the discretion, but in the scrupulous forbearance, with which any powers proposed to be vested by this bill in the Chief Magistrate will be used. But I foresee that the introduction of these provisions in the bill, while unnecessary, if my view of the acts of 1795 and 1807 be correct, will be industriously, and, to a certain extent, successfully used as a topic to inflame the jealousies, and mislead the sympathies of a generous people, and to add to the irritation and excitement already unhappily existing in a large section of the Union. I would make no new provision of this sort, therefore, till an overt act had been committed. And then, I verily believe with Mr. Jefferson, that a republican Government would show itself as strong, in a good sense, as any on earth: "At the call of the law, every man would fly to the standard of the law, and the defence of public order would be considered by every citizen as his individual concern."

While I am thus ready for one, Mr. President, to give my assent to such measures as may be necessary and proper for maintaining the authority of the laws, we shall all unite, I trust, in removing the just causes of complaint which have arisen against their operation. The necessity of a new adjustment of the tariff is felt and acknowledged by all, and affords the fit occasion for doing justice to every interest of the country which has been affected by it. Sir, this is the moment for the accomplishment of this great work of conciliation and peace. Let us meet each other in that "spirit of amity and mutual deference and concession, which the peculiarity of our political situation has rarely, if ever, rendered more indispensable" than now. Instead of coming together as hostile and rival clans, as has, unhappily, been too frequently the case in relation to this subject, let us meet and consult for the common good, as members of one great family, recollecting that the interest of each is the good of the whole, and the good of the whole the interest of each. For one, I pledge myself to meet gentlemen in this American spirit; to regard the interests of the North as well as the South; to embrace, as far as I can, the permanent and lasting good of all; which in nothing, in my opinion, is more deeply concerned than in the present settlement of this distracting question, and in the final extirpation of that germ of discord which has been planted in all our relations, social and political.

It is time, Mr. President, to put an end to our unhappy divisions. It has been my fortune, in another situation, to witness the effects they have produced on the character and consideration of our Government abroad, and on the generous efforts of the friends of liberty in other parts of the world. Sir, my heart has swollen with a pride and exultation, which can be appreciated only by those who have felt them in a foreign land, when I have heard my country the theme of every tongue; its institutions, with the glorious results of liberty and happiness they have produced, the subject of universal envy and admiration; rebuking, on the one hand, the gloomy spirit of despotism, and animating, on the other, the generous aspirations of freedom. But, in a few short months, how has this scene been changed! The language of admiration and respect lost in that of indifference and distrust; the votaries of liberty discouraged and confounded; the disciples of legitimacy exulting in the failure of the only system of free government which ever promised a perfect success; all Europe filled with predictions of the speedy dissolution of our Union, and consigning us henceforward to the same rank of impotence and anarchy as the unhappy and distracted States of the southern parts of our own continent.

These have been the bitter fruits of our divisions abroad. What have they been at home? In the midst of unexampled prosperity, anxiety and alarm pervading every bosom; that sacred union, in regard to which we were taught by the father of our country to "discountenance whatever might suggest even a suspicion that it could, in any event, be abandoned," openly questioned and derided, and millions trembling for its fate. Sir, let us put an end to these divisions; let us disappoint the malignant predictions of the enemies of free government; let us restore confidence to the patriot at home, and hope to the votary of freedom abroad. I do, in my conscience, believe that the preservation of the Union is our only security for liberty. If we are to be broken into separate confederacies, constant wars and collisions with each other must ensue, out of which will grow up large military establishments, perpetual and burdensome taxes, an overshadowing Executive power; and, amid these deleterious influences, what hope can there be that liberty would survive?

It is here, I confess, that I see the danger of military despotism; and not where the imagination of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has found it. Is not the actual condition of South Carolina, in this respect, an impressive admonition to us on the subject? The whole State converted into a camp; the Executive and other authorities armed with dictatorial powers; the rights of conscience set at naught, and an unsparing proscription ready to disfranchise one-half of her population. Sir, this is but a prefiguration of the evils and calamities to which every portion of this country would be destined, if the Union should be dissolved. Let us then rally around that sacred Union, fixing it anew, and establishing it forever on the immutable basis of equal justice, of mutual amity and kindness, and an administration at once firm and paternal. Let us do this, and we shall carry back peace to our distracted country, happiness to the affrighted fire-side, restore stability to our threatened institutions, and give hope and confidence once more to the friends of liberty throughout the world. Let us do this, and we shall be, in short, what a bountiful Providence has heretofore made us, and designed us forever to remain—the freest and happiest people under the sun.

The Senate then took a recess until 5 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed the bill further to provide for the collection of duties on imports.

Mr. SMITH moved to amend the bill in the seventh line of the fifth section, by striking out the words "will in any event," and inserting the word "shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the first section by inserting words, the effect of which is to allow the bonding of goods, instead of enforcing the payment of cash duties.

The proposition was opposed by Mr. HOLMES, Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. SMITH, Mr. WILKINS, Mr. EWING, and supported by Mr. FOOT, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. SPRAGUE.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the bill in the first section, by striking out the words "either upon land or on board any vessel."

Mr. C. considered that the idea of having a custom-house on board a vessel was ludicrous.

Mr. WEBSTER said he could imagine a case in which such a provision might be necessary. He did not agree that the proposition was ludicrous, but he saw no great reason to object to the motion.

Mr. WILKINS said a few words to the same effect, offering no opposition to the motion.

Mr. S. WRIGHT was opposed to the striking out the words.

After a few words from Mr. HOLMES, Mr. FORSYTH, and Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. MILLER asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and stood:

YEAS.—Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, Ewing, Foot, Holmes, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Prentiss, Tomlinson, Tyler, Webster, Wilkins—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Black, Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Wright, White—24.

Mr. EWING then moved the following amendment:

Strike out all between the word "petition," in the ninth line, and the word "court," inclusive, and insert "circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant may have been served with process, setting forth the nature of said suit or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, together with a certificate signed by an attorney or counsellor at law of some court of record of the State in which such suit shall have been commenced, or of the United States, setting forth that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and has carefully inquired as to all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true; which petition, affidavit, and certificate, shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, and, if not, to the clerk thereof, at his office, and shall be filed in said office; and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall thereafter be proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court. And it shall be the duty of the clerk of said court, if the suit were commenced in the court below by summons, to issue a writ of certiorari to the State court, requiring them to send to the said circuit court the record and proceedings in said cause; or if it were commenced by capias, he shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, a duplicate of which said process shall be delivered to the clerk of the State court, or left at his office, by the marshal of the district or his deputy, or by some one by him duly authorized thereto. And thereupon it shall be the duty of the said State court to stay all further proceedings in said cause; and the said suit or prosecution, upon delivery of the said process, or leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed or taken to be removed to the said circuit court; and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein, in the State court, shall be wholly null and void. And if the defendant in any such suit be in actual custody on meine process thereon, it shall be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus cum causa, to take the body of such defendant forthwith into his custody, to be dealt with in the said cause according to the rules of law and the order of the said court, or of any judge thereof, in vacation."

Mr. E. made a brief explanation of his views in moving this amendment.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his readiness to accept the amendment.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. BLACK moved to amend the sixth section in the seventh line, by inserting, after the word "places," the words "within the limits of the said State."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to strike out, in the first section, the words "or assemblages of persons," in the fourth line.

Mr. GRUNDY explained, that unless the "assemblages of persons" are "unlawful," they will not be within the reach of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER replied, that it was left to the President to determine the fact.

The question was then put on Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Foot, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Tyler—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins, White, Wright—27.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the bill in the first section, in the seventh line, after the words "to execute the revenue laws," by inserting the words "at any port of entry and delivery established within the State of South Carolina."

Mr. P. explained, that his object was to make the clause a perfect response to the message of the President.

The yeas and nays were ordered on this motion; and, the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEA.—Mr. Poindexter—1.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Chambers, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Mangum, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins, White, Wright—30.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the section in the twenty-first line, by striking out the words "or combination or assemblages of persons."

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to amend the section by striking out the words, in the twenty-fifth line, "United States," and inserting the words "several States, by requisitions on the Governor of one or more States," so as to make the sentence read "to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the several States, by requisitions," &c.

The question was then put, and the amendment negatived, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Forsyth, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Tyler—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Chambers, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—25.

Mr. CALHOUN then stated that he had waited to see if any other members of the committee wished to speak on this bill. Wishing himself to be heard on the bill, he would move that the Senate now adjourn; and

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill to provide further for the collection of duties on imports—

Mr. CALHOUN rose. He knew not, he said, which was most objectionable, the provision of the bill, or the temper in which its adoption had been urged. If the extraordinary powers with which the bill proposed to clothe the Executive, to the utter prostration of the constitution and the rights of the States, be calculated to impress our minds with alarm at the rapid progress of despotism in our country, the zeal with which every circumstance calculated to misrepresent or exaggerate the conduct of Carolina in the controversy was seized on, with a view to excite hostility against her, but too plainly indicated the deep decay of that brotherly feeling which once existed between these States, and to which we are indebted for our beautiful federal system. It was not his intention, he said, to advert to all these misrepresentations; but there were some so well calculated to mislead the mind as to the real character of the controversy, and to hold up the State in a light so odious, that he did not feel himself justified in permitting them to pass unnoticed.

Among them, one of the most prominent was the false statement that the object of South Carolina was to exempt herself from her share of the public burdens, while she participated in the advantages of the Government. If the charge were true, if the State were capable of being actuated by such low and unworthy motives, mother as he considered her, he would not stand up on this floor to vindicate her conduct. Among her faults, (and faults he would not deny she had,) no one had ever yet charged her with that low and most sordid of vices, avarice. Her conduct on all occasions had been marked with the very opposite quality. From the commencement of the revolution, from its first breaking out at Boston till this hour, no State had been more profuse of its blood in the cause of the country; nor had any contributed so largely to the common treasury, in proportion to her wealth and population. She had in that proportion contributed more to the exports of the Union, on the exchange of which, with the rest of the world, the greater portion of the public burden had been levied, than any other State. No, the controversy was not such as had been stated; the State did not seek to participate in the advantages of the Government without contributing her full share to the public treasury. Her object was far different. A deep constitutional question lay at the bottom of the controversy. The real question at issue is, has the Government a right to impose burdens on the capital and industry of one portion of the country, not with a view to revenue, but to benefit another? And he must be permitted to say that, after the long and deep agitation of this controversy, it was with surprise that he perceived so strong a disposition to misrepresent its real character. To correct the impressions which those misrepresentations were calculated to make, he would dwell on the point under consideration for a few moments longer.

The Federal Government has, by an express provision of the constitution, the right to lay duties on imports. The State has never denied or resisted this right, nor even thought of so doing. The Government has, however, not been contented with exercising this power as she had a right to do, but had gone a step beyond it, by laying imposts, not for revenue, but for protection. This the State considered as an unconstitutional exercise of power, highly injurious and oppressive to her and the other staple States, and had accordingly met it with the most determined resistance. He did not intend to enter, at this time, into the argument as to the unconstitutionality of the protective system. It was not necessary. It is sufficient that the power is no where granted; and that, from the journals of the convention which formed the constitution, it would seem that it had been refused. In support of the journals, he might cite the statement of Luther Martin, which had been already referred to, to show that the convention, so far from conferring the power on the Federal Government, had left to the State the right to impose duties on imports, with the express view of enabling the several States to protect their own manufactures. Notwithstanding this, Congress had assumed, without any warrant from the constitution, the right of exercising this most important power, and had so exercised it as to impose a ruinous burden on the labor and capital of the State, by which her resources were exhausted, the enjoyments of her citizens curtailed, the means of education contracted, and all her interests essentially and injuriously affected. We have been sneeringly told that she was a small State; that her population did not much exceed half a million of souls; and that more than one-half were not of the European race. The facts were so. He knew she never could be a great State, and that the only distinction to which she could aspire must be based on the moral and intellectual acquirements of her sons. To the development of these, much of her attention had been directed; but this restrictive system, which had so unjustly exacted the proceeds of her labor, to be bestowed on other sections, had so impaired the resources of the State, that, if not speedily arrested, it would dry up the means of education, and, with it, deprive her of the only source through which she could aspire to distinction.

There was another misstatement as to the nature of the controversy so frequently made in debate, and so well calculated to mislead, that he felt bound to notice it. It has been said that South Carolina claims the right to annul the constitution and laws of the United States; and to rebut this supposed claim, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] has gravely quoted the constitution, to prove that the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, are the supreme law of the land; as if the State claimed the right to act contrary to this provision of the constitution. Nothing can be more erroneous: her object is not to resist laws made in pursuance of the constitution, but those made without its authority, and which encroach on her reserved powers. She claims not even the right of judging of the delegated powers, but of those that are reserved; and to resist the former when they encroach upon the latter. He would pause to illustrate this important point.

All must admit that there are delegated and reserved powers; and that the powers reserved are reserved to the States respectively. The powers, then, of the Government are divided between the General and the State Governments; and the point immediately under consideration is, whether a State has any right to judge as to the extent of its reserved powers, and to defend them against the encroachments of the General Government. Without going deeply into this point, at this stage of the argument, or looking into the nature and origin of the Government, there was a simple view of the subject which he considered as conclusive. The very idea of a divided power implied the right, on the part of the State, for which he contended. The expression was metaphorical when applied to power. Every one readily understands that the division of matter consists in the separation of the parts. But, in this sense, it was not applicable to power. What, then, is meant by a division of power? He could not conceive of a division, without giving an equal right to each to judge of the extent of the power allotted to each. Such right he held to be essential to the existence of a division; and that to give to either party the conclusive right of judging, not only the share allotted to it, but of that allotted to the other, was to annul the division, and would confer the whole power on the party vested with such right. But it is contended that the constitution has conferred on the Supreme Court the right of judging between the States and the General Government. Those who make this objection overlooked, he conceived, an important provision of the constitution. By turning to the tenth amended article of the constitution, it will be seen that the reservation of power to the States is not only against the powers delegated to Congress, but against the United States themselves; and extends, of course, as well to the Judiciary as to the other departments of the Government.

The article provides that all powers, not delegated to the United States, or prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. This presents the inquiry, what powers are delegated to the United States? They may be classed under four divisions: First, those that are delegated by the States to each other, by virtue of which the constitution may be altered or amended by three-fourths of the States, when, without which, it would have required the unanimous vote of all. Next, the powers conferred on Congress; then those on the President; and, finally, those on the judicial department—all of which are particularly enumerated in the parts of the constitution which organize the respective departments. The reservation of powers to the States is, as he had said, against the whole, and is as full against the judicial as it is against the executive and legislative departments of the Government. It could not be claimed for the one without claiming it for the whole, and without, in fact, annulling this important provision of the constitution. Against this, as it appeared to him, conclusive view of the subject, it has been urged that this power is expressly conferred on the Supreme Court by that portion of the constitution which provides that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority. He believed the assertion to be utterly destitute of any foundation. It obviously was the intention of the constitution simply to make the judicial power commensurate with the law-making and treaty-making powers, and to vest it with the right of applying the constitution, the laws, and the treaties, to the cases which might arise under them; and not to make it the judge of the constitution, the laws, and the treaties themselves. In fact, the power of applying the laws to the facts of the case, and deciding upon such application, constitutes, in truth, the judicial power. The distinction between such power and that of judging of the laws would be perfectly apparent when we advert to what is the acknowledged power of the court in reference to treaties or compacts between sovereigns. It was perfectly established that the courts have no right to judge of the violation of treaties; and that, in reference to them, their power is limited to the right of judging simply of the violation of rights under them; and that the right of judging of infractions belongs exclusively to the parties themselves, and not to the courts; of which we have an example in the French treaty, which was declared by Congress null and void, in consequence of its violation by the Government of France. Without such declaration, had a French citizen sued a citizen of this country under the treaty, the court could have taken no cognizance of its infraction; nor, after such a declaration, would it have heard any argument or proof going to show that the treaty had not been violated.

The declaration, of itself, was conclusive on the court. But it would be asked, how the court obtained the power to pronounce a law or treaty unconstitutional, when they come in conflict with that instrument? He did not deny that it possesses the right, but he could by no means concede that it was derived from the constitution. It had its origin in the necessity of the case. Where there were two or more rules established, one from a higher, and the other from a lower authority, which might come into conflict, in applying them to a particular case, the judge could not avoid pronouncing in favor of the superior against the inferior. It was from this necessity, and this alone, that the power which is now set up to overrule the rights of the States, against an express provision of the constitution, was derived. It had no other origin. That he had traced it to its true source, would be manifest from the fact, that it was a power which, so far from being conferred exclusively on the Supreme Court, as was insisted, belonged to every court, inferior and superior, State and general, and even to foreign courts.

But the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] relies on the journals of the convention to prove that it was the intention of that body to confer on the Supreme Court the right of deciding in the last resort between a State and the General Government. He would not follow him through the journals, as he did not deem that to be necessary to refute his argument. It was sufficient for this purpose to state, that Mr. Rutledge reported a resolution providing expressly that the United States and the States might be parties before the Supreme Court. If this proposition had been adopted, he would ask the Senator whether this very controversy between the United States and South Carolina might not have been brought before the court? He would also ask him, whether it could be brought before the court as the constitution now stands? If he answers the former in the affirmative, and the latter in the negative, as he must, then it is clear, his elaborate argument to the contrary notwithstanding, that the report of Mr. Rutledge was not in substance adopted, as he contended; and that the journals, so far from supporting, are in direct opposition to the position which he attempts to maintain. He might push the argument much further against the power of the court, but he did not deem it necessary, at least at this stage of the discussion. If the views which had already been presented be correct, and he did not see how they could be resisted, the conclusion was inevitable, that the reserved powers were reserved equally against every department of the Government, and as strongly against the judicial as against the other departments; and, of course, were left under the exclusive will of the States.

There still remained another misrepresentation of the conduct of the State, which had been made with the view of exciting odium. He alluded to the charge that South Carolina supported the tariff of 1816, and was therefore responsible for the protective system. To determine the truth of this charge, it becomes necessary to ascertain the real character of that law; whether it was a tariff for revenue or for protection; which presents the inquiry of what was the condition of the country at that period? The late war with Great Britain had just terminated, which, with the restrictive system that preceded it, had diverted a large amount of capital and industry from commerce to manufactures, particularly to the cotton and woollen branches. There was a debt, at the same time, of one hundred and thirty millions of dollars, hanging over the country; and the heavy war duties were still in existence. Under these circumstances, the question was presented, to what point the duties ought to be reduced? That question involved another—at what time the debt ought to be paid? which was a question of policy, involving in its consideration all the circumstances connected with the then condition of the country. Among the most prominent arguments in favor of an early discharge of the debt was, that the high duties which it would require to effect it would have at the same time the effect of sustaining the infant manufactures, which had been forced up under the circumstances to which he had adverted. This view of the subject had a decided influence in determining in favor of an early payment of the debt. The sinking fund was accordingly raised from seven to ten millions of dollars, with the provision to apply the surplus which might remain in the treasury, as a contingent appropriation to that fund; and the duties were graduated to meet this increased expenditure. It was thus that the policy and justice of protecting the large amount of capital and industry, which had been diverted by the measures of the Government into new channels, as he had stated, was combined with the fiscal action of the Government; and which, while it secured a prompt payment of the debt, prevented the immense losses to the manufacturers which would have followed a sudden and great reduction. Still, revenue was the main object, and protection but the incidental. The bill to reduce the duties was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and not of Manufactures; and it proposed a heavy reduction on the then existing rate of duties. But what, of itself, without other evidence, was decisive as to the character of the bill, is the fact that it fixed a much higher rate of duties on the unprotected than on the protected article. He would enumerate a few leading articles only: woollen and cotton, above the value of twenty-five cents on the square yard, though they were the leading objects of protection, were subject to a permanent duty of only twenty per centum. Iron, another leading article among the protected, had a protection of not more than nine per cent. as fixed by the act, and of but fifteen as reported in the bill. These rates were all below the average duties as fixed in the act, including the protected, the unprotected, and even the free articles. Mr. C. said he had entered into some calculations in order to ascertain the average rate of duties in the act. There was some uncertainty in the data, but he felt assured that it was not less than thirty per cent. ad valorem; showing an excess of the average duties, above that imposed on the protected articles enumerated, of more than ten per cent.; and thus clearly establishing the character of the measure, that it was for revenue and not protection.

Looking back, even at this distant period, with all our experience, he perceived but two errors in the act; the one in reference to iron, and the other the minimum duties on coarse cottons. As to the former, he conceived that the bill, as reported, proposed a duty relatively too low, which was still further reduced in its passage through Congress. The duty, at first, was fixed at seventy-five cents the hundredweight; but in the last stage of its passage, it was reduced; by a sort of caprice, occasioned by an unfortunate motion, to forty-five cents. This injustice was severely felt in Pennsylvania—the State, above all others, most productive of iron; and was the principal cause of that great re-action which has since thrown her so decidedly on the side of the protective policy. The other error was that as to coarse cottons, on which the duty was as much too high as that on iron was too low. It introduced, besides, the obnoxious minimum principle, which has since been so mischievously extended; and to that extent he was constrained, in candor, to acknowledge, as he wished to disguise nothing, the protective principle was recognised by the act of 1816. How this was overlooked at the time, it is not in his power to say. It escaped his observation, which he can account for only on the ground that the principle was then new, and that his attention was engaged by another important subject—the question of the currency, then so urgent, and with which, as chairman of the committee, he was particularly charged. With these exceptions, he again repeated, he saw nothing in the bill to condemn. Yet it was on the ground that the members from the State had voted for that bill, that the attempt is now made to hold up South Carolina as responsible for the whole system of protection which has since followed, though she has resisted its progress in every stage. Was there ever greater injustice? And how was it to be accounted for, but as forming a part of that systematic misrepresentation and calumny which has been directed for so many years, without interruption, against that gallant and generous State? And why has she thus been assailed? Merely because she abstained from taking any part in the Presidential canvass; believing that it had degenerated into a mere system of imposition on the people; controlled, almost exclusively, by those whose object it was to obtain the patronage of the Government, and that without regard to principle or policy. Standing apart from what she considered a contest in which the public had no interest, she has been assailed by both parties, with a fury altogether unparalleled; but which, pursuing the course which she believed liberty and duty required, she has met with a firmness equal to the fierceness of the assault. In the midst of this attack, he had not escaped. With a view of inflicting a wound on the State, through him, he had been held up as the author of the protective system, and one of its most strenuous advocates. It was with pain that he alluded to himself on so deep and grave a subject as that now under discussion; and which, he sincerely believed, involved the liberty of the country. He now regretted, that under the sense of injustice, which the remarks of a Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] excited for the moment, he had hastily given his pledge to defend himself against the charge which had been made in reference to his course in 1816; not that there would be any difficulty in repelling the charge, but because he felt a deep reluctance in turning the discussion, in any degree, from a subject of so much magnitude, to one of so little importance as the consistency or inconsistency of himself, or any other individual, particularly in connexion with an event so long since passed. But for this hasty pledge, he would have remained silent as to his own course on this occasion; and would have borne, with patience and calmness, this, with the many other misrepresentations with which he had been so incessantly assailed for many years.

The charge that he was the author of the protective system had no other foundation but that he, in common with the almost entire South, gave his support to the tariff of 1816. It is true that he advocated that measure, for which he might rest his defence, without taking any other, on the ground that it was a tariff for revenue, and not for protection; which he had established beyond the power of controversy. But his speech on the occasion had been brought in judgment against him, by the Senator from Pennsylvania. He had since cast his eyes over the speech; and he would surprise, he had no doubt, the Senator, by telling him that, with the exception of some hasty and unguarded expressions, he retracted nothing he had uttered on that occasion. He only asked that he might be judged in reference to it, in that spirit of fairness and justice which was due to the occasion; taking into consideration the circumstances under which it was delivered, and bearing in mind that the subject was a tariff for revenue and not for protection; for reducing and not raising the revenue. But, before he explained the then condition of the country, from which his main arguments in favor of the measure were drawn, it was nothing but an act of justice to himself, that he should state a fact in connexion with his speech, that was necessary to explain what he had called hasty and unguarded expressions. His speech was an impromptu; and, as such, he apologized to the House, as appears from the speech as printed, for offering his sentiments on the question, without having duly reflected on the subject. It was delivered at the request of a friend, when he had not previously the least intention of addressing the House; he alluded to Samuel D. Ingham, then, and now, as he was proud to say, a personal and political friend; a man of talents and integrity; with a clear head and firm and patriotic heart; then among the leading members of the House; in the palmy state of his political glory, though now for a moment depressed—depressed, did he say? no! it was his State which was depressed; Pennsylvania, and not Samuel D. Ingham! Pennsylvania, which had deserted him under circumstances, which, instead of depressing, ought to have elevated him in her estimation. He came to me, said Mr. C., when sitting at my desk, writing, and said that the House was falling into some confusion, accompanying it with a remark that I knew how difficult it was to rally so large a body when once broken on a tax bill, as had been experienced during the late war. Having a higher opinion of my influence than it deserved, he requested me to say something to prevent the confusion. I replied, said Mr. C., that I was at a loss what to say; that I had been busily engaged on the currency, which was then in great confusion, and which, as I had stated, had been placed particularly under my charge, as chairman of the committee on that subject. He repeated his request; and the speech which the Senator from Pennsylvania has complimented so highly was the result.

He (Mr. C.) would ask, whether the facts stated ought not, in justice, to be borne in mind by those who would hold him accountable, not only for the general scope of the speech, but for every word and sentence which it contained? But, said Mr. C., in asking this question, it was not his intention to repudiate the speech. All he asked was, that he might be judged by the rules which, in justice, belonged to the case. Let it be recollected that the bill was a revenue bill; and, of course, that it was constitutional. He need not remind the Senate, when the measure is constitutional, that all arguments calculated to show its beneficial operation may be legitimately pressed into service, without taking into consideration whether the subject to which the arguments refer be within the sphere of the constitution or not. If, for instance, a question were before the body to lay a duty on Bibles, and a motion be made to reduce the duty, or admit Bibles duty free; who could doubt that the argument in favor of the motion that the increased circulation of the Bibles would be in favor of the morality and religion of the country would be strictly proper? Or, who would suppose that he who had adduced it had committed himself, on the constitutionality of taxing the religion or morals of the country under the charge of the Federal Government? Again: Suppose the question to be to raise the duty on silk, or any other article of luxury, and that it should be supported on the ground that it was an article mainly consumed by the rich and extravagant; could it be fairly inferred that, in the opinion of the speaker, Congress had a right to pass sumptuary laws? He only asked that these plain rules be applied to his argument on the tariff of 1816. They turned almost entirely on the benefits which manufacturers conferred on the country in time of war, and which no one could doubt. The country had recently passed through such a state. The world was at that time deeply agitated by the effects of the great conflict which had so long raged in Europe, and which no one could tell how soon again might return. Bonaparte had but recently been overthrown; the whole southern part of this continent was in a state of revolution, and was threatened with the interference of the Holy Alliance, which, had it occurred, must almost necessarily have involved this country in a most dangerous conflict. It was under these circumstances that he had delivered the speech, in which he urged the House, that, in the adjustment of the tariff, reference ought to be had to a state of war as well as peace; and that its provisions ought to be fixed on the compound views of the two periods; making some sacrifice in peace, in order that the less might be made in war. Was this principle false? and, in urging it, did he commit himself to that system of oppression since grown up, and which has for its object the enriching of one portion of the country at the expense of the other?

Mr. C. said, the plain rule in all such cases was, that when a measure was proposed, the first thing was to ascertain its constitutionality: and, that being ascertained, the next was its expediency; which last opened the whole field of argument for and against. Every topic may be urged, calculated to prove it wise or unwise. So in a bill to raise imposts; it must first be ascertained that the bill is based on the principles of revenue, and that the money raised is necessary for the wants of the country. These being ascertained, every argument, direct and indirect, may be fairly offered, which may go to show that, under all the circumstances, the provisions of the bill are proper or improper. Had this plain and simple rule been adhered to, we should never have heard of the complaint of South Carolina. Her objection is not against the improper modification of a bill acknowledged to be for revenue; but that, under the name of imposts, a power, essentially different from the taxing power, is exercised; partaking much more of the character of a penalty than a tax. Nothing is more common than that things closely resembling in appearance should widely and essentially differ in their character. Arsenic, for instance, resembles flour; yet one is deadly poison, and the other that which constitutes the staff of life. So, duties imposed, whether for revenue or protection, may be called imposts; which, though nominally and apparently the same, yet differ essentially in their real character.

Mr. C. said he should now return to his speech on the tariff of 1816. To determine what his opinions really were on the subject of protection at that time, it would be proper to advert to his sentiments before and after that period. His sentiments preceding 1816, on this subject, are matter of record. He came into Congress in 1812, a devoted friend and supporter of the then administration; yet one of his first efforts was to brave the administration, by opposing its favorite measure, the restrictive system—embargo, non-intercourse, and all—and that upon the principle of free trade. The system remained in fashion for a time; but after the overthrow of Bonaparte, he (Mr. C.) had reported a bill, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to repeal the whole system of restrictive measures.

While the bill was under consideration, a worthy man, then a member of the House, [Mr. McKim, of Baltimore,] moved to except the non-importation act, which he supported on the ground of encouragement to manufactures. He (Mr. C.) resisted the motion on the very grounds on which Mr. McKim supported it. He maintained that the manufactures were then receiving too much protection, and warned its friends that the withdrawal of the protection which the war and the high duties then afforded would cause great embarrassment; and that the true policy, in the mean time, was to admit foreign goods as freely as possible, in order to diminish the anticipated embarrassment on the return of peace; intimating, at the same time, his desire to see the tariff revised, with a view of affording a moderate and permanent protection.*

Such was his conduct before 1816. Shortly after that period he left Congress, and had no opportunity of making known his sentiments in reference to the protective system, which shortly after began to be agitated. But he had the most conclusive evidence that he considered the arrangement of the revenue in 1816 as growing out of the necessity of the case, and due to the consideration of justice; but that even at that early period he was not without his fears that even that arrangement would lead to abuse and future difficulties. He regretted that he had been compelled to dwell so long on himself; but trusted that whatever censure might be incurred would not be directed against him, but against those who had drawn his conduct into the controversy; and who might hope, by assailing his motives, to wound the cause with which he was proud to be identified.

He might add, that all the Southern States voted with South Carolina in support of the bill; not that they had any interest in manufactures, but on the ground that they had supported the war, and, of course, felt a corresponding obligation to sustain those establishments which had grown up under the encouragement it had incidentally afforded; while most of the New England members were opposed to the measure, principally, as he believed, on opposite principles.

He had now, he trusted, satisfactorily repelled the charge against the State and himself personally, in reference to the tariff of 1816. Whatever support the State had given the bill had originated in the most disinterested motives.

There was not, within the limits of the State, so far as his memory served him, a single cotton or woollen establishment. Her whole dependence was on agriculture, and the cultivation of two great staples, rice and cotton. Her obvious policy was to keep open the market of the world unchecked and unrestricted; to buy cheap and to sell high; but, from a feeling of kindness, combined with a sense of justice, she added her support to the bill. We had been told by the agents of the manufacturers, that the protection which the measure afforded would be sufficient; to which we the more readily conceded, as it was considered as a final adjustment of the question.

Let us now, said Mr. C., turn our eyes forward, and see what has been the conduct of the parties to this arrangement. Have Carolina and the South disturbed this adjustment? No, they have never raised their voice in a single instance against it; even though this measure, moderate comparatively as it is, was felt with no inconsiderable pressure on their interests. Was this example imitated on the opposite side? Far otherwise. Scarcely had the President signed his name, before application was made for an increase of duties, which was repeated with demands continually growing, till the passage of the act of 1828. What course now, he would ask, did it become Carolina to pursue in reference to these demands? Instead of acquiescing in them, because she had acted generously in adjusting the tariff of 1816, she saw, in her generosity on that occasion, additional motives for that firm and decided resistance which she has since made against the system of protection. She accordingly commenced a systematic opposition to all further encroachments, which continued from 1818 till 1828, by discussions and by resolutions, by remonstrances and by protests, through her Legislature. These all proved insufficient to stem the current of encroachment; but, notwithstanding the heavy pressure on her industry, she never despaired of relief till the passage of the act of 1828—that bill of abominations, engendered by avarice and political intrigue. Its adoption opened the eyes of the State, and gave a new character to the controversy. Till then the question had been whether the protective system was constitutional and expedient; but after that, she no longer considered the question whether the right of regulating the industry of the States was a reserved or delegated power, but what right a State possesses to defend her reserved powers against the encroachments of the Federal Government; a question, on the decision of which, the value of all the reserved powers depends. The passage of the act of 1828, with all its objectionable features, and with the odious circumstances under which it was adopted, had almost, if not entirely, closed the door of hope through the General Government. It afforded conclusive evidence that no reasonable prospect of relief from Congress could be entertained; yet the near approach of the period of the payment of the public debt, and the elevation of General Jackson to the Presidency, still afforded a ray of hope; not so strong, however, as to prevent the State from turning her eyes, for a final relief, to her reserved powers.

Under these circumstances commenced that inquiry into the nature and extent of the reserved powers of a State, and the means which they afforded of resistance against the encroachments of the General Government, which has been pursued with so much zeal and energy, and, he might add, intelligence. Never was there a political discussion carried on with greater activity, and which appealed more directly to the intelligence of a community. Throughout the whole, no address was made to the low and vulgar passions. But, on the contrary, the discussion turned upon the higher principles of political economy, connected with the operations of the tariff system, which are calculated to show its real bearing on the interests of the State, and on the structure of our political system; going to show the true character of the relations between the States and the General Government; and the means which the States possess of defending those powers which they reserved in forming the Federal Government.

In this great canvass, men of the most commanding talents and acquirements engaged with the greatest ardor; and the people were addressed through every channel, by essays in the public press, and by speeches in their public assemblies, until they had become thoroughly instructed on the nature of the oppression, and on the rights which they possess, under the constitution, to throw them off.

If gentlemen suppose that the stand taken by the people of Carolina rests on passion and delusion, they are wholly mistaken. The case was far otherwise. No community, from the legislator to the ploughman, were ever better instructed in their rights; and the resistance on which the State had resolved was the result of mature reflection, accompanied with a deep conviction that their rights had been violated, and the means of redress which they have adopted are consistent with the principles of the constitution.

But while this active canvass was carried on, which looked to the reserved powers as their final redress, if all others failed, the State at the same time cherished a hope, as I have already stated, that the election of General Jackson to the Presidency would prevent the necessity of a resort to extremities. He was identified with the interests of the staple States; and, having the same interest, it was believed that his great popularity—a popularity of the strongest character, as it rested on military services—would enable him, as they hoped, gradually to bring down the system of protection, without shock or injury to any interest. Under these views, the canvass in favor of General Jackson's election to the Presidency was carried on with great zeal, in conjunction with that active inquiry into the reserved powers of the States, on which final reliance was placed. But little did the people of Carolina dream that the man whom they were thus striving to elevate to the highest seat of power would prove so utterly false to all their hopes. Man is, indeed, ignorant of the future; nor was there ever a stronger illustration of the observation than is afforded by the result of that election! The very event on which they had built their hopes has been turned against them; and the very individual to whom they looked as a deliverer, and whom, under that impression, they strove for so many years to elevate to power, is now the most powerful instrument in the hands of his and their bitterest opponents to put down them and their cause!

Scarcely had he been elected, when it became apparent, from the organization of his cabinet, and other indications, that all their hopes of relief through him were blasted. The admission of a single individual into the cabinet, under the circumstances which accompanied that admission, threw all into confusion. The mischievous influence over the President, through which this individual was admitted into the cabinet, soon became apparent. Instead of turning his eyes forward to the period of the payment of the public debt, which was then near at hand, and to the present dangerous political crisis, which was inevitable, unless averted by a timely and wise system of measures, the attention of the President was absorbed by mere party arrangements, and circumstances too disreputable to be mentioned here, except by the most distant allusion.

Here, Mr. C. said, he must pause for a moment to repel a charge which has been so often made, and which even the President has reiterated in his proclamation—the charge that he had been actuated, in the part which he had taken, by feelings of disappointed ambition. Mr. C. again repeated, that he deeply regretted the necessity of noticing himself in so important a discussion, and that nothing could induce him to advert to his own course but the conviction that it was due to the cause, at which a blow was aimed, through him. It was only in this view that he noticed it.

Mr. C. said it ill became the Chief Magistrate to make this charge. The course which the State had taken, and which had led to the present controversy between her and the General Government, was taken as far back as 1828, in the very midst of that severe canvass which placed him in power; and in that very canvass Carolina had openly avowed and zealously maintained these very principles which he now officially pronounces to be treason and rebellion. That was the period at which he ought to have spoken. Having remained silent then, and having, under his approval, implied by that silence, received the support and the vote of the State, he, (Mr. C.,) if a sense of decorum did not prevent it, might recriminate, with the double charge of deception and ingratitude. His object, however, was not to assail the President, but to defend himself against a most unfounded charge. The time alone, when he pursued the course upon which this charge of disappointed ambition is founded, will, of itself, repel it in the eye of every unprejudiced and honest man. The doctrine which he now sustains, under the present difficulties, he openly avowed and maintained immediately after the act of 1828, that "bill of abominations," as it has been so often and properly termed. Was he at that period disappointed in any views of ambition which he might be supposed to entertain? He was Vice President of the United States, elected by an overwhelming majority. He was a candidate for re-election on the ticket with General Jackson himself, with a certain prospect of a triumphant success of that ticket, and with a fair prospect of the highest office to which an American citizen could aspire. What was his course under these prospects? Did he look to his own advancement, or to an honest and faithful discharge of his duty? Let facts speak for themselves. When the bill to which he had referred came from the other House to the Senate, the almost universal impression was, that its fate would depend upon his casting vote. It was known that, as the bill then stood, the Senate was nearly equally divided; and as it was a combined measure, originating with the politicians and manufacturers, and intended as much to bear upon the Presidential election as to protect manufacturers, it was believed that, as a stroke of political policy, its fate would be made to depend on his vote, in order to defeat General Jackson's election as well as his own. The friends of General Jackson were alarmed; and he (Mr. C.) was earnestly entreated to leave the chair, in order to avoid the responsibility, under the plausible argument that if the Senate should be equally divided, the bill would be lost without the aid of his casting vote. The reply to this entreaty was, that no consideration, personal to himself, could induce him to take such a course; that he considered the measure as of the most dangerous character, calculated to produce the most fearful crisis; that the payment of the public debt was just at hand, and that the great increase of revenue which it would pour into the treasury would accelerate the approach of that period; and that the country would be placed in the most trying of all situations, with an immense revenue, without the means of absorption upon any legitimate or constitutional object of appropriation, and would be compelled to submit to all the corrupting consequences of a large surplus, or to make a sudden reduction of the rates of duties, which would prove ruinous to the very interests which were then forcing the passage of the bill. Under these views he determined to remain in the chair, and, if the bill came to him, to give his casting vote against it; and, in doing so, to give his reasons, at large; but at the same time, he informed his friends that he would retire from the ticket, so that the election of General Jackson might not be embarrassed by any act of his. Sir, (said Mr. C.,) I was amazed at the folly and infatuation of that period. So completely absorbed was Congress in the game of ambition and avarice, from the double impulse of the manufacturers and politicians, that none but a few appeared to anticipate the present crisis at which now all are alarmed, but which is the inevitable result of what was then done. As to himself, he clearly foresaw what has since followed. The road of ambition lay open before him; he had but to follow the corrupt tendency of the times; but he chose to tread the rugged path of duty.

It was thus that the reasonable hope of relief through the election of General Jackson was blasted; but still, one other hope remained—that the final discharge of the public debt, an event near at hand, would remove our burden. That event would leave in the treasury a large surplus; a surplus that could not be expended under the most extravagant schemes of appropriation, having the least color of decency or constitutionality. That event at last arrived. At the last session of Congress, it was avowed on all sides, that the public debt, for all practical purposes, was in fact paid; the small surplus remaining being nearly covered by the money in the treasury and the bonds for duties which had already accrued; but with the arrival of this event, our last hope was doomed to be disappointed. After a long session of many months, and the most earnest effort on the part of South Carolina and the other Southern States to obtain relief, all that could be effected was a small reduction in the amount of the duties; but a reduction of such a character, that, while it diminished the amount of burden, distributed that burden more unequally than even the obnoxious act of 1828: reserving the principle adopted by the bill of 1816, of laying higher duties on the unprotected than the protected articles, by repealing almost entirely the duties laid upon the former, and imposing the burden almost entirely on the latter. It was thus, that instead of relief, instead of an equal distribution of the burdens and benefits of the Government, on the payment of the debt, as had been fondly anticipated, the duties were so arranged as to be, in fact, bounties on one side, and taxation on the other; and thus placing the two great sections of the country in direct conflict in reference to its fiscal action, and thereby letting in that flood of political corruption which threatens to sweep away our constitution and our liberty.

This unequal and unjust arrangement was pronounced, both by the administration, through its proper organ, the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the opposition, to be a permanent adjustment; and it was thus that all hope of relief through the action of the General Government terminated; and the crisis so long apprehended had at length arrived, at which the State was compelled to choose between absolute acquiescence in a ruinous system of oppression, or a resort to her reserved powers—powers of which she alone was the rightful judge, and which alone in this momentous juncture could save her. She determined on the latter.

The consent of two-thirds of her Legislature was necessary for the call of a convention, which was considered the only legitimate organ through which the people, in their sovereignty, could speak. After an arduous struggle, the State rights party succeeded; more than two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature favorable to a convention were elected; a convention was held, and the ordinance adopted. The convention was succeeded by a meeting of the Legislature, when the laws to carry the ordinance into execution were enacted; all of which had been communicated by the President, had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and this bill is the result of their labor.

Having now, said Mr. C., corrected some of the prominent misrepresentations as to the nature of this controversy, and given a rapid sketch of the movement of the State in reference to it, he would next proceed to notice some objections connected with the ordinance, and the proceedings under it.

The first and most prominent of these is directed against what is called the test oath, which an effort has been made to render odious. So far from deserving the denunciation which had been levelled against it, he viewed this provision of the ordinance as but the natural result of the doctrines entertained by the State, and the position which she occupies. The people of that State believed that the Union is a union of States, and not of individuals; that it was formed by the States; and that the citizens of the several States were bound to it through the acts of their several States; that each State ratified the constitution for itself, and that it was only by such ratification of a State that any obligation was imposed upon the citizens. Thus believing, it was the opinion of the people of Carolina that it belonged to the State which had imposed the obligation to declare, in the last resort, the extent of that obligation, as far as her citizens were concerned; and this, upon the plain principles which exist in all analogous cases of compact between sovereign or political bodies. On this principle, the people of the State, acting in their sovereign capacity, in convention, precisely as they had adopted their own and the federal constitutions, had declared, by the ordinance, that the acts of Congress which had imposed duties under the authority to lay imposts, were acts, not for revenue, as intended by the constitution, but for protection, and therefore null and void. The ordinance, thus enacted by the people of the State themselves, acting as a sovereign community, was, to all intents and purposes, a part of the constitution of the State; and though of a peculiar character, was as obligatory on the citizens of that State as any portion of the constitution. In prescribing, then, the oath to obey the ordinance, no more was done than to prescribe an oath to obey the constitution. It was, in fact, but a particular oath of allegiance, and in every respect similar to that which is prescribed under the constitution of the United States to be administered to all officers of the State and Federal Governments; and was no more deserving the harsh and bitter epithets which had been heaped upon it, than that or any similar oath.

It ought to be borne in mind, that, according to the opinion which prevailed in Carolina, the right of resistance to the unconstitutional laws of Congress belongs to the State, and not to her individual citizens; and that, though the latter may, in a mere question of meum and tuum, resist, through the courts, an unconstitutional encroachment upon their rights, yet the final stand against usurpation rests not with them, but with the State of which they are members; and that such act of resistance by a State binds the conscience and allegiance of the citizen. But there appeared to be a general misapprehension as to the extent to which the State had acted under this part of the ordinance. Instead of sweeping every officer, by a general proscription of the minority, as has been represented in debate, as far as the knowledge of Mr. C. extends, not a single individual had been removed. The State had, in fact, acted with the greatest tenderness, all circumstances considered, towards citizens who differed from the majority; and, in that spirit, had directed the oath to be administered only in cases of some official act directed to be performed, in which obedience to the ordinance was involved.

It had been further objected that the State had acted precipitately. What! precipitately! after making a strenuous resistance for twelve years, by discussion here and in the other House of Congress; by essays in all forms; by resolutions, remonstrances, and protests on the part of her Legislature; and, finally, by attempting an appeal to the judicial power of the United States! He said attempting, for they had been prevented from bringing the question fairly before the court, and that by an act of that very majority in Congress which now upbraids them for not making that appeal; of that majority, who, on a motion of one of the members in the other House from South Carolina, refused to give to the act of 1828 its true title, that it was a protective, and not a revenue act. The State has never, it is true, relied upon that tribunal, the Supreme Court, to vindicate its reserved rights; yet they have always considered it as an auxiliary means of defence, of which they would gladly have availed themselves to test the constitutionality of protection, had they not been deprived of the means of doing so by the act of the majority.

Notwithstanding this long delay of more than ten years, under this continued encroachment of the Government, we now hear it on all sides, by friends and foes, gravely pronounced that the State has acted precipitately—that her conduct has been rash! That such should be the language of an interested majority, who, by means of this unconstitutional and oppressive system, are annually extorting millions from the South to be bestowed upon other sections, was not at all surprising. Whatever impedes the course of avarice and ambition will ever be denounced as rash and precipitate; and had South Carolina delayed her resistance fifty instead of twelve years, she would have heard from the same quarter the same language; but it was really surprising that those who were suffering in common with herself, and who have complained equally loud of their grievances, who had pronounced the very acts which she had asserted within her limits to be oppressive, unconstitutional, and ruinous, after so long a struggle—a struggle longer than that which preceded the separation of these States from the mother country—longer than the period of the Trojan war—should now complain of precipitancy! No, it is not Carolina which has acted precipitately, but her sister States, who have suffered in common with her, that have acted tardily. Had they acted as she has done, had they performed their duty with equal energy and promptness, our situation this day would be very different from what we now find it. Delays are said to be dangerous, and never was the maxim more true than in the present case—a case of monopoly. It is the very nature of monopolies to grow. If we take from one side a large portion of the proceeds of its labor, and give it to the other, the side from which we take must constantly decay, and that to which we give must prosper and increase. Such is the action of the protective system. It exacts from the South a large portion of the proceeds of its industry, which it bestows upon the other sections, in the shape of bounties to manufacturers and appropriations in a thousand forms—pensions, improvement of rivers and harbors, roads and canals, and in every shape that wit or ingenuity can devise. Can we, then, be surprised that the principle of monopoly grows, when it is so amply remunerated at the expense of those who support it? And this is the real reason of the fact which we witness: that all acts for protection pass with small minorities, but soon come to be sustained by great and overwhelming majorities. Those who seek the monopoly endeavor to obtain it in the most exclusive shape; and they take care, accordingly, to associate only a sufficient number of interests barely to pass it through the two Houses of Congress, on the plain principle that the greater the number from whom the monopoly takes, and the fewer on whom it bestows, the greater is the advantage to the monopolists. Acting in this spirit, we have often seen with what exact precision they count, adding wool to woollens, associating lead and iron, feeling their way until a bare majority is obtained, when the bill passes, connecting just as many interests as are sufficient to insure its success, and no more. In a short time, however, we have invariably found that this lean becomes a decided majority, under the certain operation which compels individuals to desert the pursuits which the monopoly has rendered unprofitable, that they may participate in those pursuits which it has rendered profitable. It is against this dangerous and growing disease that South Carolina has acted—a disease whose cancerous action would soon spread to every part of the system, had it not been speedily arrested.

There was another powerful reason why the action of the State could not be safely delayed. The public debt, as he had already stated, for all practical purposes, had already been paid; and, under the existing duties, a large annual surplus of many millions must come into the treasury. It was impossible to look at this state of things without seeing the most mischievous consequences; and, among others, if not speedily corrected, it would interpose powerful and almost insuperable obstacles to throwing off the burdens under which the South had been so long laboring. The disposition of the surplus would become a subject of a violent and corrupt struggle, and could not fail to rear up new and powerful interests in support of the existing system, not only in those sections which have been heretofore benefited by it, but even in the South itself. He could not but trace to the anticipation of this state of the treasury the sudden and extraordinary movements which had taken place at the last session in the Virginia Legislature, in which the whole South was vitally interested. It was impossible for any rational man to believe that that State could seriously have thought of effecting the scheme to which he alluded by her own resources, without powerful aid from the General Government.

It was next objected that the enforcing acts have legislated the United States out of South Carolina. He had already replied to this objection on another occasion, and would now but repeat what he then said—that they had been legislated out only to the extent that they had no right to enter. The constitution had admitted the jurisdiction of the United States within the limits of the several States only so far as the delegated powers authorized; beyond that they were intruders, and might rightfully be expelled; and that they had been efficiently expelled by the legislation of the State, through her civil process, as has been acknowledged on all sides in the debate, is only a confirmation of the truth of the doctrine for which the majority in Carolina had contended.

The very point at issue between the two parties there was, whether nullification was a peaceful and an efficient remedy against an unconstitutional act of the General Government, and which might be asserted as such through the State tribunals? Both parties agree that the acts against which it was directed are unconstitutional and oppressive. The controversy was only as to the means by which our citizens might be protected against the acknowledged encroachments on their rights. This being the point at issue between the parties, and the very object of the majority being an efficient protection of the citizens through the State tribunals, the measures adopted to enforce the ordinance of course received the most decisive character. We were not children, to act by halves. Yet, for acting thus efficiently, the State is denounced and this bill reported, to overrule, by military force, the civil tribunals and civil process of the State! Sir, said Mr. C., I consider this bill, and the arguments which have been urged on this floor in its support, as the most triumphant acknowledgment that nullification is peaceful and efficient, and so deeply entrenched in the principles of our system, that it cannot be assailed but by prostrating the constitution, and substituting the supremacy of military force in lieu of the supremacy of the laws. In fact, the advocates of this bill refute their own argument. They tell us that the ordinance is unconstitutional; that it infracts the constitution of South Carolina; although to him the objection appears absurd, as it was adopted by the very authority which adopted the constitution itself. They also tell us that the Supreme Court is the appointed arbiter of all controversies between a State and the General Government. Why, then, do they not leave this controversy to that tribunal? Why do they not confide to them the abrogation of the ordinance, and the laws made in pursuance of it, and the assertion of that supremacy which they claim for the laws of Congress? The State stands pledged to resist no process of the court. Why, then, confer on the President the extensive and unlimited powers provided in this bill? Why authorize him to use military force to arrest the civil process of the State? But one answer can be given. That, in a contest between the State and the General Governments, if the resistance be limited on both sides to the civil process, the State, by its inherent sovereignty, standing upon its reserved powers, will prove too powerful in such a controversy, and must triumph over the Federal Government, sustained by its delegated and limited authority; and, in this answer, we have an acknowledgment of the truth of those great principles for which the State has so firmly and nobly contended.

Revenue Collection Bill.

Having made these remarks, the great question is now presented—has Congress the right to pass this bill?—which he would next proceed to consider. The decision of this question involves the inquiry into the provisions of the bill. What are they? It puts at the disposal of the President the army and navy, and the entire militia of the country. It enables him, at his pleasure, to subject every man in the United States, not exempt from militia duty, to martial law; to call him from his ordinary occupation to the field, and, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment inflicted by a court-martial, to imbrue his hand in his brothers' blood. There is no limitation on the power of the sword, and that over the purse is equally without restraint; for, among the extraordinary features of the bill, it contains no appropriation; which, under existing circumstances, is tantamount to an unlimited appropriation. The President may, under its authority, incur any expenditure, and pledge the national faith to meet it. He may create a new national debt, at the very moment of the termination of the former—a debt of millions, to be paid out of the proceeds of the labor of that section of the country whose dearest constitutional rights this bill prostrates! Thus exhibiting the extraordinary spectacle, that the very section of the country which is urging this measure, and carrying the sword of devastation against us, are at the same time incurring a new debt, to be paid by those whose rights are violated; while those who violate them are to receive the benefits, in the shape of bounties and expenditures.

And for what purpose is the unlimited control of the purse and of the sword thus placed at the disposition of the Executive? To make war against one of the free and sovereign members of this confederation, which the bill proposes to deal with, not as a State, but as a collection of banditti or outlaws. Thus exhibiting the impious spectacle of this Government, the creature of the States, making war against the power to which it owes its existence.

The bill violates the constitution, plainly and palpably, in many of its provisions, by authorizing the President, at his pleasure, to place the different ports of this Union on an unequal footing, contrary to that provision of the constitution which declares that no preference should be given to one port over another. It also violates the constitution by authorizing him, at his discretion, to impose cash duties in one port, while credit is allowed in others; by enabling the President to regulate commerce, a power vested in Congress alone; and by drawing within the jurisdiction of the United States courts powers never intended to be conferred on them. As great as these objections were, they became insignificant in the provisions of a bill which, by a single blow, by treating the States as a mere lawless mass of individuals, prostrates all the barriers of the constitution. He would pass over the minor considerations, and proceed directly to the great point. This bill proceeds on the ground that the entire sovereignty of this country belongs to the American people, as forming one great community; and regards the States as mere fractions or counties, and not as an integral part of the Union, having no more right to resist the encroachments of the Government than a county has to resist the authority of a State; and treating such resistance as the lawless acts of so many individuals, without possessing sovereign or political rights. It has been said that the bill declares war against South Carolina. No; it decrees a massacre of her citizens! War has something ennobling about it, and, with all its horrors, brings into action the highest qualities, intellectual and moral. It was, perhaps, in the order of Providence that it should be permitted for that very purpose. But this bill declares no war, except, indeed, it be that which savages wage—a war, not against the community, but the citizens of whom that community is composed. But he regarded it as worse than savage warfare—as an attempt to take away life under the color of law, without the trial by jury, or any other safeguard which the constitution has thrown around the life of the citizen! It authorizes the President, or even his deputies, when they may suppose the law to be violated, without the intervention of a court or jury, to kill without mercy or discrimination!

It was said by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GAYNOR] to be a measure of peace! Yes, such peace as the wolf gives to the lamb; the kite to the dove. Such peace as Russia gives to Poland; or death to its victim! A peace, by extinguishing the political existence of the State; by awing her into an abandonment of the exercise of every power which constitutes her a sovereign community. It is to South Carolina a question of self-preservation; and I proclaim it, that, should this bill pass, and an attempt be made to enforce it, it will be resisted at every hazard, even that of death itself. Death is not the greatest calamity; there are others still more terrible to the free and brave; and among them may be placed the loss of liberty and honor. There are thousands of her brave sons who, if need be, are prepared cheerfully to lay down their lives in defence of the State, and the great principles of constitutional liberty for which she is contending. God forbid that this should become necessary! It never can be, unless this Government is resolved to bring the question to extremity, when her gallant sons will stand prepared to perform their last duty—to die nobly.

I go (said Mr. C.) on the ground that this constitution was made by the States; that it is a federal union of the States, in which the several States still retain their sovereignty. If these views be correct, he had not characterized the bill too strongly, which presents the question, whether they be or be not. He would not enter into the discussion of that question now. He would rest it, for the present, on what he had said on the introduction of the resolutions now on the table, under a hope that another opportunity would be afforded for more ample discussion. He would for the present confine his remarks to the objections which had been raised to the views which he had presented when he introduced them. The authority of Luther Martin had been adduced by the Senator from Delaware, to prove that the citizens of a State, acting under the authority of a State, were liable to be punished as traitors by this Government. As eminent as Mr. Martin was as a lawyer, and as high as his authority might be considered on a legal point, he could not accept it in determining the point at issue. The attitude which he occupied, if taken into view, would lessen, if not destroy, the weight of his authority. He had been violently opposed, in convention, to the constitution; and the very letter from which the Senator has quoted was intended to dissuade Maryland from its adoption. With this view, it was to be expected that every consideration calculated to effect that object should be urged; that real objections should be exaggerated; and that those having no foundation, except mere plausible deductions, should be presented. It is to this spirit that he attributed the opinion of Mr. Martin, in reference to the point under consideration. But if his authority is good on one point, it must be admitted to be equally so on another. If his opinion be sufficient to prove that a citizen of the State may be punished as a traitor when acting under allegiance to the State, it is also sufficient to show that no authority was intended to be given, in the constitution, for the protection of manufactures by the General Government; and that the provision in the constitution, permitting a State to lay an impost duty with the consent of Congress, was intended to reserve the right of protection to the States themselves, and that each State should protect its own industry. Assuming his opinion to be of equal authority on both points, how embarrassing would be the attitude in which it would place the Senator from Delaware, and those with whom he is acting—that of using the sword and the bayonet to enforce the execution of an unconstitutional act of Congress. He must express his surprise that the slightest authority in favor of power should be received as the most conclusive evidence, while that which is at least equally strong in favor of right and liberty is wholly overlooked or rejected.

Notwithstanding all that has been said, he must say, that neither the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] nor any other who had spoken on the same side, had directly and fairly met the great questions at issue. Is this a federal union? a union of States, as distinct from that of individuals? Is the sovereignty in the several States, or in the American people in the aggregate? The very language which we are compelled to use, when speaking of our political institutions, affords proof conclusive as to its real character. The terms union, federal, united, all imply a combination of sovereignties, a confederation of States. They are never applied to an association of individuals. Who ever heard of the United State of New York, of Massachusetts, or of Virginia? Who ever heard the term federal, or union, applied to the aggregation of individuals into one community? Nor is the other point less clear, that the sovereignty is in the several States, and that our system is a union of twenty-four sovereign powers, under a constitutional compact, and not of a divided sovereignty between the States severally and the United States. In spite of all that has been said, he maintained that sovereignty is in its nature indivisible. It is the supreme power in a State; and we might just as well speak of half a square, or half of a triangle, as of half a sovereignty. It is a gross error to confound the exercise of sovereign powers with sovereignty itself; or the delegation of such powers with a surrender of them. A sovereign may delegate his powers to be exercised by as many agents as he may think proper, under such conditions and with such limitations as he may impose; but to surrender any portion of his sovereignty to another is to annihilate the whole. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] calls this metaphysical reasoning, which he says he cannot comprehend. If by metaphysics he means that scholastic refinement which makes distinctions without difference, no one can hold it in more utter contempt than he, (Mr. C.); but if, on the contrary, he means the power of analysis and combination, that power which reduces the most complex idea into its elements, which traces causes to their first principle, and, by the power of generalization and combination, unites the whole into one harmonious system—then, so far from deserving contempt, it is the highest attribute of the human mind. It is the power which raises man above the brute; which distinguishes his faculties from mere sagacity, which he holds in common with inferior animals. It is this power which has raised the astronomer from being a mere gazer at the stars to the high intellectual eminence of a Newton or a La Place; and astronomy itself, from a mere observation of insulated facts, into that noble science which displays to our admiration the system of the universe. And shall this high power of the mind, which has effected such wonders when directed to the laws which control the material world, be forever prohibited, under a senseless cry of metaphysics, from being applied to the high purpose of political science and legislation? He held them to be subject to laws as fixed as matter itself, and to be as fit a subject for the application of the highest intellectual power. Denunciation may indeed fall upon the philosophical inquirer into these first principles, as it did upon Galileo and Bacon, when they first unfolded the great discoveries which have immortalized their names; but the time will come when truth will prevail in spite of prejudice and denunciation, and when politics and legislation will be considered as much a science as astronomy and chemistry.

In connexion with this part of the subject, he understood the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] to say that sovereignty was divided; that a portion remained with the States severally, and that the residue was vested in the Union. By Union, he supposed that the Senator meant the United States. If such be his meaning—if he intended to affirm that the sovereignty was in the twenty-four States, in whatever light he might view them, their opinions would not disagree; but, according to his (Mr. C.'s) conception, the whole sovereignty was in the several States, while the exercise of sovereign powers was divided, a part being exercised under compact, through this General Government, and the residue through the separate State Governments. But if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] meant to assert that the twenty-four States formed but one community, with a single sovereign power as to the objects of the Union, it would be but the revival of the old question, of whether the Union was a union between States, as distinct communities, or a mere aggregate of the American people, as a mass of individuals; and in this light his opinions would lead directly to consolidation.

But to return to the bill. It is said that the bill ought to pass, because the law must be enforced. The law must be enforced! The imperial edict must be executed. It is under such sophistry, couched in general terms, without looking to the limitations which must ever exist in the practical exercise of power, that the most cruel and despotic acts ever have been covered. It was such sophistry as this that cast Daniel into the lion's den, and the three innocents into the fiery furnace. Under the same sophistry, the bloody edicts of Nero and Caligula were executed. The law must be enforced! Yes, the "tea tax must be executed." This was the very argument which impelled Lord North and his administration in that mad career which forever separated us from the British crown. Under a similar sophistry, "that religion must be protected," how many massacres have been perpetrated? and how many martyrs have been tied to the stake? What! acting on this vague abstraction, are you prepared to enforce a law, without considering whether it be just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional? Will you collect money when it is acknowledged that it is not wanted? He who earns the money, who digs it from the earth with the sweat of his brow, has a just title to it against the universe. No one has a right to touch it without his consent, except his Government, and it only to the extent of its legitimate wants. To take more is robbery; and you propose by this bill to enforce the robbery by murder. Yes, to this result you must come by this miserable sophistry, this vague abstraction, of enforcing the law without a regard to the fact whether the law be just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional.

In the same spirit we are told that the Union must be preserved, without regard to the means. And how is it proposed to preserve the Union? By force! Does any man in his senses believe that this beautiful structure, this harmonious aggregate of States, produced by the joint consent of all, can be preserved by force? Its very introduction will be certain destruction of this Federal Union. No, no; you cannot keep the States united in their constitutional and federal bonds by force. Force may, indeed, hold the parts together; but such union would be the bond between master and slave; a union of exaction on one side, and of unqualified obedience on the other. That obedience which, we are told by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] is the Union! Yes, exaction on the side of the master; for this very bill is intended to collect what can be no longer called taxes, (the voluntary contribution of a free people,) but tribute, tribute to be collected under the mouths of the cannon! Your custom-house is already transferred to a garrison, and that garrison with its batteries turned, not against the enemy of your country, but on subjects, (I will not say citizens,) on whom you propose to levy contributions. Has reason fled from our borders? Have we ceased to reflect? It is madness to suppose that the Union can be preserved by force. I tell you plainly that the bill, should it pass, cannot be enforced. It will prove only a blot upon your statute book, a reproach to the year, and a disgrace to the American Senate. I repeat that it will not be executed; it will rouse the dormant spirit of the people, and open their eyes to the approach of despotism. The country has sunk into avarice and political corruption, from which nothing could arouse it but some measure, on the part of the Government, of folly and madness, such as that now under consideration.

Disguise it as you may, the controversy is one between power and liberty; and he would tell the gentlemen who are opposed to him, that, strong as might be the love of power on their side, the love of liberty is still stronger on ours. History furnishes many instances of similar struggles, where the love of liberty has prevailed against power, under every disadvantage; and, among them, few more striking than that of our own revolution; where, strong as was the parent country, and feeble as were the colonies, yet, under the impulse of liberty and the blessing of God, they gloriously triumphed in the contest. There were, indeed, many and striking analogies between that and the present controversy; they both originated substantially in the same cause, with this difference, that, in the present case, the power of taxation is converted into that of regulating industry; in that, the power of regulating industry, by the regulation of commerce, was attempted to be converted into the power of taxation. Were he to trace the analogy further, we would find that the perversion of the taxing power, in one case, has given precisely the same control to the northern section over the industry of the southern section of the Union, which the power to regulate commerce gave to Great Britain over the industry of the colonies; and that the very articles in which the colonies were permitted to have a free trade, and those in which the mother country had a monopoly, are almost identically the same as those under which the Southern States are permitted to have a free trade by the act of 1832, and which the Northern States have, by the same act, secured a monopoly; the only difference is in the means. In the former, the colonies were permitted to have a free trade with all countries south of Cape Finisterre, a cape in the northern part of Spain; while north of that the trade of the colonies was prohibited, except through the mother country, by means of her commercial regulations. If we compare the products of the country north and south of Cape Finisterre, we will find them almost identical with the list of the protected and unprotected articles contained in the act of last year. Nor does the analogy terminate here. The very arguments resorted to at the commencement of the American revolution, and the measures adopted, and the motives assigned to bring on that contest, (to enforce the law,) are almost identically the same.

But, said Mr. C., to return from this digression to the consideration of the bill. Whatever opinion may exist upon other points, there is one in which he would suppose there could be none: that this bill rests on principles which, if carried out, will ride over State sovereignties, and that it will be idle for any of its advocates hereafter to talk of State rights. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] says that he is the advocate of State rights; but he must permit me to tell him that, although he may differ in premises from the other gentlemen with whom he acts on this occasion, yet in supporting this bill he obliterates every vestige of distinction between him and them, saving only that, professing the principles of '98, his example will be more pernicious than that of the most open and bitter opponents of the rights of the States. He would also add, what he was compelled to say, that he must consider him [Mr. RIVES] as less consistent than our old opponents, whose conclusions were fairly drawn from their premises, whilst his premises ought to have led him to opposite conclusions. The gentleman has told us that the new-fangled doctrines, as he chose to call them, had brought State rights into disrepute. He must tell him, in reply, that what he called new-fangled are but the doctrines of '98; and that it is he, [Mr. RIVES,] and others with him, who, professing these doctrines, had degraded them by explaining away their meaning and efficacy. He [Mr. RIVES] had disclaimed, in behalf of Virginia, the authorship of nullification. Mr. C. would not dispute that point. If Virginia choose to throw away one of her brightest ornaments, she must not hereafter complain that it had become the property of another. But while, as a representative of Carolina, he had no right to complain of the disavowal of the Senator from Virginia, he must believe that he [Mr. RIVES] had done his native State great injustice by declaring on this floor that, when she gravely resolved, in '98, that "in cases of deliberate and dangerous infractions of the constitution, the States, as parties to the compact, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose to arrest the progress of the evil, and to maintain, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them," she meant no more than to ordain the right to protest and remonstrate. To suppose that, in putting forth such a solemn declaration, which she afterwards sustained by so able and elaborate an argument, she meant no more than to assert what no one had ever denied, would be to suppose that the State had been guilty of the most egregious trifling that ever was exhibited on so solemn an occasion.

Mr. C. said that, in reviewing the ground over which he had passed, it would be apparent that the question in controversy involved that most deeply important of all political questions, whether ours was a federal or a consolidated Government—a question on the decision of which depends, as he solemnly believed, the liberty of the people, their happiness, and the place which we are destined to hold in the moral and intellectual scale of nations. Never was there a controversy in which more important consequences were involved, not excepting that between Persia and Greece, decided by the battles of Marathon, Plataea, and Salamis, which gave ascendancy to the genius of Europe over that of Asia, and which, in its consequences, has continued to affect the destiny of so large a portion of the world, even to this day. There is, said Mr. C., often close analogies between events apparently very remote, which is strikingly illustrated in this case. In the great contest between Greece and Persia, between European and Asiatic polity and civilization, the very question between the federal and consolidated form of government was involved. The Asiatic Governments, from the remotest time, with some exceptions on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, have been based on the principle of consolidation, which considers the whole community as but a unit; and consolidates its powers in a central point. The opposite principle has prevailed in Europe; Greece, throughout all her States, was based on a federal system. All were united in one common but loose bond, and the Governments of the several States partook, for the most part, of a complex organization, which distributed political power among different members of the community. The same principles prevailed in ancient Italy; and, if we turn to the Teutonic race, our great ancestors, the race which occupies the first place in power, civilization, and science, and which possess the largest and the fairest part of Europe, we will find that their Governments were based on the federal organization, as has been clearly illustrated by a recent and able writer on the British constitution, (Mr. Palgrave,) from whose writings he introduced the following extract:

"In this manner the first establishment of the Teutonic States was effected. They were assemblages of sects, clans, and tribes; they were confederated hosts and armies, led on by princes, magistrates, and chieftains, each of whom was originally independent, and each of whom lost a portion of his pristine independence in proportion as he and his compeers became united under the supremacy of a sovereign, who was superinduced upon the State first as a military commander, and afterwards as a King. Yet, notwithstanding this political connexion, each member of the State continued to retain a considerable portion of the rights of sovereignty. Every ancient Teutonic monarchy must be considered as a federation; it is not a unit, of which the smaller bodies politic therein contained are the fractions, but they are the integers, and the State is the multiple which results from them. Dukedoms and counties, burghs and baronies, towns and townships, and shires, form the kingdom—all, in a certain degree, strangers to each other, and separate in jurisdiction, though all obedient to the supreme executive authority. This general description, though not always strictly applicable in terms, is always so substantially and in effect; and hence it becomes necessary to discard the language which has been very generally employed in treating on the English constitution. It has been supposed that the kingdom was reduced into a regular and gradual subordination of Government, and that the various legal districts of which it is composed arose from the divisions and subdivisions of the country. But this hypothesis, which tends greatly to perplex our history, cannot be supported by fact; and instead of viewing the constitution as a whole, and then proceeding to its parts, we must examine it synthetically, and assume that the supreme authorities of the State were created by the concentration of the powers originally belonging to the members and corporations of which it is composed." [Here Mr. C. gave way for a motion to adjourn.]

On the next day, Mr. C. proceeded by remarking that he had omitted at their proper place, in the course of his observations yesterday, two or three points to which he would now advert before he resumed the discussion where he had left off. He had stated that the ordinance and acts of South Carolina were directed, not against the revenue, but against the system of protection. But it might be asked, if such was her object, how happens it that she has declared the whole system void, revenue as well as protection, without discrimination? It is this question which he proposed to answer. Her justification would be found in the necessity of the case; and, if there be any blame, it could not attach to her. The two were so blended, throughout the whole, as to make the entire revenue system subordinate to the protection, so as constitute a complete system of protection, in which it was impossible to discriminate the two elements of which it is composed. South Carolina at least could not make the discrimination, and she was reduced to the alternative of acquiescing in a system which she believed to be unconstitutional, and which she felt to be oppressive and ruinous, or to consider the whole as one, equally contaminated through all its parts, by the unconstitutionality of the protective portion; and, as such, to be resisted by the act of the State. He maintained that the State had a right to regard it in the latter character, and that if a loss of revenue followed, the fault was not hers, but of this Government, which had improperly blended together, in a manner not to be separated by the State, two systems wholly dissimilar. If the sincerity of the State be doubted; if it be supposed that her action is against revenue as well as protection, let the two be separated; let so much of the duties as are intended for revenue be put in one bill, and the residue intended for protection be put in another; and he pledged himself that the ordinance and the acts of the State would cease as to the former, and be directed exclusively against the latter.

He had also stated, in the course of his remarks yesterday, and trusted he had conclusively shown, that the act of 1816, with the exception of a single item, to which he had alluded, was, in reality, a revenue measure, and that Carolina and the other States, in supporting it, had not incurred the slightest responsibility in relation to the system of protection which had since grown up, and which now so deeply distracts the country. Sir, said Mr. C., I am willing, as one of the representatives of Carolina, and I believe I speak the sentiment of the State, to take that act as the basis of a permanent adjustment of the tariff, simply reducing the duties, in an average proportion, on all the items, to the revenue point. I make that offer now to the advocates of the protective system; but I must, in candor, inform them, that such an adjustment would distribute the revenue between the protected and unprotected articles more favorably to the State, and to the South, and less so to the manufacturing interest, than an average uniform ad valorem; and, accordingly, more so than that now proposed by Carolina through her convention. After such an offer, no man who valued his candor will dare to accuse the State, or those who have represented her here, with inconsistency in reference to the point under consideration.

He omitted, also, on yesterday, to notice a remark of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] that the only difficulty in adjusting the tariff grew out of the ordinance and the acts of South Carolina. He must attribute an assertion, so inconsistent with the facts, to an ignorance of the occurrences of the last few years, in reference to this subject, occasioned by the absence of the gentleman from the United States, to which he himself has alluded in his remarks. If the Senator will take pains to inform himself, he will find that this protective system advanced with a continued and rapid step, in spite of petitions, remonstrances, and protests, of not only Carolina, but also of Virginia and of all the Southern States, until 1828; when Carolina, for the first time, changed the character of her resistance, by holding up her reserved rights as the shield of her defence against further encroachment. This attitude alone, unaided by a single State, arrested the further progress of the system; so that the question from that period to this, on the part of the manufacturers, has been, not how to acquire more, but to retain that which they have acquired. He would inform the gentleman, that if this attitude had not been taken on the part of the State, the question would not now be, how duties ought to be repealed, but a question as to the protected articles, between prohibition on one side, and the duties established by the act of 1828 on the other. But a single remark will be sufficient in reply to what he must consider the invidious remark of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] The act of 1832, which has not yet gone into operation, and which was passed but a few months since, was declared by the supporters of the system to be a permanent adjustment; and the bill proposed by the Treasury Department, not essentially different from the act itself, was in like manner declared to be intended, by the administration, as a permanent arrangement. What has occurred since, except this ordinance, and these abused acts of the calumniated State, to produce this mighty revolution in reference to this odious system? Unless the Senator from Virginia can assign some other cause, he is bound, upon every principle of fairness, to retract this unjust aspersion upon the acts of South Carolina.

Revenue Collection Bill.

After noticing another omission, Mr. C. said he would proceed with his remarks. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] as well as others, had relied with great emphasis on the fact, that we are citizens of the United States. I, said Mr. C., do not object to the expression, nor shall I detract from the proud and elevated feelings with which it is associated; but he trusted that he might be permitted to raise the inquiry, in what manner we are citizens of the United States, without weakening the patriotic feeling with which he trusted it would ever be uttered. If, by citizen of the United States he meant a citizen at large, one whose citizenship extended to the entire geographical limits of the country, without having a local citizenship in some State or Territory, a sort of citizen of the world, all he had to say was, that such a citizen would be a perfect nondescript; that not a single individual of this description could be found in the entire mass of our population. Notwithstanding all the pomp and display of eloquence on the occasion, every citizen is a citizen of some State or Territory, and, as such, under an express provision of the constitution, is entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and it is in this, and in no other sense, that we are citizens of the United States. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DALLAS,] indeed, relies upon that provision in the constitution which gives Congress the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and the operation of the rule actually established under this authority, to prove that naturalized citizens are citizens at large, without being citizens of any of the States. He did not deem it necessary to examine the law of Congress upon this subject, or to reply to the argument of the Senator, though he could not doubt that he [Mr. D.] had taken an entirely erroneous view on the subject. It was sufficient that the powers of Congress extended simply to the establishment of a uniform rule, by which foreigners might be naturalized in the several States or Territories, without infringing, in any other respect, in reference to naturalization, the rights of the States, as they existed before the adoption of the constitution.

Having supplied the omissions of yesterday, Mr. C. now resumed the subject at the point where his remarks then terminated. The Senate would remember that he stated, at their close, that the great question at issue was, whether ours is a federal or a consolidated system of government; a system in which the parts, to use the emphatic language of Mr. Palgrave, are the integers, and the whole the multiple, or in which the whole is a unit, and the parts the fractions; that he had stated that on the decision of this question, he believed, depends not only the liberty and prosperity of this country, but the place which we are destined to hold in the intellectual and moral scale of nations. He had stated, also, in his remarks on this point, that there was a striking analogy between this and the great struggle between Persia and Greece, which had been decided by the battles of Marathon, Plataea, and Salamis, and which had immortalized the names of Miltiades and Themistocles. He had illustrated this analogy, by showing that centralism, or consolidation, with the exception of a few nations along the eastern border of the Mediterranean, had been the prevailing principle in the Asiatic Governments; while the federal principle, or, what is the same in principle, that system which organizes a community in reference to its parts, had prevailed in Europe.

Among the few exceptions in the Asiatic nations, the Government of the twelve tribes of Israel, in its early period, was the most striking. Their Government, at first, was a mere confederation, without any central power, till a military chieftain, with the title of King, was placed at its head, without, however, merging the original organization of the twelve distinct tribes. This was the commencement of that central action among that peculiar people, which, in three generations, terminated in a permanent division of their tribes. It is impossible even for a careless reader to peruse the history of that event without being forcibly struck with the analogy in the causes which led to their separation, and those which now threaten us with a similar calamity. With the establishment of the central power in the King commenced a system of taxation, which, under King Solomon, was greatly increased, to defray the expense of rearing the temple, of enlarging and embellishing Jerusalem, the seat of the central Government, and the other profuse expenditures of his magnificent reign. Increased taxation was followed by its natural consequences—discontent and complaint, which before his death began to excite resistance. On the succession of his son, Rehoboam, the ten tribes, headed by Jeroboam, demanded a reduction of the taxes; the temple being finished, and the embellishment of Jerusalem completed, and the money which had been raised for that purpose being no longer required, or, in other words, the debt being paid, they demanded a reduction of the duties—a repeal of the tariff. The demand was taken under consideration, and, after consulting the old men, (the counsellors of '98,) who advised a reduction, he then took the opinion of the younger politicians, who had since grown up, and knew not the doctrines of their fathers. He hearkened unto their counsel, and refused to make the reduction; and the secession of the ten tribes, under Jeroboam, followed. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which had received the disbursements, alone remained to the house of David.

But to return to the point immediately under consideration. He knew that it was not only the opinion of a large majority of our country, but it might be said to be the opinion of the age, that the very beau ideal of a perfect Government was the Government of a majority, acting through a representative body, without check or limitation in its power; yet if we may test this theory by experience and reason, we will find that, so far from being perfect, the necessary tendency of all Governments, based upon the will of an absolute majority, without constitutional check or limitation of power, is to faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism; and this, whether the will of the majority be expressed directly through an assembly of the people themselves, or by their representatives. I know (said Mr. C.) that in venturing this assertion I utter that which is unpopular, both within and without these walls; but, where truth and liberty are concerned, such considerations should not be regarded. He would place the decision of this point on the fact, that no Government of the kind, among the many attempts which had been made, had ever endured for a single generation; but, on the contrary, had invariably experienced the fate which he had assigned to them. Let a single instance be pointed out, and he would surrender his opinion. But, if we had not the aid of experience to direct our judgment, reason itself would be a certain guide. The view which considers the community as a unit, and all its parts as having a similar interest, is radically erroneous. However small the community may be, and however homogeneous its interests, the moment that Government is put into operation, as soon as it begins to collect taxes, and to make appropriations, the different portions of the community must, of necessity, bear different and opposing relations in reference to the action of the Government. There must inevitably spring up two interests—a direction and a stockholder interest; an interest profiting by the action of the Government, and interested in increasing its powers and action; and another at whose expense the political machine is kept in motion. He knew how difficult it was to communicate distinct ideas on such a subject, through the medium of general propositions, without particular illustration; and, in order that he might be distinctly understood, though at the hazard of being tedious, he would illustrate the important principle which he had ventured to advance by examples.

Let us then suppose a small community of five persons, separated from the rest of the world; and, to make the example strong, let us suppose them all to be engaged in the same pursuit, and to be of equal wealth. Let us further suppose that they determine to govern the community by the will of a majority; and, to make the case as strong as possible, let us suppose that the majority, in order to meet the expenses of the Government, lay an equal tax, say of one hundred dollars, on each individual of this little community. Their treasury would contain five hundred dollars. Three are a majority; and they, by supposition, have contributed three hundred as their portion, and the other two, (the minority,) two hundred. The three have the right to make the appropriations as they may think proper. The question is, how would the principle of the absolute and unchecked majority operate, under these circumstances, in this little community? If the three be governed by a sense of justice; if they should appropriate the money to the objects for which it was raised, the common and equal benefit of the five, then the object of the association would be fairly and honestly effected, and each would have a common interest in the Government. But, should the majority pursue an opposite course; should they appropriate the money in a manner to benefit their own particular interest, without regard to the interest of the two; (and that they will so act, unless there be some efficient check, he who best knows human nature will least doubt,) who does not see that the three and the two would have directly opposite interests, in reference to the action of the Government? The three, who contribute to the common treasury but three hundred dollars, could, in fact, by appropriating the five hundred to their own use, convert the action of the Government into the means of making money; and, of consequence, would have a direct interest in increasing the taxes. They put in three hundred, and take out five; that is, they take back to themselves all that they had put in; and, in addition, that which was put in by their associates; or, in other words, taking taxation and appropriation together, they have gained, and their associates have lost, two hundred dollars by the fiscal action of the Government. An opposite interest, in reference to the action of the Government, is thus created between them; the one having an interest in favor and the other against the taxes; the one to increase, and the other to decrease the taxes; the one to retain the taxes when the money is no longer wanted, and the other to repeal them when the objects for which they were levied have been executed.

Let us now suppose this community of five to be raised to twenty-four individuals, to be governed in like manner by the will of a majority; it is obvious that the same principle would divide them into two interests; into a majority and a minority, thirteen against eleven, or in some other proportion; and that all the consequences, which he had shown to be applicable to the small community of five, would be equally applicable to the greater; the cause not depending upon the number, but resulting necessarily from the action of the Government itself. Let us now suppose that, instead of governing themselves directly in an assembly of the whole, without the intervention of agents, they should adopt the representative principle; and that, instead of being governed by a majority of themselves, they should be governed by a majority of their representatives. It is obvious that the operation of the system would not be affected by the change; the representatives being responsible to those who choose them, would conform to the will of their constituents, and would act as they would do, were they present, and acting for themselves; and the same conflict of interest which we have shown would exist in one case, would equally exist in the other. In either case, the inevitable result would be a system of hostile legislation on the part of the majority, or the stronger interest, against the minority, or the weaker interest; the object of which, on the part of the former, would be to exact as much as possible from the latter, which would necessarily be resisted by all the means in their power. Warfare, by legislation, would thus be commenced between the parties, with the same object, and not less hostile, than that which is carried on between distinct and rival nations; the only distinction would be in the instruments and the mode. Enactments, in the one case, would supply what could only be effected by arms in the other; and the inevitable operation would be to engender the most hostile feelings between the parties, which would immerse every feeling of patriotism—that feeling which embraces the whole—and substitute in its place the most violent party attachment; and, instead of having one common centre of attachment, around which the affections of the community might rally, there would, in fact, be two; the interests of the majority, to which those who constitute that majority would be more attached than they would be to the whole, and that of the minority, to which they in like manner would also be more attached than to the interests of the whole. Faction would thus take the place of patriotism; and, with the loss of patriotism, corruption must necessarily follow; and, in its train, anarchy; and, finally, despotism, or the establishment of absolute power in a single individual, as a means of arresting the conflict of hostile interests; on the principle that it is better to submit to the will of a single individual, who, by being made lord and master of the whole community, would have an equal interest in the protection of all the parts.

Let us next suppose that, in order to avert the calamitous train of consequences, this little community should adopt a written constitution, with limitations restricting the will of the majority, in order to protect the minority against the oppressions which he had shown would necessarily result without such restrictions. It is obvious that the case would not be in the slightest degree varied, if the majority be left in possession of the right of judging exclusively of the extent of its powers, without any right on the part of the minority to enforce the restrictions imposed by the constitution on the will of the majority. The point is almost too clear for illustration. Nothing can be more certain than that when a constitution grants power, and imposes limitations on the exercise of that power, whatever interests may obtain possession of the Government will be in favor of extending the power at the expense of the limitation; and that, unless those in whose behalf the limitations were imposed have, in some form or mode, the right of enforcing them, the power will ultimately supersede the limitation, and the Government must operate precisely in the same manner as if the will of the majority governed without constitution or limitation of power.

He had thus presented all possible modes in which a Government, bound upon the will of an absolute majority, would be modified; and had demonstrated that, in all its forms, whether in a majority of the people, as in a mere democracy, or in a majority of their representatives, without a constitution, or with a constitution, to be interpreted as the will of the majority, the result would be the same: two hostile interests would inevitably be created by the action of the Government, to be followed by hostile legislation, and that by faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism.

The great and solemn question here presented itself: Is there any remedy for these evils? on the decision of which depends the question, whether the people can govern themselves? which has been so often asked, with so much scepticism and doubt. There is a remedy, and but one, the effects of which, whatever may be the form, is to organize society in reference to this conflict of interests, which springs out of the action of Government; and which can only be done by giving to each part the right of self-protection; which, in a word, instead of considering the community of twenty-four as a single community, having a common interest, and to be governed by the single will of an entire majority, shall, upon all questions tending to bring the parts into conflict, the thirteen against the eleven, take the will, not of the twenty-four as a unit, but that of the thirteen and that of the eleven separately, the majority of each governing the parts; and, where they concur, governing the whole; and where they disagree, arresting the action of the Government. This he would call the concurring, as distinct from the absolute majority. It would not be, as was generally supposed, a minority governing a majority. In either way, the number would be the same, whether taken as the absolute, or as the concurring majority. Thus, the majority of the thirteen is seven, and of the eleven six, and the two together make thirteen, which is the majority of twenty-four. But though the number is the same, the mode of counting is essentially different; the one representing the stronger interest, and the other the weaker interest of the community. The first mistake was, in supposing that the Government of the absolute majority is the Government of this people; that beau idéal of a perfect Government, which had been so enthusiastically entertained in every age, by the generous and patriotic, where civilization and liberty had made the smallest progress. There could be no greater error; the Government of the people is the Government of the whole community; of the twenty-four; the self-government of all the parts; too perfect to be reduced to practice in the present, or any past stage of human society. The Government of the absolute majority, instead of the Government of the people, is but the Government of the strongest interests; and when not efficiently checked, is the most tyrannical and oppressive that can be devised. Between this ideal perfection on one side, and despotism on the other, none other can be devised but that which considers society, in reference to its parts, as differently affected by the action of the Government, and which takes the sense of each part separately, and thereby the sense of the whole in the manner already illustrated.

These principles, as he had already stated, are not affected by the number of which a community may be composed, and are just as applicable to one of thirteen millions, the number which composes ours, as of the small community of twenty-four, which I have supposed, for the purpose of illustration; and are not less applicable to the twenty-four States united in one community, than to the case of the twenty-four individuals. There is, indeed, a distinction between a large and a small community, not affecting the principle, but the violence of the action. In the former, the similarity of the interests of all the parts will limit the oppression from the hostile action of the parts, in a great degree, to the fiscal action of the Government merely; but in the large community, spreading over a country of great extent, and having a great diversity of interests, with different kinds of labor, capital, and production, the conflict and oppression will extend, not only to a monopoly of the appropriations, on the part of the stronger interests, but will end in unequal taxes, and a general conflict between the entire interests of conflicting sections, which, if not arrested by the most powerful checks, will terminate in the most oppressive tyranny that can be conceived, or in the destruction of the community itself.

If we turn our attention from these supposed cases, and direct it to our Government and its actual operation, we will find a practical confirmation of the truth of what has been stated, not only of the oppressive operation of the system of an absolute majority, but also a striking and beautiful illustration, in the formation of our system, of the principle of the concurring majority, as distinct from the absolute, which he had asserted to be the only means of efficiently checking the abuse of power, and, of course, the only solid foundation of constitutional liberty. That our Government, for many years, has been gradually verging to consolidation, that the constitution has gradually become a dead letter, and that all restrictions upon the power of Government have been virtually removed, so as practically to convert the General Government into a Government of an absolute majority, without check or limitation, cannot be denied by any one who has impartially observed its operation.

It is not necessary to trace the commencement and gradual progress of the causes which have produced this change in our system; it is sufficient to state that the change has taken place within the last few years. What has been the result? Precisely that which, might have been anticipated—the growth of faction, corruption, anarchy, and, if not despotism itself, its near approach, as witnessed in the provisions of this bill. And from what have these consequences sprung? We have been involved in no war. We have been at peace with all the world. We have been visited with no national calamity. Our people have been advancing in general intelligence, and, I will add, great and alarming as has been the advance of political corruption, the morals and virtue of the community at large have been advancing in improvement. What, he would again repeat, is the cause? No other can be assigned but a departure from the fundamental principles of the constitution, which has converted the Government into the will of an absolute and irresponsible majority, and which, by the laws which must inevitably govern in all such majorities, have placed in conflict the great interests of the country, by a system of hostile legislation; by an oppressive and unequal imposition of taxes; by unequal and profuse appropriations; and by rendering the entire labor and capital of the weaker interest subordinate to the stronger.

This is the cause, and these the fruits, which have converted the Government into a mere instrument of taking money from one portion of the community to be given to another, and which has rallied around it a great, a powerful, and mercenary corps of office-holders, office-seekers, and expectants, destitute of principle and patriotism, and who have no standard of morals or politics but the will of the Executive—the will of him who has the distribution of the loaves and the fishes. He held it impossible for any one to look at the theoretical illustration of the principle of the absolute majority in the cases which he had supposed, and not be struck with the practical illustration in the actual operation of our Government. Under every circumstance, the majority will ever have its American system—he meant nothing offensive to any Senator—but the real meaning of the American system is, that system of plunder which the stronger interest ever waged, and will ever wage, against the weaker, where the latter is not armed with some efficient and constitutional check to arrest its action. Nothing but such check on the part of the weaker interest can arrest it; mere constitutional limitations are wholly inefficient. Whatever interest obtains possession of the Government will, from the nature of things, be in favor of the powers, and against the limitations imposed by the constitution, and will resort to every device that can be imagined to remove those restraints. On the contrary, the opposite interest, (that which he had designated as the stockholding interest) the tax payers, (those on whom the system operates,) will resist the abuse of powers, and contend for the limitations. And it is on that point, then, that the contest between the delegated and the reserved powers will be waged; but, in this contest, as the interests in possession of the Government are organized and armed by all its powers and patronage, the opposite interest, if not in like manner organized and possessed of a power to protect themselves under the provisions of the constitution, will be as inevitably crushed as would be a band of unorganized militia when opposed by a veteran and trained corps of regulars. Let it never be forgotten that power can only be opposed by power, organization by organization; and on this theory stands our beautiful federal system of government. No free system was ever farther removed from the principle that the absolute majority, without check or limitation, ought to govern. To understand what our Government is, we must look to the constitution, which is the basis of the system. He did not intend to enter into any minute examination of the origin and the source of its powers; it was sufficient for his purpose to state, what he did fearlessly, that it derived its power from the people of the separate States, each ratifying by itself, each binding itself by its own separate majority, through its separate convention, and the concurrence of the majorities of the several States forming the constitution; thus taking the sense of the whole by that of the several parts representing the various interests of the entire community. It was this concurring and perfect majority which formed the constitution, and not that majority which would consider the American people as a single community, and which, instead of representing fairly and fully the interests of the whole, would but represent, as has been stated, the interest of the stronger section. No candid man can dispute that he had given a correct description of the constitution-making power, that power which created and organized the Government; which delegated to it, as a common agent, certain powers, in trust for the common good of all the States; and which had imposed strict limitations and checks against abuses and usurpations. In administering the delegated powers, the constitution provides, very properly, in order to give promptitude and efficiency, that the Government should be organized upon the principle of the absolute majority, or rather of two absolute majorities combined; a majority of the States considered as bodies politic, which prevails in this body, and a majority of the people of the States, estimated in federal numbers, in the other House of Congress. A combination of the two prevails in the choice of the President; and, of course, in the appointment of judges; they being nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It is thus that the concurring and the absolute majorities are combined in one complex system; the one in forming the constitution, and the other in making and executing the laws; thus beautifully blending the moderation, justice, and equity of the former and more perfect majority, with the promptness and energy of the latter, but less perfect.

To maintain the ascendancy of the constitution over the law-making majority is the great and essential point on which the success of the system must depend; unless that ascendancy can be preserved, the necessary consequence must be, that the laws will supersede the constitution; and, finally, the will of the Executive, by the influence of its patronage, will supersede the laws; indications of which are already perceptible. This ascendancy can only be preserved through the action of the States, as organized bodies, having their own separate Governments, and possessed of the right, under the structure of our system, of judging of the extent of their separate powers, and of interposing their authority to arrest the enactments of the General Government within their respective limits. He would not enter, at this time, into the discussion of this important point, as it had been ably and fully presented by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BISS.] and others who had preceded him in this debate, on the same side, whose arguments not only remained unanswered, but were unanswerable. It was only by this power of interpretation that the reserved rights of the States could be peacefully and efficiently protected against the encroachments of the General Government, that the limitations imposed upon its authority would be enforced, and its movements confined to the orbit allotted to it by the constitution.

It had, indeed, been said in debate, that this could be effected by the organization of the General Government itself, particularly by the action of this body, which represented the States; and that the States themselves must look to the General Government for the preservation of many of the most important of their reserved rights. Mr. C. said he did not underrate the value to be attached to the organic arrangement of the General Government, and the wise distribution of its powers between the several departments, and, in particular, the structure and the important functions of this body; but to suppose that the Senate, or any department of this Government, was intended to be the guardian of the reserved rights, was a great and fundamental mistake. The Government, through all its departments, represents the delegated and not the reserved powers; and it was a violation of the fundamental principle of free institutions, to suppose that any but the responsible representative of any interest could be its guardian. The distribution of the powers of the General Government, and its organization, were arranged to prevent the abuse of power, in fulfilling the important trusts confided to it; and not, as preposterously supposed, to protect the reserved powers, which are confided wholly to the guardianship of the several States.

Against the view of our system which he had presented, and the right of the State to interpose, it was objected, that it would lead to anarchy and dissolution. He considered the objection as without the slightest foundation; and that, so far from tending to weakness or disunion, it was the source of the highest power and of the strongest cement. Nor was its tendency in this respect difficult of explanation. The Government of an absolute majority, unchecked by efficient constitutional restraint, though apparently strong, was in reality an exceedingly feeble Government. That tendency to conflict between the parts, which he had shown to be inevitable in such Governments, wasted the powers of the State in the hostile action of contending factions, which left very little more power than the excess of the strength of the majority over the minority. But a Government based upon the principle of the concurring majority, where each great interest possessed within itself the means of self-protection, which ultimately requires the mutual consent of all the parts, necessarily causes that unanimity in counsel, and ardent attachment of all the parts to the whole, which gives an irresistible energy to a Government so constituted.

He might appeal to history for the truth of these remarks, of which the Roman furnished the most familiar and striking. It was a well known fact, that, from the expulsion of the Tarquins to the time of the establishment of the tribunarian power, the Government fell into a state of the greatest disorder and distraction, and, he might add, corruption. How did this happen? The explanation will throw important light on the subject under consideration. The community was divided into two parts, the patricians and the plebeians, with the powers of the State principally in the hands of the former, without adequate check to protect the rights of the latter. The result was as might be expected. The patricians converted the powers of the Government into the means of making money, to enrich themselves and their dependants. They, in a word, had their American system, growing out of the peculiar character of the Government and condition of the country. This requires explanation. At that period, according to the laws of nations, when one nation conquered another, the lands of the vanquished belonged to the victors; and, according to the Roman law, the lands thus acquired were divided into parts, one allotted to the poorer class of the people, and the other assigned to the use of the treasury, of which the patricians had the distribution and administration. The patricians abused their power, by withholding from the people that which ought to have been allotted to them, and by converting to their own use that which ought to have gone to the treasury. In a word, they took to themselves the entire spoils of victory, and they had thus the most powerful motive to keep the State perpetually involved in war, to the utter impoverishment and oppression of the people. After resisting the abuse of power by all peaceable means, and the oppression becoming intolerable, the people at last withdrew from the city; they, in a word, seceded; and, to induce them to reunite, the patricians conceded to the plebeians, as the means of protecting their separate interests, the very power which he contended is necessary to protect the rights of the States, but which is now represented as necessarily leading to disunion. They granted to the people the right of choosing three tribunes from among themselves, whose persons should be sacred, and who should have the right of interposing their veto, not only against the passage of laws, but even against their execution; a power which those who take a shallow insight into human nature would pronounce inconsistent with the strength and unity of the State, if not utterly impracticable. Yet, so far from that being the effect, from that day the genius of Rome became ascendant, and victory followed her steps till she had established an almost universal dominion.

How can a result so contrary to all anticipation be explained? The explanation appeared to him to be simple. No measure or movement could be adopted without the concurring consent of both the patricians and plebeians, and each thus became dependent on the other, and, of consequence, the desire and objects of neither could be effected without the concurrence of the other. To obtain this concurrence, each was compelled to consult the good will of the other, and to elevate to office not simply those who might have the confidence of the order to which he belonged, but also that of the other. The result was, that men possessing those qualities which would naturally command confidence, moderation, wisdom, justice, and patriotism, were elevated to office; and these, by the weight of their authority and the prudence of their counsel, together with that spirit of unanimity necessarily resulting from the concurring assent of the two orders, furnishes the real explanation of the power of the Roman State, and of that extraordinary wisdom, moderation, and firmness, which in so remarkable a degree characterized her public men. He might illustrate the truth of the position which he had laid down, by a reference to the history of all free States, ancient and modern, distinguished for their power and patriotism; and conclusively show not only that there was not one which had not some contrivance, under some form, by which the concurring assent of the different portions of the community was made necessary in the action of Government, but also that the virtue, patriotism, and strength of the State were in direct proportion to the strength of the means of securing such assent. In estimating the operation of this principle in our system, which depends, as he had stated, on the right of interposition on the part of the State, we must not omit to take into consideration the amending power, by which new powers may be granted, or any derangement of the system be corrected, by the concurring assent of three-fourths of the States; and thus, in the same degree, strengthening the power of repairing any derangement occasioned by the executive action of a State. In fact, the power of interposition, fairly understood, may be considered in the light of an appeal against the usurpations of the General Government, the joint agent of all the States, to the States themselves, to be decided, under the amending power, affirmatively, in favor of the Government, by the voice of three-fourths of the States, as the highest power known under the system.

Mr. C. said that he knew the difficulty, in our country, of establishing the truth of the principle for which he contended, though resting upon the clearest reason, and tested by the universal experience of free nations. He knew that the Governments of the several States would be cited as an argument against the conclusion to which he had arrived, and which, for the most part, were constructed on the principle of the absolute majority; but, in his opinion, a satisfactory answer could be given: that the objects of expenditure which fell within the sphere of a State Government were few and inconsiderable; so that, be their action ever so irregular, it could occasion but little derangement. If, instead of being members of this great confederacy, they formed distinct communities, and were compelled to raise armies, and incur other expenses necessary for their defence, the laws which he had laid down as necessarily controlling the action of a State, where the will of an absolute and unchecked majority prevailed, would speedily disclose themselves in faction, anarchy, and corruption. Even as the case is, the operation of the causes to which he had referred were perceptible in some of the larger and more populous members of the Union, whose Governments had a powerful central action, and which already showed a strong tendency to that moneyed action which is the invariable forerunner of corruption and convulsions.

But to return to the General Government; we have now sufficient experience to ascertain that the tendency to conflict in its action is between southern and other sections. The latter, having a decided majority, must habitually be possessed of the powers of the Government, both in this and in the other House; and, being governed by that instinctive love of power so natural to the human breast, they must become the advocates of the power of Government, and in the same degree opposed to the limitations; while the other and weaker section is as necessarily thrown on the side of the limitations. In one word, the one section is the natural guardian of the delegated powers, and the other of the reserved; and the struggle on the side of the former will be to enlarge the powers, while that on the opposite side will be to restrain them within their constitutional limits. The contest will, in fact, be a contest between power and liberty, and such he considered the present; a contest in which the weaker section, with its peculiar labor, productions, and situation, has at stake all that can be dear to freemen. Should they be able to maintain in their full vigor their reserved rights, liberty and prosperity will be their portion; but if they yield, and permit the stronger interest to consolidate within itself all the powers of the Government, then will its fate be more wretched than that of the aborigines whom they have expelled, or of their slaves. In this great struggle between the delegated and reserved powers, so far from repining that his lot and that of those whom he represented is cast on the side of the latter, he rejoiced that such is the fact; for though we participate in but few of the advantages of the Government, we are compensated, and more than compensated, in not being so much exposed to its corruption. Nor did he repine that the duty, so difficult to be discharged, as the defence of the reserved powers against, apparently, such fearful odds, had been assigned to them. To discharge successfully this high duty requires the highest qualities, moral and intellectual; and, should we perform it with a zeal and ability in proportion to its magnitude, instead of being mere planters, our section will become distinguished for its patriots and statesmen. But, on the other hand, if we prove unworthy of this high destiny, if we yield to the steady encroachment of power, the severest and most debasing calamity and corruption will overspread the land. Every Southern man, true to the interests of his section, and faithful to the duties which Providence has allotted him, will be forever excluded from the honors and emoluments of this Government, which will be reserved for those only who have qualified themselves, by political prostitution, for admission into the Magdalen Asylum.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of this bill, and Mr. CALHOUN having concluded his speech against it, (as given entire above,)

Mr. WEBSTER rose. The gentleman from South Carolina, said Mr. W., has admonished us to be mindful of the opinions of those who shall come after us. We must take our chance, sir, as to the light in which posterity will regard us. I do not decline its judgment, nor withhold myself from its scrutiny. Feeling that I am performing my public duty with singleness of heart, and to the best of my ability, I fearlessly trust myself to the country, now and hereafter, and leave both my motives and my character to its decision.

The gentleman has terminated his speech in a tone of threat and defiance towards this bill, even should it become a law of the land, altogether unusual in the halls of Congress. But I shall not suffer myself to be excited into warmth by his denunciation of the measure which I support. Among the feelings which at this moment fill my breast, not the least is that of regret at the position in which the gentleman has placed himself. Sir, he does himself no justice. The cause which he has espoused finds no basis in the constitution; no succor from public sympathy; no cheering from a patriotic community. He has no foothold on which to stand, while he might display the powers of his acknowledged talents. Every thing beneath his feet is hollow and treacherous. He is like a strong man struggling in a morass; every effort to extricate himself only sinks him deeper and deeper. And I fear the resemblance may be carried still further; I fear that no friend can safely come to his relief, that no one can approach near enough to hold out a helping hand, without danger of going down himself, also, into the bottomless depths of this Serbonian bog.

The honorable gentleman has declared that on the decision of the question now in debate may depend the cause of liberty itself. I am of the same opinion; but then, sir, the liberty which I think is staked on the contest is not political liberty, in any general and undefined character, but our own, well understood, and long enjoyed American liberty.

Oh, I love liberty no less ardently than the gentleman, in whatever form she may have appeared in the progress of human history. As exhibited in the master States of antiquity, as breaking out again from amidst the darkness of the middle ages, and beaming on the formation of new communities in modern Europe, she has always and every where charms for me. Yet, sir, it is our own liberty, guarded by constitutions and secured by union; it is that liberty which is our paternal inheritance, it is our established, dear-bought, peculiar American liberty, to which I am chiefly devoted, and the cause of which I now mean, to the utmost of my power, to maintain and defend.

Mr. President, if I considered the constitutional question now before us as doubtful as it is important, and if I supposed that this decision, either in the Senate or by the country, was likely to be in any degree influenced by the manner in which I might now discuss it, this would be to me a moment of deep solicitude. Such a moment has once existed. There has been a time, when, rising in this place, on the same question, I felt, I must confess, that something for good or evil to the constitution of the country might depend on an effort of mine. But circumstances are changed. Since that day, sir, the public opinion has become awakened to this great question; it has grasped it, it has reasoned upon it, as becomes an intelligent and patriotic community; and has settled it, or now seems in the progress of settling it, by an authority which none can disobey—the authority of the people themselves.

I shall not, Mr. President, follow the gentleman, step by step, through the course of his speech. Much of what he has said he has deemed necessary to the just explanation and defence of his own political character and conduct. On this I shall offer no comment. Much, too, has consisted of philosophical remark upon the general nature of political liberty and the history of free institutions; and of other topics, so general in their nature, as to possess, in my opinion, only a remote bearing on the immediate subject of this debate.

But the gentleman's speech made some days ago, upon introducing his resolutions, those resolutions themselves, and parts of the speech now just concluded, may probably be justly regarded as comprising the whole South Carolina doctrine. That doctrine it is my purpose now to examine, and to compare it with the constitution of the United States. I shall not consent, sir, to make any new constitution, or to establish another form of government. I will not undertake to say what a constitution for these United States ought to be. That question the people have decided for themselves; and I shall take the instrument as they have established it, and shall endeavor to maintain it, in its plain sense and meaning, against opinions and notions which, in my judgment, threaten its subversion.

The resolutions introduced by the gentleman were apparently drawn up with care, and brought forward upon deliberation. I shall not be in danger, therefore, of misunderstanding him, or those who agree with him, if I proceed at once to these resolutions, and consider them as an authentic statement of those opinions, upon the great constitutional question, by which the recent proceedings in South Carolina are attempted to be justified.

These resolutions are three in number.

The third seems intended to enumerate, and to deny, the several opinions expressed in the President's proclamation, respecting the nature and powers of this Government. Of this third resolution, I propose at present to take no particular notice.

The first two resolutions of the honorable member affirm these propositions, viz:

1. That the political system under which we live, and under which Congress is now assembled, is a compact, to which the people of the several States, as separate and sovereign communities, are the parties.

2. That these sovereign parties have a right to judge, each for itself, of any alleged violation of the constitution by Congress; and, in case of such violation, to choose, each for itself, its own mode and measure of redress.

It is true, sir, that the honorable member calls this a "constitutional" compact; but still he affirms it to be a compact between sovereign States. What precise meaning, then, does he attach to the term "constitutional"? When applied to compacts between sovereign States, the term "constitutional" affixes to that word "compact" no definite idea. Were we to hear of a constitutional league or treaty between England and France, or a constitutional convention between Austria and Russia, we should not understand what could be intended by such a league, such a treaty, or such a convention. In these connexions, the word is void of all meaning; and yet, sir, it is easy, quite easy, to see why the honorable gentleman has used it in these resolutions. He cannot open the book and look up on our written frame of government, without seeing that it is called a constitution. This may well be appalling to him. It threatens his whole doctrine of compact, and its darling derivatives, nullification and secession, with instant confutation. Because, if he admits our instrument of government to be a constitution, then, for that very reason, it is not a compact between sovereigns; a constitution of government, and a compact between sovereign Powers, being things essentially unlike in their very natures, and incapable of ever being the same. Yet the word "constitution" is on the very front of the instrument. He cannot overlook it. He seeks, therefore, to compromise the matter, and to sink all the substantial sense of the word, while he retains a resemblance of its sound. He introduces a new word of his own, viz. "compact," as importing the principal idea, and designed to play the principal part, and degrades the constitution into an insignificant, idle epithet, attached to compact. The whole then stands as a "constitutional compact!" And in this way he hopes to pass off a plausible gloss, as satisfying the words of the instrument; but he will find himself disappointed. Sir, I must say to the honorable gentleman, that in our American political grammar, "constitution" is a noun substantive; it imports a distinct and clear idea, of itself; and it is not to lose its importance and dignity, it is not to be turned into a poor, ambiguous, senseless, unmeaning adjective, for the purpose of accommodating any new set of political notions. Sir, we reject his new rules of syntax altogether. We will not give up our forms of political speech to the grammarians of the school of nullification. By the constitution we mean not a "constitutional compact," but simply and directly the constitution, the fundamental law; and if there be one word in the language which the people of the United States understand, this is that word. We know no more of a constitutional compact between sovereign Powers, than we know of a constitutional indenture of copartnership, a constitutional deed of conveyance, or a constitutional bill of exchange. But we know what the constitution is; we know what the plainly written fundamental law is; we know what the bond of our Union and the security of our liberties is; and we mean to maintain and to defend it, in its plain sense and unsophisticated meaning.

The sense of the gentleman's proposition, therefore, is not at all affected, one way or the other, by the use of this word. That proposition still is, that our system of government is but a compact between the people of separate and sovereign States.

Was it Mirabeau, Mr. President, or what other master of the human passions, who has told us that words are things? They are indeed things, and things of mighty influence, not only in addresses to the passions and high-wrought feelings of mankind, but in the discussion of legal and political questions also; because a just conclusion is often avoided, or a false one reached, by the adroit substitution of one phrase or one word for another. Of this we have, I think, another example in the resolutions before us.

The first resolution declares that the people of the several States "acceded" to the constitution, or to the constitutional compact, as it is called. This word "accede," not found either in the constitution itself, or in the ratification of it by any one of the States, has been chosen for use here, doubtless not without a well-considered purpose.

The natural converse of accession is secession; and, therefore, when it is stated that the people of the States acceded to the Union, it may be more plausibly argued that they may secede from it. If, in adopting the constitution, nothing was done but acceding to a compact, nothing would seem necessary, in order to break it up, but to secede from the same compact. But the term is wholly out of place. Accession, as a word applied to political associations, implies coming into a league, treaty, or confederacy, by one hitherto a stranger to it; and secession implies departing from such league or confederacy. The people of the United States have used no such form of expression in establishing the present Government. They do not say that they accede to a league, but they declare that they ordain and establish a constitution. Such are the very words of the instrument itself; and in all the States, without an exception, the language used by their conventions was, that they "ratified the constitution;" some of them employing the additional words "assented to" and "adopted," but all of them "ratifying." There is more importance than may at first sight appear in the introduction of this new word by the honorable mover of these resolutions. Its adoption and use are indispensable to maintain those premises from which his main conclusion is to be afterwards drawn. But, before showing that, allow me to remark, that this phraseology tends to keep out of sight the just view of our previous political history, as well as to suggest wrong ideas as to what was actually done when the present constitution was agreed to. In 1789, and before this constitution was adopted, the United States had already been in a union, more or less close, for fifteen years. At least as far back as the meeting of the first Congress, in 1774, they had been, in some measure, and to some national purposes, united together. Before the confederation of 1781, they had declared independence jointly, and had carried on the war jointly, both by sea and land; and this, not as separate States, but as one people. When, therefore, they formed that confederation, and adopted its articles as articles of perpetual union, they did not come together for the first time; and, therefore, they did not speak of the States as acceding to the confederation, although it was a league, and nothing but a league, and rested on nothing but plighted faith for its performance. Yet, even then, the States were not strangers to each other; there was a bond of union already subsisting between them; they were associated, united States; and the object of the confederation was to make a stronger and better bond of union. Their representatives deliberated together on these proposed articles of confederation; and, being authorized by their respective States, finally "ratified and confirmed" them. Inasmuch as they were already in union, they did not speak of acceding to the new articles of confederation, but of ratifying and confirming them; and this language was not used inadvertently, because, in the same instrument, accession is used in its proper sense, when applied to Canada, which was altogether a stranger to the existing Union. "Canada," says the 11th article, "on acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into the Union."

Having thus used the terms ratify and confirm, even in regard to the old confederation, it would have been strange, indeed, if the people of the United States, after its formation, and when they came to establish the present constitution, had spoken of the States, or of the people of the States, as acceding to this constitution. Such language would have been ill-suited to the occasion. It would have implied an existing separation or disunion among the States, such as never has existed since 1774. No such language, therefore, was used. The language actually employed is, "adopt," "ratify," "ordain," "establish."

Therefore, sir, since any State, before she can prove her right to dissolve the Union, must show her authority to undo what has been done, no State is at liberty to secede on the ground that she and other States have done nothing but accede. She must show that she has a right to reverse what has been ordained, to unsettle and overthrow what has been established, to reject what the people have adopted, and to break up what they have ratified; because these are the terms which express the transactions which have actually taken place. In other words, she must show her right to make a revolution.

If, Mr. President, in drawing these resolutions, the honorable member had confined himself to the use of constitutional language, there would have been a wide and awful hiatus between his premises and his conclusions. Leaving out the words "compact" and "accession," which are not constitutional modes of expression, and stating the matter precisely as the truth is, his first resolution would have affirmed that the people of the several States ratified this constitution or form of government. These are the very words of South Carolina herself in her own act of ratification. Let, then, his first resolution tell the exact truth; let it state the fact precisely as it exists; let it say that the people of the several States ratified a constitution, or form of government; and then, sir, what will become of his inference in his second resolution, which is in these words, viz: "That, as in all other cases of compact among sovereign parties, each has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of the infraction as of the mode and measure of redress?" It is obvious, is it not, sir? that this conclusion requires for its support quite other premises; it requires premises which speak of accession and of compact between sovereign powers, and, without such premises, it is altogether unmeaning.

Mr. President, if the honorable member will truly state what the people did in forming this constitution, and then state what they must do if they would now undo what they then did, he will unavoidably state a case of revolution. Let us see if it be not so. He must state, in the first place, that the people of the several States adopted and ratified this constitution, or form of government; and, in the next place, he must state that they have a right to undo this; that is to say, that they have a right to discard the form of government which they have adopted, and to break up the constitution which they have ratified. Now, sir, this is neither more nor less than saying that they have a right to make a revolution. To reject an established Government, to break up a political constitution, is revolution.

I deny that any man can state, accurately, what was done by the people in establishing the present constitution, and then state, accurately, what the people, or any part of them, must now do to get rid of its obligations, without stating an undeniable case of the overthrow of Government. I admit, of course, that the people may, if they choose, overthrow the Government. But, then, that is revolution. The doctrine now contended for is, that by nullification or secession the obligations and authority of the Government may be set aside or rejected without revolution. But that is what I deny; and what I say is, that no man can state the case with historical accuracy, and in constitutional language, without showing that the honorable gentleman's right, as asserted in his conclusion, is a revolutionary right merely; that it does not and cannot exist under the constitution, or agreeably to the constitution, but can come into existence only when the constitution is overthrown. This is the reason, sir, which makes it necessary to abandon the use of constitutional language for a new vocabulary, and to substitute, in the place of plain historical facts, a series of assumptions. This is the reason why it is necessary to give new names to things: to speak of the constitution not as a constitution, but as a compact; and of the ratifications by the people not as ratifications, but as acts of accession.

Sir, I intend to hold the gentleman to the written record. In the discussion of a constitutional question, I intend to impose upon him the restraints of constitutional language. The people have ordained a constitution; can they reject it without revolution? They have established a form of government; can they overthrow it without revolution? These are the true questions.

Allow me now, Mr. President, to inquire further into the extent of the propositions contained in the resolutions, and their necessary consequences.

Where sovereign communities are parties, there is no essential difference between a compact, a confederation, and a league. They all equally rest on the plighted faith of the sovereign party. A league, or confederacy, is but a subsisting or continuing treaty.

The gentleman's resolutions, then, affirm, in effect, that these twenty-four United States are held together only by a subsisting treaty, resting for its fulfilment and continuance on no inherent power of its own, but on the plighted faith of each State; or, in other words, that our Union is but a league; and, as a consequence from this proposition, they further affirm that, as sovereigns are subject to no superior power, the States must decide, each for itself, of any alleged violation of the league; and if such violation be supposed to have occurred, each may adopt any mode or measure of redress which it shall think proper.

Other consequences naturally follow, too, from the main proposition. If a league between sovereign powers have no limitation as to the time of its duration, and contain nothing making it perpetual, it subsists only during the good pleasure of the parties, although no violation be complained of. If, in the opinion of either party, it be violated, such party may say that he will no longer fulfil its obligations on his part, but will consider the whole league or compact at an end, although it might be one of its stipulations that it should be perpetual. Upon this principle, the Congress of the United States, in 1798, declared null and void the treaty of alliance between the United States and France, though it professed to be a perpetual alliance.

If the violation of the league be accompanied with serious injuries, the suffering party, being sole judge of his own mode and measure of redress, has a right to indemnify himself by reprisals on the offending members of the league; and reprisals, if the circumstances of the case require it, may be followed by direct, avowed, and public war.

The necessary import of the resolutions, therefore, is, that the United States are connected only by a league; that it is in the good pleasure of every State to decide how long she will choose to remain a member of this league; that any State may determine the extent of her own obligations under it, and accept or reject what shall be decided by the whole; and that she may also determine whether her rights have been violated, what is the extent of the injury done her, and what mode and measure of redress her wrongs may make it fit and expedient for her to adopt. The result of the whole is, that any State may secede at pleasure; that any State may resist a law which she herself may choose to say exceeds the power of Congress; and that, as a sovereign power, she may redress her own grievances by her own arm, at her own discretion; she may make reprisals; she may cruise against the property of other members of the league; she may authorize captures, and make open war.

If, sir, this be our political condition, it is time the people of the United States understood it. Let us look for a moment to the practical consequences of these opinions.

Revenue Collection Bill.

One State, holding an embargo law unconstitutional, may declare her opinion, and withdraw from the Union. She secedes. Another, forming and expressing the same judgment on a law laying duties on imports, may withdraw also. She secedes. And as, in her opinion, money has been taken out of the pockets of her citizens illegally, under pretence of this law, and as she has power to redress their wrongs, she may demand satisfaction; and, if refused, she may take it with a strong hand. The gentleman has himself pronounced the collection of duties, under existing laws, to be nothing but robbery. Robbers, of course, may be rightfully dispossessed of the fruits of their flagitious crimes; and, therefore, reprisals, impositions on the commerce of other States, foreign alliances against them, or open war, are all modes of redress justly open to the discretion and choice of South Carolina; for she is to judge of her own rights, and to seek satisfaction for her own wrongs, in her own way.

But, sir, a third State is of opinion not only that these laws of impost are constitutional, but that it is the absolute duty of Congress to pass and to maintain such laws; and that, by omitting to pass and maintain them, its constitutional obligations would be grossly disregarded. She relinquished the power of protection, she might allege, and allege truly, herself, and gave it up to Congress, on the faith that Congress would exercise it. If Congress now refuse to exercise it, Congress does, as she may insist, break the condition of the grant, and thus manifestly violate the constitution; and for this violation of the constitution, she may threaten to secede also. Virginia may secede, and hold the fortresses in the Chesapeake. The Western States may secede, and take to their own use the public lands. Louisiana may secede, if she choose, form a foreign alliance, and hold the mouth of the Mississippi. If one State may secede, ten may do so—twenty may do so—twenty-three may do so. Sir, as these secessions go on, one after another, what is to constitute the United States? Whose will be the army? Whose the navy? Who will pay the debts? Who fulfil the public treaties? Who perform the constitutional guaranties? Who govern this District and the Territories? Who retain the public property?

Mr. President, every man must see that these are all questions which can arise only after a revolution. They presuppose the breaking up of the Government. While the constitution lasts, they are repressed; they spring up to annoy and startle us only from its grave.

The constitution does not provide for events which must be preceded by its own destruction. Secession, therefore, since it must bring these consequences with it, is revolutionary. And nullification is equally revolutionary. What is revolution? Why, sir, that is revolution which overturns, or controls, or successfully resists the existing public authority; that which arrests the exercise of the supreme power; that which introduces a new paramount authority into the rule of the State. Now, sir, this is the precise object of nullification. It attempts to supersede the supreme legislative authority. It arrests the arm of the Executive Magistrate. It interrupts the exercise of the accustomed judicial power. Under the name of an ordinance, it declares null and void, within the State, all the revenue laws of the United States. Is not this revolutionary? Sir, so soon as this ordinance shall be carried into effect, a revolution will have commenced in South Carolina. She will have thrown off the authority to which her citizens have heretofore been subject. She will have declared her own opinions and her own will to be above the laws, and above the power of those who are intrusted with their administration. If she makes good these declarations, she is revolutionized. As to her, it is as distinctly a change of the supreme power as the American revolution of 1776. That revolution did not subvert Government in all its forms. It did not subvert local laws and municipal administrations. It only threw off the dominion of a power claiming to be superior, and to have a right, in many important respects, to exercise legislative authority. Thinking this authority to have been usurped or abused, the American colonies, now the United States, bade it defiance, and freed themselves from it by means of a revolution. But that revolution left them with their own municipal laws still, and the forms of local government. If Carolina now shall effectually resist the laws of Congress, if she shall be her own judge, take her remedy into her own hands, obey the laws of the Union when she pleases, and disobey them when she pleases, she will relieve herself from a paramount power as distinctly as did the American colonies in 1776. In other words, she will achieve, as to herself, a revolution.

But, sir, while practical nullification in South Carolina would be, as to herself, actual and distinct revolution, its necessary tendency must also be to spread revolution, and to break up the constitution, as to all the other States. It strikes a deadly blow at the vital principle of the whole Union. To allow State resistance to the laws of Congress to be rightful and proper, to admit nullification in some States, and yet not expect to see a dismemberment of the entire Government, appears to me the wildest illusion and the most extravagant folly. The gentleman seems not conscious of the direction or the rapidity of his own course. The current of his opinions sweeps him along, he knows not whither. To begin with nullification, with the avowed intent, nevertheless, not to proceed to secession, dismemberment, and general revolution, is as if one were to take the plunge of Niagara, and cry out that he would stop half-way down. In the one case, as in the other, the rash adventurer must go to the bottom of the dark abyss below, were it not that that abyss has no discovered bottom.

Nullification, if successful, arrests the power of the law, absolves citizens from their duty, subverts the foundation both of protection and obedience, dispenses with oaths and obligations of allegiance, and elevates another authority to supreme command. Is not this revolution? And it raises to supreme command four-and-twenty distinct powers, each professing to be under a General Government, and yet each setting its laws at defiance at pleasure. Is not this anarchy, as well as revolution? Sir, the constitution of the United States was received as a whole, and for the whole country. If it cannot stand altogether, it cannot stand in parts; and, if the laws cannot be executed every where, they cannot long be executed any where. The gentleman very well knows that all duties and imposts must be uniform throughout the country. He knows that we cannot have one rule or one law for South Carolina, and another for other States. He must see, therefore, and does see—every man sees—that the only alternative is a repeal of the laws throughout the whole Union, or their execution in Carolina as well as elsewhere. And this repeal is demanded, because a single State interposes her veto, and threatens resistance! The result of the gentleman's opinions, or rather the very text of his doctrine, is, that no act of Congress can bind all the States, the constitutionality of which is not admitted by all; or, in other words, that no single State is bound, against its own dissent, by a law of imposts. This was precisely the evil experienced under the old confederation, and for remedy of which this constitution was adopted. The leading object in establishing this Government, an object forced on the country by the condition of the times, and the absolute necessity of the law, was to give to Congress power to lay and collect imposts without the consent of particular States. The revolutionary debt remained unpaid; the national treasury was bankrupt; the country was destitute of credit; Congress issued its requisitions on the States, and the States neglected them; there was no power of coercion but war; Congress could not lay imposts, or other taxes, by its own authority; the whole General Government, therefore, was little more than a name. The articles of confederation, as to purposes of revenue and finance, were nearly a dead letter. The country sought to escape from this condition, at once feeble and disgraceful, by constituting a Government which should have power of itself to lay duties and taxes, and to pay the public debt, and provide for the general welfare; and to lay these duties and taxes in all the States, without asking the consent of the State Governments. This was the very power on which the new constitution was to depend for all its ability to do good; and, without it, it can be no Government, now or at any time. Yet, sir, it is precisely against this power, so absolutely indispensable to the very being of the Government, that South Carolina directs her ordinance. She attacks the Government in its authority to raise revenue, the very mainspring of the whole system; and, if she succeed, every movement of that system must inevitably cease. It is of no avail that she declares that she does not resist the law as a revenue law, but as a law for protecting manufactures. It is a revenue law; it is the very law by force of which the revenue is collected; if it be arrested in any State, the revenue ceases in that State; it is, in a word, the sole reliance of the Government for the means of maintaining itself and performing its duties.

Mr. President, the alleged right of a State to decide constitutional questions for herself necessarily leads to force, because other States must have the same right, and because different States will decide differently; and, when these questions arise between States, if there be no superior power, they can be decided only by the law of force. On entering into the Union, the people of each State gave up a part of their own power to make laws for themselves, in consideration that, as to common objects, they should have a part in making laws for other States. In other words, the people of all the States agreed to create a common Government, to be conducted by common councils. Pennsylvania, for example, yielded the right of laying imposts in her own ports, in consideration that the new Government, in which she was to have a share, should possess the power of laying imposts in all the States. If South Carolina now refuses to submit to this power, she breaks the condition on which other States entered into the Union. She partakes of the common councils, and therein assists to bind others, while she refuses to be bound herself. It makes no difference in the case whether she does all this without reason or pretext, or whether she sets up a reason that, in her judgment, the acts complained of are unconstitutional. In the judgment of other States, they are not so. It is nothing to them that she offers some reason or some apology for her conduct, if it be one which they do not admit. It is not to be expected that any State will violate her duty without some plausible pretext. That would be too rash a defiance of the opinion of mankind. But, if it be a pretext which lies in her own breast—if it be no more than an opinion which she says she has formed—how can other States be satisfied with this? How can they allow her to be judge of her own obligations? Or, if she may judge of her obligations, may they not judge of their rights also? May not the twenty-three entertain an opinion as well as the twenty-fourth? And, if it be their right, in their own opinion, as expressed in the common council, to enforce the law against her, how is she to say that her right and her opinion are to be every thing, and their right and their opinion nothing?

Mr. President, if we are to receive the constitution as the text, and then to lay down, in its margin, the contradictory commentaries which have been, and which may be made by different States, the whole page would be a polyglot indeed. It would speak with as many tongues as the builders of Babel, and in dialects as much confused, and mutually as unintelligible. The very instance now before us presents a practical illustration. The law of the last session is declared unconstitutional in South Carolina, and obedience to it is refused. In other States it is admitted to be strictly constitutional. You walk over the limits of its authority, therefore, when you pass the State line. On one side it is law; on the other side, a nullity; and yet it is passed by a common Government, having the same authority in all the States.

Such are the inevitable results of this doctrine. Beginning with the original error, that the constitution of the United States is nothing but a compact between sovereign States; asserting, in the next step, that each State has a right to be its own sole judge of the extent of its own obligations, and, consequently, of the constitutionality of laws of Congress; and, in the next, that it may oppose whatever it sees fit to declare unconstitutional, and that it decides for itself on the mode and measure of redress, the argument arrives at once at the conclusion that what a State dissents from, it may nullify; what it opposes, it may oppose by force; what it decides for itself, it may execute by its own power; and that, in short, it is, itself, supreme over the legislation of Congress, and supreme over the decisions of the national judicature; supreme over the constitution of the country, supreme over the supreme law of the land. However it seeks to protect itself against these plain inferences, by saying that an unconstitutional law is no law, and that it only opposes such laws as are unconstitutional, yet this does not, in the slightest degree, vary the result; since it insists on deciding this question for itself; and, in opposition to reason and argument, in opposition to practice and experience, in opposition to the judgment of others, having an equal right to judge, it says, only, "Such is my opinion, and my opinion shall be my law, and I will support it by my own strong hand. I denounce the law; I declare it unconstitutional; that is enough; it shall not be executed. Men in arms are ready to resist its execution. An attempt to enforce it shall cover the land with blood. Elsewhere, it may be binding; but here, it is trampled under foot."

This, sir, is practical nullification.

And now, sir, against all these theories and opinions, I maintain—

1. That the constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact, between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities; but a Government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, and creating direct relations between itself and individuals.

2. That no State authority has power to dissolve these relations; that nothing can dissolve them but revolution; and that, consequently, there can be no such thing as secession without revolution.

3. That there is a supreme law, consisting of the constitution of the United States, acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and treaties; and that, in cases not capable of assuming the character of a suit in law or equity, Congress must judge of, and finally interpret, this supreme law, so often as it has occasion to pass acts of legislation; and, in cases capable of assuming, and actually assuming, the character of a suit, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final interpreter.

4. That an attempt by a State to abrogate, annul, or nullify an act of Congress, or to arrest its operation within her limits, on the ground that, in her opinion, such law is unconstitutional, is a direct usurpation on the just powers of the General Government, and on the equal rights of other States; a plain violation of the constitution, and a proceeding essentially revolutionary in its character and tendency.

Whether the constitution be a compact between States in their sovereign capacities, is a question which must be mainly argued from what is contained in the instrument itself. We all agree that it is an instrument which has been, in some way, clothed with power. We all admit that it speaks with authority. The first question then is, what does it say of itself? What does it purport to be? Does it style itself a league, confederacy, or compact between sovereign States? It is to be remembered, sir, that the constitution began to speak only after its adoption. Until it was ratified by nine States, it was but a proposal, the mere draught of an instrument. It was like a deed, drawn, but not executed. The convention had framed it; sent it to Congress, then sitting under the confederation; Congress had transmitted it to the State Legislatures; and by these last it was laid before conventions of the people in the several States. All this while it was inoperative paper. It had received no stamp of authority, no sanction; it spoke no language. But when ratified by the people in their respective conventions, then it had a voice, and spoke authentically. Every word in it had then received the sanction of the popular will, and was to be received as the expression of that will. What the constitution says of itself, therefore, is as conclusive as what it says on any other point. Does it call itself a compact? Certainly not. It uses the word "compact" but once, and that is when it declares that the States shall enter into no compact. Does it call itself a league, a confederacy, a subsisting treaty between the States? Certainly not. There is not a particle of such language in all its pages. But it declares itself a constitution. What is a constitution? Certainly not a league, compact, or confederacy, but a fundamental law. That fundamental regulation which determines the manner in which the public authority is to be executed, is what forms the constitution of a State. Those primary rules which concern the body itself, and the very being of the political society, the form of Government, and the manner in which power is to be exercised; all, in a word, which form together the constitution of a State—these are the fundamental laws. This, sir, is the language of the public writers. But do we need to be informed, in this country, what a constitution is? Is it not an idea perfectly familiar, definite, and well settled? We are at no loss to understand what is meant by the constitution of one of the States; and the constitution of the United States speaks of itself as being an instrument of the same nature. It says, this constitution shall be the law of the land, any thing in any State constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. And it speaks of itself, too, in plain contradistinction from a confederation; for it says that all debts contracted, and all engagements entered into by the United States, shall be as valid under this constitution as under the confederation. It does not say as valid under this compact, or this league, or this confederation, as under the former confederation; but as valid under this constitution.

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

This, then, sir, is declared to be a constitution. A constitution is the fundamental law of the State; and this is expressly declared to be the supreme law. It is as if the people had said, "we prescribe this fundamental law," or "this supreme law," for they do say that they establish this constitution, and that it shall be the supreme law. They say that they ordain and establish it. Now, sir, what is the common application of these words? We do not speak of ordaining leagues and compacts. If this was intended to be a compact or league, and the States to be parties to it, why was it not so said? Why is there found no one expression in the whole instrument indicating such intent? The old confederation was expressly called a league; and into this league it was declared that the States, as States, severally entered. Why was not similar language used in the constitution, if a similar intention had existed? Why was it not said, "the States enter into this new league," "the States form this new confederation," or "the States agree to this new com-compact?" Or, why was it not said, in the language of the gentleman's resolution, that the people of the several States acceded to this compact in their sovereign capacities? What reason is there for supposing that the framers of the constitution rejected expressions appropriate to their own meaning, and adopted others wholly at war with that meaning?

Again, sir, the constitution speaks of that political system which it established as "the Government of the United States." Is it not doing strange violence to language to call a league or a compact between sovereign Powers a Government? The Government of a State is that organization in which the political power resides. It is the political being, created by the constitution or fundamental law. The broad and clear difference between a Government and a league or compact is, that a Government is a body politic; it has a will of its own; and it possesses powers and faculties to execute its own purposes. Every compact looks to some power to enforce its stipulations. Even in a compact between sovereign communities, there always exists this ultimate reference to a power to insure its execution; although, in such case, this power is but the force of one party against the force of another; that is to say, the power of war. But a Government executes its decisions by its own supreme authority. Its use of force, in compelling obedience to its own enactments, is not war. It contemplates no opposing party having a right of resistance. It rests on its own power to enforce its own will; and when it ceases to possess this power, it is no longer a Government.

Mr. President, I concur so generally in the very able speech of the gentleman from Virginia near me, [Mr. Rives,] that it is not without diffidence and regret that I venture to differ with him on any point. His opinions, sir, are redolent of the doctrines of a very distinguished school, for which I have the highest regard, of whose doctrines I can say, what I also can say of the gentleman's speech, that, while I concur in the results, I must be permitted to hesitate about some of the premises. I do not agree that the constitution is a compact between the States in their sovereign capacities. I do not agree that, in strictness of language, it is a compact at all. But I do agree that it is founded on consent, or agreement, or on compact, if the gentleman prefers that word, and means no more by it than voluntary consent or agreement. The constitution, sir, is not a contract, but the result of a contract; meaning, by contract, no more than assent. Founded on consent, it is a Government proper. Adopted by the agreement of the people of the United States, when adopted, it has become a constitution. The people have agreed to make a constitution; but when made, that constitution becomes what its name imports. It is no longer a mere agreement. Our laws, sir, have their foundation in the agreement, or consent, of the two Houses of Congress. We say, habitually, that one House proposes a bill, and the other agrees to it; but the result of this agreement is not a compact, but a law. The law, the statute, is not the agreement, but something created by the agreement; and something which, when created, has a new character, and acts by its own authority. So, the constitution of the United States, founded in or on the consent of the people, may be said to rest on compact or consent; but it is itself not the compact, but its result. When a people agree to erect a Government, and actually erect it, the thing is done, and the agreement is at an end. The compact is executed, and the end designed by it attained. Henceforth, the fruit of the agreement exists, but the agreement itself is merged in its own accomplishment; since there can be no longer a subsisting agreement, or compact, to form a constitution or Government, after that constitution or Government has been actually formed and established.

It appears to me, Mr. President, that the plainest account of the establishment of this Government presents the most just and philosophical view of its foundation. The people of the several States had their separate State Governments; and between the States there also existed a confederation. With this condition of things the people were not satisfied, as the confederation had been found not to fulfil its intended objects. It was proposed, therefore, to erect a new common Government, which should possess certain definite powers, such as regarded the prosperity of the people of all the States; and to be formed upon the general model of American constitutions. This proposal was assented to, and an instrument was presented to the people of the several States for their consideration. They approved it, and agreed to adopt it as a constitution. They executed that agreement; they adopted the constitution, as a constitution; and henceforth it must stand as a constitution until it shall be altogether destroyed. Now, sir, is not this the truth of the whole matter? and is not all that we have heard of compact between sovereign States the mere effect of a theoretical and artificial mode of reasoning upon the subject? a mode of reasoning which disregards plain facts for the sake of hypothesis?

Mr. President, the nature of sovereignty, or sovereign power, has been extensively discussed by gentlemen on this occasion, as it generally is when the origin of our Government is debated. But I confess myself not entirely satisfied with arguments and illustrations drawn from that topic. The sovereignty of Government is an idea belonging to the other side of the Atlantic. No such thing is known in North America. Our Governments are all limited. In Europe sovereignty is of feudal origin, and imports no more than the state of the sovereign. It comprises his rights, duties, exemptions, prerogatives, and powers. But, with us, all power is with the people. They, alone, are sovereign; and they erect what Governments they please, and confer on them such powers as they please. None of these Governments are sovereign, in the European sense of the word, all being restrained by written constitutions. It seems to me, therefore, that we only perplex ourselves when we attempt to explain the relations existing between the General Government and the several State Governments, according to those ideas of sovereignty which prevail under systems essentially different from our own.

But, sir, to return to the constitution itself: let me inquire what it relies upon for its own continuance and support? I hear it often suggested that the States, by refusing to appoint Senators and Electors, might bring this Government to an end. Perhaps that is true, but the same may be said of the State Governments themselves. Suppose the Legislature of a State, having the power to appoint the Governor and the judges, should omit that duty; would not the State Government remain unorganized? No doubt, all elective Governments may be broken up by a general abandonment, on the part of those intrusted with political powers, of their appropriate duties. But one popular Government has, in this respect, as much security as another. The maintenance of this constitution does not depend on the plighted faith of the States, as States, to support it; and this again shows that it is not a league. It relies on individual duty and obligation.

The constitution of the United States creates direct relations between this Government and individuals. This Government may punish individuals for treason, and all other crimes in the code, when committed against the United States. It has power, also, to tax individuals, in any mode, and to any extent; and it possesses the further power of demanding from individuals military service. Nothing, certainly, can more clearly distinguish a Government from a confederation of States, than the possession of these powers. No closer relations can exist between individuals and any Government.

On the other hand, the Government owes high and solemn duties to every citizen of the country. It is bound to protect him in his most important rights and interests. It makes war for his protection, and no other Government in the country can make war. It makes peace for his protection, and no other Government can make peace. It maintains armies and navies for his defence and security, and no other Government is allowed to maintain them. He goes abroad beneath its flag, and carries over all the earth a national character imparted to him by this Government, and which no other Government can impart. In whatever relates to war, to peace, to commerce, he knows no other Government. All these, sir, are connexions as dear and as sacred as can bind individuals to any Government on earth. It is not, therefore, a compact between States, but a Government proper, operating directly upon individuals, yielding to them protection on the one hand, and demanding from them obedience on the other.

There is no language in the whole constitution applicable to a confederation of States. If the States be parties, as States, what are their rights, and what their respective covenants and stipulations? And where are their rights, covenants, and stipulations expressed? The States engage for nothing, they promise nothing. In the articles of confederation they did make promises, and did enter into engagements, and did plight the faith of each State for their fulfilment; but in the constitution there is nothing of that kind. The reason is, that in the constitution it is the people who speak, and not the States. The people ordain the constitution, and therein address themselves to the States, and to the Legislatures of the States, in the language of injunction and prohibition. The constitution utters its behests in the name and by the authority of the people, and it exacts not from States any plighted public faith to maintain it. On the contrary, it makes its own preservation depend on individual duty and individual obligation. Sir, the States cannot omit to appoint Senators and Electors. It is not a matter resting in State discretion or State pleasure. The constitution has taken better care of its own preservation. It lays its hand on individual conscience and individual duty. It incapacitates any man to sit in the Legislature of a State, who shall not first have taken a solemn oath to support the constitution of the United States. From the obligation of this oath no State power can discharge him. All the members of all the State Legislatures are as religiously bound to support the constitution of the United States, as they are to support their own State constitution. Nay, sir, they are as solemnly sworn to support it, as we ourselves are, who are members of Congress.

No member of a State Legislature can refuse to proceed, at the proper time, to elect Senators to Congress, or to provide for the choice of electors of President and Vice-President, any more than the members can refuse, when the appointed day arrives, to meet the members of the other House to count the votes for those officers, and ascertain who are chosen. In both cases the duty binds, and with equal strength, the conscience of the individual member, and it is imposed on all by an oath in the very same words. Let it, then, never be said, sir, that it is a matter of discretion with the States whether they will continue the Government, or break it up by refusing to appoint Senators and elect electors. They have no discretion in the matter. The members of the Legislatures cannot avoid doing either, so often as the time arrives, without a direct violation of their duty and their oaths; such a violation as would break up any other Government.

Looking still further to the provisions of the constitution itself, in order to learn its true character, we find its great apparent purpose to be, to unite the people of all the States under one General Government, for certain definite objects; and, to the extent of this union, to restrain the separate authorities of the States. Congress only can declare war; therefore, when one State is at war with a foreign nation, all must be at war. The President and the Senate only can make peace; when peace is made for one State, therefore, it must be made for all.

Can any thing be conceived more preposterous than that any State should have power to nullify the proceedings of the General Government respecting peace and war? When war is declared by a law of Congress, can a single State nullify that law, and remain at peace? And yet she may nullify that law as well as any other. If the President and Senate make peace, may one State, nevertheless, continue the war? And yet, if she can nullify a law, she may quite as well nullify a treaty.

The truth is, Mr. President, and no ingenuity of argument, no subtlety of distinction, can evade it, that, as to certain purposes, the people of the United States are one people. They are one in making war, and one in making peace; they are one in regulating commerce, and one in laying duties of impost. The very end and purpose of the constitution was to make them one people in these particulars; and it has effectually accomplished its object. All this is apparent on the face of the constitution itself. I have already said, sir, that to obtain a power of direct legislation over the people, especially in regard to imposts, was always prominent as a reason for getting rid of the confederation, and forming a new constitution. Among the innumerable proofs of this, before the assembling of the convention, allow me to refer only to the report of the committee of the old Congress, July, 1785.

But, sir, let us go to the actual formation of the constitution; let us open the journal of the convention itself; and we shall see that the very first resolution which the convention adopted was, "That a National Government ought to be established, consisting of a Supreme Legislature, Judiciary, and Executive."

This, itself, completely negatives all idea of league, and compact, and confederation. Terms could not be chosen more fit to express an intention to establish a National Government, and to banish forever all notion of a compact between sovereign States.

This resolution was adopted on the 30th of May. Afterwards the style was altered, and, instead of being called a National Government, it was called the Government of the United States; but the substance of this resolution was retained, and was at the head of that list of resolutions which was afterwards sent to the committee who were to frame the instrument.

It is true there were gentlemen in the convention who were for retaining the confederation, and amending its articles; but the majority was against this, and was for a National Government. Mr. Patterson's propositions, which were for continuing the articles of confederation with additional powers, were submitted to the convention on the 15th of June, and referred to the Committee of the Whole. And the resolutions forming the basis of a National Government, which had been once agreed to in the Committee of the Whole, and reported, were recommitted to the same committee, on the same day. The convention, then in Committee of the Whole, on the 19th of June, had both these plans before them; that is to say, the plan of a confederacy, or compact between States, and the plan of a National Government. Both these plans were considered and debated, and the committee reported, "That they do not agree to the proposition offered by the honorable Mr. Patterson, but that they again submit the resolutions formerly reported." If, sir, any historical fact in the world be plain and undeniable, it is that the convention deliberated on the expediency of continuing the confederation, with some amendments, and rejected that scheme, and adopted the plan of a National Government, with a Legislature, an Executive, and a Judiciary of its own. They were asked to preserve the league; they rejected the proposition.

They were asked to continue the existing compact between States; they rejected it. They rejected compact, league, and confederation, and set themselves about framing the constitution of a National Government; and they accomplished what they undertook.

If men will open their eyes fairly to the lights of history, it is impossible to be deceived on this point. The great object was to supersede the confederation by a regular Government; because, under the confederation, Congress had power only to make requisitions on States; and if States declined compliance, as they did, there was no remedy but war against such delinquent States. It would seem, from Mr. Jefferson's correspondence, in 1786 and 1787, that he was of opinion that even this remedy ought to be tried. "There will be no money in the treasury," said he, "till the confederacy shows its teeth;" and he suggests that a single frigate would soon levy on the commerce of a delinquent State the deficiency of its contribution. But this would be war; and it was evident that a confederacy could not long hold together which should be at war with its members. The constitution was adopted to avoid this necessity. It was adopted that there might be a Government which should act directly on individuals, without borrowing aid from the State Governments. This is clear as light itself on the very face of the provisions of the constitution, and its whole history tends to the same conclusion. Its framers gave this very reason for their work in the most distinct terms. Allow me to quote but one or two proofs out of hundreds. That State, so small in territory, but so distinguished for learning and talent, Connecticut, had sent to the general convention, among other members, Samuel Johnson and Oliver Ellsworth. The constitution having been framed, it was submitted to a convention of the people of Connecticut for ratification on the part of that State, and Mr. Johnson and Mr. Ellsworth were also members of this convention. On the first day of the debates, being called on to explain the reasons which led the convention at Philadelphia to recommend such a constitution, after showing the insufficiency of the existing confederacy, inasmuch as it applied to States, as States, Mr. Johnson proceeded to say:

"The convention saw this imperfection in attempting to legislate for States in their political capacity; that the coercion of law can be exercised by nothing but a military force. They have, therefore, gone upon entirely new ground. They have formed one new nation out of the individual States. The constitution vests in the General Legislature a power to make laws in matters of national concern; to appoint judges to decide upon these laws; and to appoint officers to carry them into execution. This excludes the idea of an armed force. The power which is to enforce these laws is to be a legal power, vested in proper magistrates. The force which is to be employed is the energy of the law; and this force is to operate only upon individuals who fail in their duty to their country. This is the peculiar glory of the constitution, that it depends upon the mild and equal energy of the magistracy for the execution of the laws."

In the further course of the debate, Mr. Ellsworth said—

"In republics, it is a fundamental principle that the majority govern, and that the minority comply with the general voice. How contrary, then, to republican principles, how humiliating, is our present situation! A single State can rise up and put a veto upon the most important public measures. We have seen this actually take place: a single State has controlled the general voice of the Union; a minority, a very small minority, has governed us. So far is this from being consistent with republican principles, that it is, in effect, the worst species of monarchy."

"Hence we see how necessary for the Union is a coercive principle. No man pretends the contrary. We all see and feel this necessity. The only question is, shall it be a coercion of law, or a coercion of arms? There is no other possible alternative. Where will those who oppose a coercion of law come out? Where will they end? A necessary consequence of their principles is a war of the States one against another. I am for coercion by law; that coercion which acts only upon delinquent individuals. This constitution does not attempt to coerce sovereign bodies, States, in their political capacity. No coercion is applicable to such bodies, but that of an armed force. If we should attempt to execute the laws of the Union by sending an armed force against a delinquent State, it would involve the good and bad, the innocent and guilty, in the same calamity. But this legal coercion singles out the guilty individual, and punishes him for breaking the laws of the Union."

Indeed, sir, if we look to all cotemporary history, to the writings of the Federalist, to the debates in the conventions, to the publications of friends and foes, they all agree that a change had been made from a confederacy of States to a different system; they all agree that the convention had formed a constitution for a National Government. With this result some were satisfied, and some were dissatisfied; but all admitted that the thing had been done. In none of these various productions and publications did any one intimate that the new constitution was but another compact between States, in their sovereign capacities. I do not find such an opinion advanced in a single instance. Every where the people were told that the old confederation was to be abandoned, and a new system to be tried; that a proper Government was proposed, to be founded in the name of the people, and to have a regular organization of its own. Every where the people were told that it was to be a Government with direct powers to make laws over individuals, and to lay taxes and imposts, without the consent of the States. Every where it was understood to be a popular constitution. It came to the people for their adoption, and was to rest on the same deep foundation as the State constitutions themselves. Its most distinguished advocates, who had been themselves members of the convention, declared that the very object of submitting the constitution to the people was, to preclude the possibility of its being regarded as a mere compact. "However gross a heresy," say the writers of the Federalist, "it may be to maintain that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact, the doctrine itself has had respectable advocates. The possibility of a question of this nature proves the necessity of laying the foundations of our National Government deeper than in the mere sanction of delegated authority. The fabric of American empire ought to rest on the solid basis of the consent of the people."

Such is the language, sir, addressed to the people, while they yet had the constitution under consideration. The powers conferred on the new Government were perfectly well understood to be conferred, not by any State, or the people of any State, but by the people of the United States. Virginia is more explicit, perhaps, in this particular, than any other State. Her convention, assembled to ratify the constitution, "in the name and behalf of the people of Virginia, declare and make known, that the powers granted under the constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, may be resumed by them whenever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression."

Is this language which describes the formation of a compact between States, or language describing the grant of powers to a new Government, by the whole people of the United States?

Among all the other ratifications, there is not one which speaks of the constitution as a compact between States. Those of Massachusetts and New Hampshire express the transaction, in my opinion, with sufficient accuracy. They recognise the Divine goodness "in affording the people of the United States an opportunity of entering into an explicit and solemn compact with each other, by assenting to and ratifying a new constitution." You will observe, sir, that it is the people, and not the States, who have entered into this compact, and it is the people of all the United States. These conventions, by this form of expression, meant merely to say that the people of the United States had, by the blessing of Providence, enjoyed the opportunity of establishing a new constitution, founded in the consent of the people. This consent of the people has been called by European writers "the social compact;" and, in conformity to this common mode of expression, these conventions speak of that assent, on which the new constitution was to rest, as an explicit and solemn compact, not which the States had entered into with each other, but which the people of the United States had entered into.

Finally, sir, how can any man get over the words of the constitution itself? "We, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this constitution." These words must cease to be part of the constitution, they must be obliterated from the parchment on which they are written, before any human ingenuity or human argument can remove the popular basis on which that constitution rests, and turn the instrument into a mere compact between sovereign States.

The second proposition, sir, which I propose to maintain, is, that no State authority can dissolve the relations subsisting between the Government of the United States and individuals; that nothing can dissolve these relations but revolution; and that, therefore, there can be no such thing as secession without revolution. All this follows, as it seems to me, as a just consequence, if it be first proved that the constitution of the United States is a Government proper, owing protection to individuals, and entitled to their obedience.

The people, sir, in every State, live under two Governments. They owe obedience to both. These Governments, though distinct, are not adverse. Each has its separate sphere, and its peculiar powers and duties. It is not a contest between two sovereigns for the same power, like the wars of the rival houses in England; nor is it a dispute between a Government de facto and a Government de jure. It is the case of a division of powers between two Governments, made by the people, to which both are responsible. Neither can dispense with the duty which individuals owe to the other; neither can call itself master of the other; the people are masters of both. This division of power, it is true, is in a great measure unknown in Europe. It is the peculiar system of America; and, though new and singular, it is not incomprehensible. The State constitutions are established by the people of the States. This constitution is established by the people of all the States. How, then, can a State secede? How can a State undo what the whole people have done? How can she absolve her citizens from their obedience to the laws of the United States? How can she annul their obligations and oaths? How can the members of her Legislature renounce their own oaths? Sir, secession, as a revolutionary right, is intelligible; as a right to be proclaimed amidst civil commotions, and asserted at the head of armies, I can understand it. But as a practical right, existing under the constitution, and in conformity with its provisions, it seems to me to be nothing but a plain absurdity; for it supposes resistance to Government, under the authority of Government itself; it supposes dismemberment, without violating the principles of union; it supposes opposition to law, without crime; it supposes the violation of oaths, without responsibility; it supposes the total overthrow of Government, without revolution.

The constitution, sir, regards itself as perpetual and immortal. It seeks to establish a union among the people of the States, which shall last through all time. Or, if the common fate of things human must be expected, at some period, to happen to it, yet that catastrophe is not anticipated.

Revenue Collection Bill.

The instrument contains ample provisions for its amendment, at all times; none for its abandonment, at any time. It declares that new States may come into the Union, but it does not declare that old States may go out. The Union is not a temporary partnership of States. It is the association of the people, under a constitution of Government, uniting their power, joining together their highest interests, cementing their present enjoyments, and blending, in one indivisible mass, all their hopes for the future. Whatsoever is steadfast in just political principles, whatsoever is permanent in the structure of human society, whatsoever there is which can derive an enduring character from being founded on deep laid principles of constitutional liberty, and on the broad foundations of the public will—all these unite to entitle this instrument to be regarded as a permanent constitution of Government.

In the next place, Mr. President, I contend that there is a supreme law of the land, consisting of the constitution, acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and the public treaties. This will not be denied, because such are the very words of the constitution. But I contend further, that it rightfully belongs to Congress, and to the courts of the United States, to settle the construction of this supreme law, in doubtful cases. This is denied: and here arises the great practical question, who is to construe finally the constitution of the United States? We all agree that the constitution is the supreme law; but who shall interpret that law? In our system of the division of powers between different Governments, controversies will necessarily sometimes arise respecting the extent of the powers of each. Who shall decide these controversies? Does it rest with the General Government, in all or any of its departments, to exercise the office of final interpreter? Or may each of the States, as well as the General Government, claim this right of ultimate decision? The practical result of this whole debate turns on this point. The gentleman contends that each State may judge for itself of any alleged violation of the constitution, and may finally decide for itself, and may execute its own decisions by its own power. All the recent proceedings in South Carolina are founded on this claim of right. Her convention has pronounced the revenue laws of the United States unconstitutional; and this decision she does not allow any authority of the United States to overrule or reverse. Of course, she rejects the authority of Congress, because the very object of the ordinance is to reverse the decision of Congress; and she rejects, too, the authority of the courts of the United States, because she expressly prohibits all appeal to those courts. It is in order to sustain this asserted right of being her own judge, that she pronounces the constitution of the United States to be but a compact, to which she is a party, and a sovereign party. If this be established, then the inference is supposed to follow, that, being sovereign, there is no power to control her decision, and her own judgment on her own compact is and must be conclusive.

I have already endeavored, sir, to point out the practical consequences of this doctrine, and to show how utterly inconsistent it is with all ideas of regular government, and how soon its adoption would involve the whole country in revolution and absolute anarchy. I hope it is easy now to show, sir, that a doctrine, bringing such consequences with it, is not well founded; that it has nothing to stand upon but theory and assumption; and that it is refuted by plain and express constitutional provisions. I think the Government of the United States does possess, in its appropriate departments, the authority of final decision on questions of disputed power. I think it possesses this authority, both by necessary implication and by express grant.

It will not be denied, sir, that this authority naturally belongs to all Governments. They all exercise it from necessity, and as a consequence of the exercise of other powers. The State Governments themselves possess it, except in that class of questions which may arise between them and the General Government, and in regard to which they have surrendered it, as well by the nature of the case as by clear constitutional provisions. In other and ordinary cases, whether a particular law be in conformity to the constitution of the State, is a question which the State Legislature or the State Judiciary must determine. We all know that these questions arise daily in the State Governments, and are decided by those Governments; and I know no Government which does not exercise a similar power.

Upon general principles, then, the Government of the United States possesses this authority; and this would hardly be denied, were it not that there are other Governments. But since there are State Governments, and since these, like other Governments, ordinarily construe their own powers, if the Government of the United States construes its own powers also, which construction is to prevail, in the case of opposite constructions? And again, as in the case now actually before us, the State Government may undertake, not only to construe their own powers, but to decide directly on the extent of the powers of Congress. Congress has passed a law, as being within its just powers; South Carolina denies that this law is within its just powers, and insists that she has the right so to decide this point, and that her decision is final. How are these questions to be settled?

In my opinion, sir, even if the constitution of the United States had made no express provision for such cases, it would yet be difficult to maintain that, in a constitution existing over four-and-twenty States, with equal authority over all, one could claim a right of construing it for the whole. This would seem a manifest impropriety; indeed, an absurdity. If the constitution is a Government existing over all the States, though with limited powers, it necessarily follows that, to the extent of those powers, it must be supreme. If it be not superior to the authority of a particular State, it is not a National Government. But as it is a Government, as it has a legislative power of its own, and a judicial power co-extensive with the legislative, the inference is irresistible, that this Government, thus created by the whole and for the whole, must have an authority superior to that of the particular Government of any one part. Congress is the Legislature of all the people of the United States; the Judiciary of the General Government is the Judiciary of all the people of the United States. To hold, therefore, that this Legislature and this Judiciary are subordinate in authority to the Legislature and Judiciary of a single State, is doing violence to all common sense, and overturning all established principles. Congress must judge of the extent of its own powers, so often as it is called on to exercise them, or it cannot act at all; and it must act also independent of State control, or it cannot act at all.

The right of State interposition strikes at the very foundation of the legislative power of Congress. It possesses no effective legislative power, if such right of State interposition exists; because it can pass no law not subject to abrogation. It cannot make laws for the Union, if any part of the Union may pronounce its enactments void and of no effect. Its forms of legislation would be an idle ceremony, if, after all, any one of four-and-twenty States might bid defiance to its authority. Without express provision in the constitution, therefore, sir, this whole question is necessarily decided by those provisions which create a legislative power and a judicial power. If these exist in a Government intended for the whole, the inevitable consequence is, that the laws of this legislative power, and the decisions of this judicial power, must be binding on and over the whole. No man can form the conception of a Government existing over four-and-twenty States, with a regular legislative and judicial power, and of the existence, at the same time, of an authority, residing elsewhere, to resist, at pleasure or discretion, the enactments and the decisions of such a Government. I maintain, therefore, sir, that, from the nature of the case, and as an inference wholly unavoidable, the acts of Congress, and the decisions of the national courts, must be of higher authority than State laws and State decisions. If this be not so, there is, there can be, no General Government.

But, Mr. President, the constitution has not left this cardinal point without full and explicit provisions. First, as to the authority of Congress. Having enumerated the specific powers conferred on Congress, the constitution adds, as a distinct and substantive clause, the following, viz: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." If this means any thing, it means that Congress may judge of the true extent and just interpretation of the specific powers granted to it; and may judge also of what is necessary and proper for executing those powers. If Congress is to judge of what is necessary for the execution of its powers, it must, of necessity, judge of the extent and interpretation of those powers.

And in regard, sir, to the Judiciary, the constitution is still more express and emphatic. It declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the constitution, laws of the United States, and treaties; that there shall be one Supreme Court; and that this Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction of all these cases, subject to such exceptions as Congress may make. It is impossible to escape from the generality of these words. If a case arises under the constitution, that is, if a case arises depending on the construction of the constitution, the judicial power of the United States extends to it. It reaches the case, the question; it attaches the power of the national judicature to the case itself, in whatever court it may arise or exist; and in this case the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction over all courts whatever. No language could provide, with more effect and precision than is here done, for subjecting constitutional questions to the ultimate decision of the Supreme Court. And, sir, this is exactly what the convention found it necessary to provide for, and intended to provide for. It is, too, exactly what the people were universally told was done, when they adopted the constitution. One of the first resolutions adopted by the convention was in these words, viz: "That the jurisdiction of the National Judiciary shall extend to cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony." Now, sir, this either had no sensible meaning at all, or else it meant that the jurisdiction of the National Judiciary should extend to these questions with a paramount authority. It is not to be supposed that the convention intended that the power of the National Judiciary should extend to these questions, and that the judicatures of the States should also extend to them with equal power of final decision. This would be to defeat the whole object of the provision. There were thirteen judicatures already in existence. The evil complained of, or the danger to be guarded against, was contradiction and repugnance in the decisions of these judicatures. If the framers of the constitution meant to create a fourteenth, and yet not to give it power to revise and control the decisions of the existing thirteen, then they only intended to augment the existing evil and the apprehended danger, by increasing still further the chances of discordant judgments. Why, sir, has it become a settled axiom in politics, that every Government must have a judicial power co-extensive with its legislative power? Certainly, there is only this reason, viz: that the laws may receive a uniform interpretation and a uniform execution. This object can be no otherwise attained. A statute is what it is judiciously interpreted to be; and if it be construed one way in New Hampshire, and another way in Georgia, there is no uniform law. One Supreme Court, with appellate and final jurisdiction, is the natural and only adequate means, in any Government, to secure this uniformity. The convention saw all this clearly; and the resolution which I have quoted, never afterwards rescinded, passed through various modifications, till it finally received the form which the article now wears in the constitution. It is undeniably true, then, that the framers of the constitution intended to create a national judicial power, which should be permanent, on national subjects. And after the constitution was framed, and while the whole country was engaged in discussing its merits, one of its most distinguished advocates (Mr. Madison) told the people that it was true that, in controversies relating to the boundary between the two jurisdictions, the tribunal which is ultimately to decide is to be established under the General Government. Mr. Martin, who had been a member of the convention, asserted the same thing to the Legislature of Maryland, and urged it as a reason for rejecting the constitution. Mr. Pinckney himself, also a leading member of the convention, declared it to the people of South Carolina. Every where it was admitted, by friends and foes, that this power was in the constitution. By some it was thought dangerous, by most it was thought necessary; but by all it was agreed to be a power actually contained in the instrument. The convention saw the absolute necessity of some control in the National Government over State laws. Different modes of establishing this control were suggested and considered. At one time it was proposed that the laws of the States should, from time to time, be laid before Congress, and that Congress should possess a negative over them. But this was thought inexpedient and inadmissible; and in its place, and expressly as a substitute for it, the existing provision was introduced; that is to say, a provision by which the federal courts should have authority to overrule such State laws as might be in manifest contravention of the constitution. The writers of the Federalist, in explaining the constitution, while it was yet pending before the people, and still unadopted, give this account of the matter in terms, and assign this reason for the article as it now stands. By this provision, Congress escaped from the necessity of any revision of State laws, left the whole sphere of State legislation quite untouched, and yet obtained a security against any infringement of the constitutional power of the General Government. Indeed, sir, allow me to ask again, if the National Judiciary was not to exercise a power of revision, on constitutional questions, over the judicatures of the States, why was any national judicature erected at all? Can any man give a sensible reason for having a judicial power in this Government, unless it be for the sake of maintaining a uniformity of decision on questions arising under the constitution and laws of Congress, and insuring its execution? And does not this very idea of uniformity necessarily imply that the construction given by the national courts is to be the prevailing construction? How else, sir, is it possible that uniformity can be preserved?

Gentlemen appear to me, sir, to look at but one side of the question. They regard only the supposed danger of trusting a Government with the interpretation of its own powers. But will they view the question in its other aspect? will they show us how it is possible for a Government to get along with four-and-twenty interpreters of its laws and powers? Gentlemen argue, too, as if, in these cases, the State would be always right, and the General Government always wrong. But suppose the reverse; suppose the State wrong, and, since they differ, some of them must be wrong; are the most important and essential operations of the Government to be embarrassed and arrested because one State holds a contrary opinion? Mr. President, every argument which refers the constitutionality of acts of Congress to State decision, appeals from the majority to the minority; it appeals from a common interest to a particular interest; from the counsels of all to the counsel of one; and endeavors to supersede the judgment of the whole by the judgment of a part.

I think it is clear, sir, that the constitution, by express provision, by definite and unequivocal words, as well as by necessary implication, has constituted the Supreme Court of the United States the appellate tribunal in all cases of a constitutional nature which assume the shape of a suit in law or equity. And I think I cannot do better than to leave this part of the subject by reading the remarks made upon it by Mr. Ellsworth, in the convention of Connecticut; a gentleman, sir, who has left behind him, on the records of the Government of his country, proofs of the clearest intelligence and of the deepest sagacity, as well as of the utmost purity and integrity of character. "This constitution," says he, "defines the extent of the powers of the General Government. If the General Legislature should at any time overleap its limits, the Judicial department is a constitutional check. If the United States go beyond their powers, if they make a law which the constitution does not authorize, it is void; and the Judiciary power, the national judges, who, to secure their impartiality are to be made independent, will declare it to be void. On the other hand, if the States go beyond their limits, if they make a law which is a usurpation upon the General Government, the law is void; and upright, independent judges will declare it to be so."

And let me only add, sir, that in the very first session of the first Congress, with all the well-known objects both of the convention and the people full and fresh in his mind, Mr. Ellsworth reported the bill, as is generally understood, for the organization of the Judicial department; and, in that bill, made provision for the exercise of this appellate power of the Supreme Court, in all the proper cases, in whatsoever court arising; and that this appellate power has now been exercised for more than forty years, without interruption, and without doubt.

As to the cases, sir, which do not come before the courts; those political questions which terminate with the enactments of Congress, it is of necessity that these should be ultimately decided by Congress itself. Like other Legislatures, it must be trusted with this power. The members of Congress are chosen by the people, and they are answerable to the people; like other public agents, they are bound by oath to support the constitution. These are the securities that they will not violate their duty, or transcend their powers. They are the same securities as prevail in other popular Governments; nor is it easy to see how grants of power can be more safely guarded, without rendering them nugatory. If the case cannot come before the courts, and if Congress be not trusted with its decision, who shall decide it? The gentleman says, each State is to decide it for herself. If so, then, as I have already urged, what is law in one State is not law in the other. Or, if the resistance of one State compels an entire repeal of the law, then a minority, and that a small one, governs the whole country.

Sir, those who espouse the doctrines of nullification, reject, as it seems to me, the first great principle of all republican liberty; that is, that the majority must govern. In matters of common concern, the judgment of a majority must stand as the judgment of the whole. This is a law imposed on us by the absolute necessity of the case; and if we do not act upon it, there is no possibility of maintaining any Government but despotism. We hear loud and repeated denunciations against what is called "majority Government." It is declared with much warmth, that a "majority Government" cannot be maintained in the United States. What, then, do gentlemen wish? Do they wish to establish a minority Government? Do they wish to subject the will of the many to the will of the few? The honorable gentleman from South Carolina has spoken of absolute majorities, and majorities concurrent; language wholly unknown to our constitution, and to which it is not easy to affix definite ideas. As far as I understand it, it would teach us that the "absolute majority" may be found in Congress, but the "majority concurrent" must be looked for in the States. That is to say, sir, stripping the matter of this novelty of phrase, that the dissent of one or more States, as States, renders void the decision of a majority of Congress, so far as that State is concerned. And so this doctrine, running but a short career, like other dogmas of the day, terminates in nullification.

If this vehement invective against majorities meant no more than that, in the construction of Government, it is wise to provide checks and balances, so that there should be various limitations on the power of the mere majority, it would only mean what the constitution of the United States has already abundantly provided. It is full of such checks and balances. In its very organization it adopts a broad and most effectual principle, in restraint of the power of mere majorities. A majority of the people elects the House of Representatives, but it does not elect the Senate. The Senate is elected by the States, each State having, in this respect, an equal power. No law, therefore, can pass without the assent of a majority of the representatives of the people, and a majority of the representatives of the States also. A majority of the representatives of the people must concur, and a majority of the States must concur, in every act of Congress; and the President is elected on a plan compounded of both these principles. But, having composed one House of Representatives chosen by the people in each State, according to its numbers, and the other of an equal number of members from every State, whether larger or smaller, the constitution gives to majorities in these Houses, thus constituted, the full and entire power of passing laws, subject always to the constitutional restrictions, and to the approval of the President. To subject them to any other power is clear usurpation. The majority of one House may be controlled by the majority of the other; and both may be restrained by the President's negative. These are checks and balances provided by the constitution, existing in the Government itself, and wisely intended to secure deliberation and caution in legislative proceedings. But to resist the will of the majority in both Houses, thus constitutionally exercised; to insist on the lawfulness of interposition by an extraneous power; to claim the right of defeating the will of Congress, by setting up against it the will of a single State, is neither more nor less, as it strikes me, than a plain attempt to overthrow the Government. The constituted authorities of the United States are no longer a Government, if they be not masters of their own will; they are no longer a Government, if an external power may arrest their proceedings; they are no longer a Government, if acts passed by both Houses, and approved by the President, may be nullified by State vetoes or State ordinances. Does any one suppose it could make any difference, as to the binding authority of an act of Congress, and of the duty of a State to respect it, whether it passed by a mere majority of both Houses, or by three-fourths of each, or the unanimous vote of each? Within the limits and restrictions of the constitution, the Government of the United States, like all other popular Governments, acts by majorities. It can act no other-wise. Whoever, therefore, denounces the Government of majorities denounces the Government of his own country, and denounces all free Governments. And whoever would restrain these majorities, while acting within their constitutional limits, by an external power, whatever he may intend, asserts principles which, if adopted, can lead to nothing else than the destruction of the Government itself.

Does not the gentleman perceive, sir, how his argument against majorities might here be retorted upon him? Does he not see how cogently he might be asked, whether it be the character of nullification to practise what it preaches? Look to South Carolina, at the present moment. How far are the rights of minorities there respected? I confess, sir, I have not known, in peaceable times, the power of the majority carried with a higher hand, or upheld with more relentless disregard of the rights, feelings, and principles of the minority: a minority embracing, as the gentleman himself will admit, a large portion of the worth and respectability of the State; a minority, comprehending in its numbers men who have been associated with him and with us in these halls of legislation; men who have served their country at home, and honored it abroad; men who would cheerfully lay down their lives for their native State, in any cause which they could regard as the cause of honor and duty; men above fear and above reproach; whose deepest grief and distress spring from the conviction that the present proceedings of the State must ultimately reflect discredit upon her: how is this minority, how are these men regarded? They are enthralled and disfranchised by ordinances and acts of legislation, subjected to tests and oaths, incompatible, as they conscientiously think, with oaths already taken, and obligations already assumed; they are proscribed and denounced as recreants to duty and patriotism, and slaves to a foreign Power; both the spirit which pursues them, and the positive measures which emanate from that spirit, are harsh and proscriptive beyond all precedent within my knowledge, except in periods of professed revolution.

It is not, sir, one would think, for those who approve these proceedings, to complain of the power of majorities.

Mr. President, all popular Governments rest on two principles, or two assumptions:

First, That there is, so far, a common interest among those over whom the Government extends, as that it may provide for the defence, protection, and good government of the whole, without injustice or oppression to parts.

Second, That the representatives of the people, and especially the people themselves, are secure against general corruption, and may be trusted, therefore, with the exercise of power. Whoever argues against these principles, argues against the practicability of all free Governments. And whoever admits these, must admit, or cannot deny, that power is as safe in the hands of Congress as in those of other representative bodies. Congress is not irresponsible. Its members are agents of the people, elected by them, answerable to them, and liable to be displaced or superseded at their pleasure; and they possess as fair a claim to the confidence of the people, while they continue to deserve it, as any other public political agents.

If, then, sir, the plain intention of the convention, and the cotemporary admission of both friends and foes, prove any thing; if the plain text of the instrument itself, as well as the necessary implication from other provisions, prove any thing; if the early legislation of Congress, the course of judicial decisions, acquiesced in by all the States for forty years, prove any thing, then it is proved that there is a supreme law, and a final interpreter.

My fourth and last proposition, Mr. President, was, that any attempt by a State to abrogate or nullify acts of Congress, is a usurpation on the powers of the General Government, and on the equal rights of other States—a violation of the constitution, and a proceeding essentially revolutionary. This is undoubtedly true, if the preceding propositions be regarded as proved. If the Government of the United States be trusted with the duty, in any department, of declaring the extent of its own powers, then a State ordinance, or act of legislation, authorizing resistance to an act of Congress, on the alleged ground of its unconstitutionality, is manifestly a usurpation upon its powers.

If the States have equal rights in matters concerning the whole, then for one State to set up her judgment against the judgment of the rest, and to insist on executing that judgment by force, is also a manifest usurpation on the rights of other States.

If the constitution of the United States be a Government proper, with authority to pass laws, and to give them a uniform interpretation and execution, then the interposition of a State to enforce her own construction, and to resist, as to herself, that law which binds the other States, is a violation of the constitution.

And if that be revolutionary which arrests the legislative, executive, and judicial power of Government, dispenses with existing oaths and obligations of obedience, and elevates another power to supreme dominion, then nullification is revolutionary. Or, if that be revolutionary, the natural tendency and practical effect of which is to break the Union into fragments, to sever all connexion among the people of the respective States, and to prostrate this General Government in the dust, then nullification is revolutionary.

Nullification, sir, is as distinctly revolutionary as secession; but I cannot say that the revolution which it seeks is one of so respectable a character. Secession would, it is true, abandon the constitution altogether; but then it would profess to abandon it. Whatever other inconsistencies it might run into, one, at least, it would avoid. It would not belong to a Government, while it rejected its authority. It would not repel the burden, and continue to enjoy the benefits. It would not aid in passing laws which others are to obey, and yet reject their authority as to itself. It would not undertake to reconcile obedience to public authority, with an asserted right of command over that same authority. It would not be in the Government, and above the Government, at the same time. But however more respectable a mode of secession may be, it is not more truly revolutionary than the actual execution of the doctrines of nullification. Both, and each, resist the constitutional authorities; both, and each, would sever the Union, and subvert the Government.

Mr. President, having detained the Senate so long already, I will not now examine, at length, the ordinance and laws of South Carolina. These papers are well drawn for their purpose. Their authors understood their own objects. They are called a peaceable remedy, and we have been told that South Carolina, after all, intends nothing but a law-suit. A very few words, sir, will show the nature of this peaceable remedy, and of the law-suit which South Carolina contemplates.

In the first place, the ordinance declares the law of last July, and all other laws of the United States laying duties, to be absolutely null and void, and makes it unlawful for the constituted authorities of the United States to enforce the payment of such duties. It is, therefore, sir, an indictable offence, at this moment, in South Carolina, for any person to be concerned in collecting revenue, under the laws of the United States. It being declared unlawful to collect these duties by what is considered a fundamental law of the State, an indictment lies, of course, against any one concerned in such collection; and he is, on general principles, liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment. The terms, it is true, are, that it is unlawful "to enforce the payment of duties;" but every custom-house officer enforces payment when he detains the goods in order to obtain such payment. The ordinance, therefore, reaches every body concerned in the collection of the duties.

This is the first step in the prosecution of the peaceable remedy. The second is more decisive. By the act commonly called the replevin law, any person, whose goods are seized or detained by the collector for the payment of duties, may sue out a writ of replevin, and, by virtue of that writ, the goods are to be restored to him. A writ of replevin is a writ which the sheriff is bound to execute, and for the execution of which he is bound to employ force, if necessary. He may call out the posse, and must do so, if resistance be made. This posse may be armed or unarmed. It may come forth with military array, and under the lead of military men. Whatever number of troops may be assembled in Charleston, they may be summoned, with the Governor or commander-in-chief at their head, to come in aid of the sheriff. It is evident then, sir, that the whole military power of the State is to be employed, whenever necessary, in dispossessing the custom-house officers, and in seizing and holding the goods without paying the duties. This is the second step in the peaceable remedy.

Sir, whatever pretences may be set up to the contrary, this is the direct application of force, and of military force. It is unlawful, in itself, to replevy goods in the custody of the collectors. But this unlawful act is to be done, and it is to be done by power. Here is a plain interposition, by physical force, to resist the laws of the Union. The legal mode of collecting duties is to detain goods till such duties are paid or secured. But force comes and overpowers the collector and his assistants, and takes away the goods, leaving the duties unpaid. There cannot be a clearer case of forcible resistance to law. And it is provided that the goods thus seized shall be held against any attempt to retake them, by the same force which seized them.

Having thus dispossessed the officers of the Government of the goods, without payment of duties, and seized and secured them by the strong arm of the State, only one thing more remained to be done, and that is, to cut off all possibility of legal redress; and that, too, is accomplished, or thought to be accomplished. The ordinance decrees, that all judicial proceedings founded on the revenue laws (including, of course, proceedings in the courts of the United States) shall be null and void. This nullifies the judicial power of the United States. Then comes the test oath act. This requires all State judges and jurors in the State courts to swear that they will execute the ordinance, and all acts of the Legislature passed in pursuance thereof. The ordinance declares that no appeal shall be allowed from the decision of the State courts to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the replevin act makes it an indictable offence for any clerk to furnish a copy of the record, for the purpose of such appeal.

The two principal provisions on which South Carolina relies, to resist the laws of the United States, and nullify the authority of this Government, are, therefore, these:

1. A forcible seizure of goods before the duties are paid or secured, by the power of the State, civil and military.
2. The taking away, by the most effectual means in her power, of all legal redress in the courts of the United States; the confining all judicial proceedings to her own State tribunals; and the compelling of her judges and jurors of these her own courts to take an oath beforehand that they will decide all cases according to the ordinance, and the acts passed under it; that is, that they will decide the cause one way. They do not swear to try it on its own merits; they only swear to decide it as nullification requires.

The character, sir, of these provisions defies comment. Their object is as plain as their means are extraordinary. They propose direct resistance, by the whole power of the State, to laws of Congress; to cut off, by methods deemed adequate, any redress by legal and judicial authority. They arrest legislation, defy the executive, and banish the judicial power of this Government. They authorize and command acts to be done, and done by force, both of numbers and of arms, which, if done, and done by force, are clearly acts of rebellion and treason.

Such, sir, are the laws of South Carolina; such, sir, is the peaceable remedy of nullification. Has not nullification reached, sir, even thus early, that point of direct and forcible resistance to law, to which I intimated, three years ago, it plainly tended?

And now, Mr. President, what is the reason for passing laws like these? What are the oppressions experienced under the Union, calling for measures which thus threaten to sever and destroy it? What invasions of public liberty, what ruin to private happiness, what long list of rights violated, or wrongs unredressed, are to justify to the country, to posterity, and to the world, this assault upon the free constitution of the United States, this great and glorious work of our fathers? At this very moment, sir, the whole land smiles in peace, and rejoices in plenty. A general and a high prosperity pervades the country; and, judging by the common standard, by increase of population and wealth; or judging by the opinions of that portion of her people not embarked in those dangerous and desperate measures, this prosperity overspreads South Carolina herself.

Thus, happy at home, our country, at the same time, holds high the character of her institutions, her power, her rapid growth, and her future destiny, in the eyes of all foreign States. One danger only creates hesitation; one doubt only exists to darken the otherwise unclouded brightness of that aspect, which she exhibits to the view and to the admiration of the world. Need I say that that doubt respects the permanency of our Union? and need I say that that doubt is now caused, more than by any thing else, by these very proceedings of South Carolina? Sir, all Europe is, at this moment, beholding us, and looking for the issue of this controversy; those who hate free institutions, with malignant hope; those who love them, with deep anxiety and shivering fear.

The cause, then, sir, the cause! Let the world know the cause which has thus induced one State of the Union to bid defiance to the power of the whole, and openly to talk of secession.

Sir, the world will scarcely believe that this whole controversy, and all the desperate measures which its support requires, have no other foundation than a difference of opinion, upon a provision of the constitution, between a majority of the people of South Carolina, on one side, and a vast majority of the whole people of the United States on the other. It will not credit the fact, it will not admit the possibility, that, in an enlightened age, in a free, popular republic, under a Government where the people govern, as they must always govern, under such systems, by majorities, at a time of unprecedented happiness, without practical oppression, without evils, such as may not only be pretended, but felt and experienced; evils not slight or temporary, but deep, permanent, and intolerable; a single State should rush into conflict with all the rest, attempt to put down the power of the Union by her own laws, and to support those laws by her military power, and thus break up and destroy the world's last hope. And well the world may be incredulous. We, who hear and see it, can ourselves hardly yet believe it. Even after all that had preceded it, this ordinance struck the country with amazement. It was incredible and inconceivable, that South Carolina should thus plunge headlong into resistance to the laws, on a matter of opinion, and on a question in which the preponderance of opinion, both of the present day and of all past time, was so overwhelmingly against her. The ordinance declares that Congress has exceeded its just power, by laying duties on imports, intended for the protection of manufactures. This is the opinion of South Carolina; and on the strength of that opinion she nullifies the laws. Yet has the rest of the country no right to its opinions also? Is one State to sit sole arbitress? She maintains that those laws are plain, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution; that she has a sovereign right to decide this matter; and, that, having so decided, she is authorized to resist their execution, by her own sovereign power; and she declares that she will resist it, though such resistance should shatter the Union into atoms.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the propriety of these laws at large; but I will ask, how are they shown to be thus plainly and palpably unconstitutional? Are they quite new in the history of the Government? Have they no countenance at all in the constitution itself? Are they a sudden and violent usurpation on the rights of the States? Sir, what will the civilized world say, what will posterity say, when they learn that similar laws have existed from the very foundation of the Government; that for thirty years the power never was questioned; and that no state in the Union has more freely and unequivocally admitted it than South Carolina herself?

To lay and collect duties and imposts is an express power, granted by the constitution to Congress. It is also an exclusive power; for the constitution as expressly prohibits all the States from exercising it themselves. This express and exclusive power is unlimited in the terms of the grant, but is attended with two specific restrictions: first, that all duties and imposts shall be equal in all the States; second, that no duties shall be laid on exports. The power, then, being granted, and being attended with these two restrictions, and no more, who is to impose a third restriction on the general words of the grant? If the power to lay duties, as known among all other nations, and as known in all our history, and as it was perfectly understood when the constitution was adopted, includes a right of discriminating, while exercising the power, and of laying some duties heavier and some lighter, for the sake of encouraging our own domestic products, what authority is there for giving to the words used in the constitution a new, narrow, and unusual meaning? All the limitations which the constitution intended, it has expressed; and what it has left unrestricted, is as much a part of its will as the restraints which it has imposed.

But these laws, it is said, are unconstitutional on account of the motive. How, sir, can a law be examined on any such ground? How is the motive to be ascertained? One House, or one member, may have one motive; the other House, or another member, another. One motive may operate to-day, and another to-morrow. Upon any such mode of reasoning as this, one law might be unconstitutional now, and another law, in exactly the same words, perfectly constitutional next year. Besides, articles may only be taxed for the purpose of protecting home products, but other articles may be left free, for the same purpose, and with the same motive. A law, therefore, would become unconstitutional from what it omitted as well as from what it contained. Mr. President, it is a settled principle, acknowledged in all legislative halls, recognised before all tribunals, sanctioned by the general sense and understanding of mankind, that there can be no inquiry into the motives of those who pass laws, for the purpose of determining on their validity. If the law be within the fair meaning of the words in the grant of power, its authority must be admitted until it is repealed. This rule, every where acknowledged, every where admitted, is so universal, and so completely without exception, as that even an allegation of fraud in the majority of a Legislature is not allowed as a ground to set aside a law.

But, sir, is it true that the motive for these laws is such as is stated? I think not. The great object of all these laws is, unquestionably, revenue. If there were no occasion for revenue, the laws would not have been passed; and it is notorious that almost the entire revenue of the country is derived from them. And, as yet, we have collected none too much revenue. The treasury has not been more exhausted for many years than at this moment. All that South Carolina can say is, that in passing the laws which she now undertakes to nullify, particular articles were taxed from a regard to the protection of domestic articles, higher than they would have been had no such regard been entertained. And she insists that, according to the constitution, no such discrimination can be allowed; that duties should be laid for revenue, and revenue only; and that it is unlawful to have reference, in any case, to protection. In other words, she denies the power of discrimination. She does not, and cannot, complain of excessive taxation; on the contrary, she professes to be willing to pay any amount for revenue, merely as revenue; and up to the present moment there is no surplus of revenue. Her grievance, then, that plain and palpable violation of the constitution which she insists has taken place, is simply the exercise of the power of discrimination. Now, sir, is the exercise of this power of discrimination plainly and palpably unconstitutional? I have already said the power to lay duties is given by the constitution in broad and general terms. There is also conferred on Congress the whole power of regulating commerce in another distinct provision. Is it clear and palpable, sir—can any man say it is a case beyond doubt—that under these two powers Congress may not justly discriminate in laying duties for the purpose of countervailing the policy of foreign nations, or of favoring our own home productions? Sir, what ought to conclude this question forever, as it would seem to me, is, that the regulation of commerce, and the imposition of duties, are, in all commercial nations, powers avowedly and constantly exercised for this very end. That undeniable truth ought to settle the question; because the constitution ought to be considered, when it uses well known language, as using it in its well known sense. But it is equally undeniable that it has been, from the very first, fully believed that this power of discrimination was conferred on Congress; and the constitution was itself recommended, urged upon the people, and enthusiastically insisted on, in some of the States, for that very reason. Not that, at that time, the country was extensively engaged in manufactures, especially of those kinds now existing. But the trades and crafts of the seaport towns, the business of the artisans, and manual laborers, these employments, the work of which supplies so great a portion of the daily wants of all classes, all these looked to the new constitution as a source of relief from the severe distresses which followed the war. It would, sir, be unpardonable, at so late an hour, to go into details on this point; but the truth is as I have stated. The papers of the day, the resolutions of public meetings, the debates in the conventions, all that we open our eyes upon, in the history of the times, prove it.

The honorable gentleman, sir, from South Carolina, has referred to two incidents connected with the proceedings of the convention at Philadelphia, which he thinks are evidence to show that the power of protecting manufactures by laying duties, and by commercial regulations, was not intended to be given by Congress. The first is, as he says, that a power to protect manufactures was expressly proposed, but not granted. I think, sir, the gentleman is quite mistaken in relation to this part of the proceedings of the convention. The whole history of the occurrence to which he alludes is simply this: Towards the conclusion of the convention, after the provisions of the constitution had been mainly agreed upon, after the power to lay duties and the power to regulate commerce had both been granted, a long list of propositions was made, and referred to the committee, containing various miscellaneous powers, some, or all of which, it was thought, might be properly vested in Congress. Among these, was a power to establish a university; to grant charters of incorporation; to regulate stage-coaches on the post-roads; and also the power to which the gentleman refers, and which is expressed in these words: "To establish public institutions, rewards, and immunities, for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, trades, and manufactures." The committee made no report on this or various other propositions in the same list. But the only inference from this omission is, that neither the committee nor the convention thought it proper to authorize Congress "to establish public institutions, rewards, and immunities" for the promotion of manufactures and other interests. The convention supposed it had done enough, (at any rate it had done all it intended,) when it had given to Congress, in general terms, the power to lay imposts and the power to regulate trade. It is not to be argued, from its omission to give more, that it meant to take back what it had already given. It had given the impost power; it had given the regulation of trade; and it did not deem it necessary to give the further and distinct power of establishing public institutions.

The other fact, sir, on which the gentleman relies, is the declaration of Mr. Martin to the Legislature of Maryland. The gentleman supposes Mr. Martin to have urged against the constitution that it did not contain the power of protection. But, if the gentleman will look again at what Mr. Martin said, he will find, I think, that what Mr. Martin complained of was, that the constitution, by its prohibitions on the States, had taken away from the States themselves the power of protecting their own manufactures by duties on imports. This is undoubtedly true; but I find no expression of Mr. Martin intimating that the constitution had not conferred on Congress the same power which it had thus taken from the States.

But, sir, let us go to the first Congress; let us look in upon this and the other House, at the first session of their organization.

We see in both Houses men distinguished among the friends, framers, and advocates of the constitution. We see in both those who had drawn, discussed, and matured the instrument in the convention, explained and defended it before the people, and were now elected members of Congress to put the new Government into motion, and to carry the powers of the constitution into beneficial execution.

At the head of the Government was Washington himself, who had been president of the convention; and in his cabinet were others most thoroughly acquainted with the history of the constitution, and distinguished for the part taken in its discussion.

If these persons were not acquainted with the meaning of the constitution, if they did not understand the work of their own hands, who can understand it, or who shall now interpret it to us?

Sir, the volume which records the proceedings and debates of the first session of the House of Representatives lies before me. I open it, and I find, that, having provided for the administration of the necessary oaths, the very first measure proposed for consideration is the laying of imposts; and in the very first Committee of the Whole into which the House of Representatives ever resolved itself, on this its earliest subject, and in this its very first debate, the duty of so laying the imposts as to encourage manufactures was advanced, and enlarged upon by almost every speaker; and doubted or denied by none. The first gentleman who suggests this as the clear duty of Congress, and as an object necessary to be attended to, is Mr. Fitzsimons, of Pennsylvania; the second, Mr. White, of Virginia; the third, Mr. Tucker, of South Carolina.

But the great leader, sir, on this occasion, was Mr. Madison. Was he likely to know the intentions of the convention and the people? Was he likely to understand the constitution?

At the second sitting of the committee Mr. Madison explained his own opinions of the duty of Congress fully and explicitly. I must not detain you, sir, with more than a few short extracts from these opinions, but they are such as are clear, intelligible, and decisive.

"The States," says he, "that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to, in some degree. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade, they had the power to cherish such institutions. By adopting the present constitution, they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands; they must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here."

In another report of the same speech, Mr. Madison is represented as using still stronger language; as saying that the constitution having taken this power away from the States, and conferred it on Congress, it would be a fraud on the States and on the people were Congress to refuse to exercise it.

Mr. Madison argues, sir, on this early and interesting occasion, very justly and liberally in favor of the general principles of unrestricted commerce. But he argues also, with equal force and clearness, for certain important exceptions to these general principles.

The first, sir, respects those manufactures which had been brought forward under encouragement by the State Governments. "It would be cruel," says Mr. Madison, "to neglect them, and to divert their industry into other channels; for it is not possible for the hand of man to shift from one employment to another without being injured by the change." Again: "There may be some manufactures which, being once formed, can advance towards perfection without any adventitious aid; while others, for want of the fostering hand of Government, will be unable to go on at all. Legislative provision, therefore, will be necessary to collect the proper objects for this purpose; and this will form another exception to my general principle." And again: "The next exception that occurs is one on which great stress is laid by some well-informed men, and this with great plausibility; that each nation should have within itself the means of defence, independent of foreign supplies; that, in whatever relates to the operations of war, no State ought to depend upon precarious supplies from any part of the world. There may be some truth in this remark, and therefore it is proper for legislative attention."

In the same debate, sir, Mr. Burke, from South Carolina, supported a duty on hemp, for the express purpose of encouraging its growth on the strong lands of South Carolina. "Cotton," he said, "was also in contemplation among them; and, if good seed could be procured, he hoped might succeed." Afterwards, sir, the cotton seed was obtained, its culture was protected, and it did succeed. Mr. Smith, a very distinguished member from the same State, observed: "It has been said, and justly, that the States which adopted this constitution expected its administration would be conducted with a favorable hand. The manufacturing States wished the encouragement of manufactures; the maritime States the encouragement of ship-building; and the agricultural States the encouragement of agriculture."

Sir, I will detain the Senate by reading no more extracts from these debates. I have already shown a majority of the members from South Carolina, in this very first session, acknowledging this power of protection, voting for its exercise, and proposing its extension to their own products. Similar propositions came from Virginia; and, indeed, sir, in the whole debate, at whatever page you open the volume, you find the power admitted, and you find it applied to the protection of particular articles, or not applied, according to the discretion of Congress. No man denied the power—no man doubted it; the only questions were, in regard to the several articles proposed to be taxed, whether they were fit subjects for protection, and what the amount of that protection ought to be? Will gentlemen, sir, now answer the argument drawn from those proceedings of the first Congress? Will they undertake to deny that that Congress did act on the avowed principle of protection? Or, if they admit it, will they tell us how those who framed the constitution fell, thus early, into this great mistake about its meaning? Will they tell us how it should happen that they had so soon forgotten their own sentiments, and their own purposes? I confess I have seen no answer to this argument, nor any respectable attempt to answer it. And, sir, how did this debate terminate? What law was passed? There it stands, sir, among the statutes, the second law in the book. It has a preamble, and that preamble expressly recites that the duties which it imposes are laid “for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures.” Until, sir, this early legislation, thus coeval with the constitution itself, thus full and explicit, can be explained away, no man can doubt of the meaning of that instrument.

Mr. President, this power of discrimination, thus admitted, avowed, and practised upon, in the first revenue act, has never been denied or doubted until within a few years past. It was not at all doubted in 1816, when it became necessary to adjust the revenue to a state of peace. On the contrary, the power was then exercised, not without opposition as to its expediency, but, as far as I remember, or have understood, without the slightest opposition founded on any supposed want of constitutional authority. Certainly, South Carolina did not doubt it. The tariff of 1816 was introduced, carried through, and established, under the lead of South Carolina. Even the minimum is of South Carolina origin. The honorable gentleman himself supported, and ably supported, the tariff of 1816. He has informed us, sir, that his speech on that occasion was sudden and off-hand, he being called upon by the request of a friend. I am sure the gentleman so remembers it, and that it was so; but there is, nevertheless, much method, arrangement, and clear exposition, in that extempore speech. It is very able, very, very much to the point, and very decisive. And in another speech, delivered two months earlier, on the proposition to repeal the internal taxes, the honorable gentleman had touched the same subject, and had declared “that a certain encouragement ought to be extended, at least to our woollen and cotton manufactures.” I do not quote these speeches, sir, for the purpose of showing that the honorable gentleman has changed his opinion; my object is other, and higher. I do it for the sake of saying that that cannot be so plainly and palpably unconstitutional as to warrant resistance to law, nullification, and revolution, which the honorable gentleman and his friends have heretofore agreed to, and acted upon, without doubt and without hesitation. Sir, it is no answer to say that the tariff of 1816 was a revenue bill. So are they all revenue bills. The point and the truth is, that the tariff of 1816, like the rest, did discriminate; it did distinguish one article from another; it did lay duties for protection. Look to the case of coarse cottons, under the minimum calculation; the duty on these was sixty to eighty per cent. Something besides revenue certainly was intended by this; and, in fact, the law cut up our whole commerce with India in that article. It is, sir, only within a few years that Carolina has denied the constitutionality of these protective laws. The gentleman himself has narrated to us the true history of her proceedings on this point. He says that, after the passing of the law of 1828, despairing then of being able to abolish the system of protection, political men went forth among the people, and set up the doctrine that the system was unconstitutional. “And the people,” says the honorable gentleman, “received the doctrine.” This, I believe, is true, sir. The people did then receive the doctrine; they had never entertained it before. Down to that period, the constitutionality of these laws had been no more doubted in South Carolina than elsewhere. And I suspect it is true, sir, and I deem it a great misfortune, that, to the present moment, a great portion of the people of the State have never yet seen more than one side of the argument. I believe that thousands of honest men are involved in scenes now passing, led away by one-sided views of the question, and following their leaders by the impulses of an unlimited confidence. Depend upon it, sir, if we can avoid the shock of arms, a day for reconsideration and reflection will come; truth and reason will act with their accustomed force, and the public opinion of South Carolina will be restored to its usual constitutional and patriotic tone.

But, sir, I hold South Carolina to her ancient, her cool, her uninfluenced, her deliberate opinions. I hold her to her own admissions, nay, to her own claims and pretensions, in 1789, in the first Congress, and to her acknowledgments and avowed sentiments through a long series of succeeding years. I hold her to the principles on which she led Congress to act in 1816; or, if she has changed her own opinions, I claim some respect for those who still retain the same opinions. I say she is precluded from asserting that doctrines which she herself so long and so ably sustained, are plain, palpable, and dangerous violations of the constitution.

Mr. President, if the friends of nullification should be able to propagate their opinions, and give them practical effect, they would, in my judgment, prove themselves the most skillful “architects of ruin,” the most effectual extinguishers of high-raised expectation, the greatest blasters of human hopes, which any age has produced. They would stand up to proclaim, in tones which would pierce the ears of half the human race, that the last great experiment of representative government had failed. They would send forth sounds, at the hearing of which the doctrine of the divine right of kings would feel, even in its grave, a returning sensation of vitality and resuscitation. Millions of eyes, of those who now feed their inherent love of liberty on the success of the American example, would turn away from beholding our dismemberment, and find no place on earth whereon to rest their gratified sight. Amidst the incantations and orgies of nullification, secession, disunion, and revolution, would be celebrated the funeral rites of constitutional and republican liberty.

But, sir, if the Government do its duty; if it act with firmness and with moderation, these opinions cannot prevail. Be assured, sir, be assured, that, among the political sentiments of this people, the love of union is still uppermost. They will stand fast by the constitution, and by those who defend it. I rely on no temporary expedients—on no political combination—but I rely on the true American feeling, the genuine patriotism of the people, and the imperative decision of the public voice. Disorder and confusion, indeed, may arise; scenes of commotion and contest are threatened, and perhaps may come. With my whole heart, I pray for the continuance of the domestic peace and quiet of the country. I desire most ardently the restoration of affection and harmony to all its parts. I desire that every citizen of the whole country may look to this Government with no other sentiments but those of grateful respect and attachment. But I cannot yield, even to kind feelings, the cause of the constitution, the true glory of the country, and the great trust which we hold in our hands for succeeding ages. If the constitution cannot be maintained without meeting these scenes of commotion and contest, however unwelcome, they must come. We cannot, we must not, we dare not, omit to do that which, in our judgment, the safety of the Union requires. Not regardless of consequences, we must yet meet consequences; seeing the hazards which surround the discharge of public duty, it must yet be discharged. For myself, sir, I shun no responsibility justly devolving on me, here or elsewhere, in attempting to maintain the cause. I am tied to it by indissoluble bands of affection and duty, and I shall cheerfully partake in its fortunes and its fate. I am ready to perform my own appropriate part whenever and wherever the occasion may call on me, and to take my chance among those upon whom blows may fall first and fall thickest. I shall exert every faculty I possess in aiding to prevent the constitution from being nullified, destroyed, or impaired; and even should I see it fall, I will still, with a voice, feeble, perhaps, but earnest as ever issued from human lips, and with fidelity and zeal which nothing shall extinguish, call on the PEOPLE to come to its rescue.

[Mr. WEBSTER not having concluded his speech at three o'clock, when the Senate adjourned for the daily recess, he resumed at five, and continued to speak till eight, P. M. The press of the immense concourse, of both sexes, which filled the galleries, the lobbies, and even the floor of the Senate chamber, during the evening sitting, was greater, if possible, than it was during the forenoon. At the conclusion of Mr. W.'s speech, there was a spontaneous burst of applause from the galleries.]

Mr. POINDEXTER moved an adjournment; but the President ordered the galleries to be cleared, and would not receive the motion to adjourn until the order had been executed; when

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

PRINTER TO CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the Senate took up the resolution appointing a day for the election of a public printer.

Mr. CHAMBERS then modified the resolution, so as to read "Tuesday."

Mr. BENTON then made an explanation of the reasons which had induced him to introduce the joint resolution on this subject. He had done this with a view to vindicate the right of every Congress to elect its own officers, not only in reference to the Speaker and other officers of the House, but also as regards public printers. He stated that, for the first thirty years of this Government, there had been no public printer known; but that the public printing was executed by contract, made with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House. In the year 1819 the first election of public printer was made, and thus the present system was introduced. This change was made for the convenience of the new Congress, and was subsequently acquiesced in. So long as this arrangement has suited the convenience of Congress, and there has arisen no evil in consequence of an opposition in political feeling, it was not interfered with. But now that political parties had risen to such a height, and that the office of public printer had grown so considerably in importance, he thought that a change should again take place. The public printer received large sums from the public treasury, and was a confidential officer; and it was not to be justified that a public printer should be elected, who wielded a press intended to put down the existing administration. Assuming that the character of the next Congress would harmonize with that of the administration, he thought that the election of a printer now would be for the annoyance instead of the convenience of the next Congress. If, in providing fuel for the next Congress, the officers of the House should provide rotten pine, he would not touch it. If they provided cartridge paper to write on, which would not bear ink, he would not touch it. So, when a public printer was elected, whose principles he disapproved, his voice should be raised up against him. He thought, therefore, that the election of public printer ought to be postponed until the next session.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed that the printer they should elect might happen to be a good administration man; might be very acceptable to the Senate, or the reverse. But all he had to say was, that the law of the land obliged them now to proceed to the election of a printer, and this had been the uniform practice of both Houses.

Mr. FOOT referred to the journals, to show that there was an inconsistency between the former course of the Senator from Missouri and the present.

Mr. HOLMES thought it was of little importance whether the opinions of the printer were in favor of the administration or against it; for it was difficult to understand what is the administration. If the principle contended for was to be adopted, and the next Congress should be against the administration, another change of printers would be rendered necessary. The House being in favor of the administration, and having chosen their printer, had, of course, chosen a printer favorable to the administration; and now it was proposed to undo what the House had done. He thought it very likely that the Senate would have some difficulty in persuading the House that the election by that body was not in accordance with law, and ought to be rescinded.

Mr. BENTON said the joint resolution which he had offered was not now before the Senate, and he could not have an opportunity to go fully into his views. In the instance quoted by the Senator from Connecticut, he had acted on the same principle on which he now acted, and that was, to elect a printer favorable to the views of the administration.

Mr. SPRAGUE thought that, instead of suffering party feelings to obtain extended influence, their weight ought to be diminished in this body; and the Senate should not openly countenance the doctrine, that a party character ought to be given to all their elections and measures. He thought the reason given by the Senator from Missouri, for altering the rule, was the strongest against its alteration. It was a rule adopted in better times, when there was less of party feeling and party excitement. He hoped that the usual course would not be departed from.

Mr. EWING saw no great weight in the reason urged, that a public printer must be elected for the purpose of lauding the administration. He thought it would be about as proper to make contracts for fuel with reference to the political and party feelings of the cartman who carried the wood. The Senate might as well exact a political test from every man with whom a contract was made.

Mr. BENTON said he was not one of those hypocrites who pretend to act without reference to political party. He made no sermons, no homilies, against party action. When the gentleman from Ohio expressed regret that he (Mr. B.) should have put this question on a party footing, he (Mr. B.) hoped that the gentleman would reserve his regrets for those who needed them. They were out of place when addressed to him. He adverted to the influence which a paper patronized by Congress must exercise in putting down an administration.

Before Mr. B. had concluded, the hour of twelve having arrived,

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to lay the special order on the table.

Mr. WILKINS asked for the yeas and nays, which were taken, and stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clayton, Foot, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller,

So the motion to lay on the table was negatived.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

Mr. POINDEXTER, who was entitled to the floor, rose and said he was compelled to decline any participation in the debate at this time, on account of the state of his health. If the subject should be postponed, he hoped to be able at another time to address the Senate in relation to it.

The CHAIR having stated the question to be "Shall this bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?"

Mr. CALHOUN said he had not anticipated this question for this morning. When it was put, he hoped there would be a full Senate. He moved the postponement of the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow.

Mr. FORSYTH hoped the postponement would not take place, as the session was drawing to a close. He had a desire to address the Senate on the question before it, but was not disposed to do it to-day. He had come here this morning, expecting to hear the honorable Senator from Mississippi. He would suggest that, if no additional amendments were to be offered, the bill should be passed to a third reading, and discussed on its passage.

Mr. CALHOUN: The third reading of a bill, as the Senator knows, is the most trying question. Having a solemn conviction of the importance of the question, I wish it to be taken in full Senate. Among the absentees is the colleague of the Senator from Georgia, whose high character in the United States, and great influence in his own State, render it desirable that his vote should be given on the question.

Mr. SMITH said it was true that the principle of a bill was tested on the third reading. If no further amendments were to be offered, then, on the third reading, the principle of the bill comes up.

Mr. FORSYTH said the absence of his colleague did not render necessary any delay in the action of the Senate. He would be here as soon as he was notified that the question was to be taken. He wished to delay his remarks on the bill until it was ascertained whether it was to pass the Senate. He wished to speak of it as a law which was to go to the people.

Mr. CALHOUN had no other object, he said, than to procure a full discussion of the measure, and he regretted the inability of the Senator from Mississippi to proceed at present. If any gentleman wished to offer an amendment, or to address the Senate, he would withdraw his motion to postpone.

The motion having been withdrawn,

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the bill, by adding certain words to the last section of the bill, and striking out the words "first and fifth sections" therefrom. The object and effect of this amendment was to limit the existence of the entire act to the end of the next session of Congress, instead of limiting the existence of the first and fifth sections only. He regarded the measure merely as one intended to meet a certain exigency, which he hoped would soon pass away. He asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER, being opposed to the entire bill, could not assent to the amendment. He objected to the amendment, that it did not go far enough. All the suits resulting from the act should fall at the expiration of the act.

Mr. CHAMBERS could see no inconvenience resulting from the amendment. Its effect was to limit the operation of the whole law to one year. There were some provisions in the bill which he should be glad to see made permanent law.

Mr. FORSYTH: That can be done hereafter.

Mr. WILKINS said the committee were of the opinion that all the provisions, except the first and fifth sections, ought to be engrafted on our judiciary system. The case of the refusal of a clerk of a State court to furnish a copy of the record had twice occurred, and had not been provided for, except by this bill.

Mr. MANGUM was in favor of the amendment. The provisions, if found beneficial, could be re-enacted hereafter.

Mr. KANE suggested a modification of the amendment, so as to extend it to the limitation of all suits arising under the act, which shall be pending at its expiration.

Mr. FORSYTH accepted the modification. He did not look at the propriety or impropriety of other provisions of the bill, as a permanent and general measure. He viewed them only as applicable to a particular state of things. He did not like the judicial provisions. They were more objectionable than the military provisions, in his opinion.

Mr. WEBSTER briefly noticed the effects of this amendment. The provisions of the bill, which it was now proposed to limit, were the judicial processes intended to counteract those of the State of South Carolina. The provisions of that State were permanent in their character; and if the provisions of this bill were to be limited, after the expiration of that limit there would be no remedy in existence against the measures of the State. He was quite willing that the sections placing in the hands of the Executive the military force should be limited to the termination of the next session; but the proceedings of the courts, intended to counteract those of the courts of South Carolina, ought not to be limited, as the provisions of South Carolina were unlimited. To limit these provisions to a single year, would be to defeat the object altogether, as there are certain proceedings to which they refer which cannot arise within the year. The bill would always be within the reach of Congress, to amend or repeal whenever it might be deemed proper so to do. If any limitation were to be fixed, he would prefer to make it for a longer period. He desired to see these judicial provisions established as a part of our permanent system; and he believed that, had such been the case before, this contingency would never have occurred. He hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. CALHOUN asked if he had understood the Senator from Georgia as stating that his colleague had acquiesced in the judicial provisions of the bill? He said that he should vote for this amendment; but he believed that every part of the bill was a violation of the constitution, and that it was all throughout liable to the strongest objections.

Mr. FORSYTH said that what he understood, was, that the Senator from South Carolina had principally objected to the provisions of the bill which were most directly warlike in their character, and had regarded the provisions providing for countervailing civil process as less odious. He regarded the objections of the Senator from Massachusetts as applicable as well to the other provisions of the bill as those now under consideration. For himself, he did not wish to view the bill, in any of its provisions, as a permanent measure. He had no desire to blend it into the permanent judicial system of the country. If it should ever be the desire of Congress so to blend it, he wished that it might be done at a time when no such topics should present themselves as were now so prominent in every

Revenue Collection Bill.

[FEB. 18, 1833.]

Senator's mind, and then the subject could be calmly and deliberately discussed.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Dickerson, Forsyth, Hill, Kane, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Rives, Smith, Tyler, Waggaman, White, Wright—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins—26.

Mr. POINDEXTER then rose and stated that it must be evident that, to carry into effect the provisions of the bill, some appropriation was necessary. The bill authorized the calling into operation the military force of the country, but provided no means for defraying the expenses. The constitution had prohibited the withdrawal of any money from the treasury, unless under an appropriation by law. The Senate was now about to employ the army and navy to carry into effect the provisions of the bill, and the President ought to be limited in the expenditures for this purpose. He concluded with moving to amend the bill by inserting a new section, providing that, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this bill, the sum of — dollars shall be, and is hereby appropriated.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed a hope that the gentleman from Mississippi would fill up the blank with some sum.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he would leave that to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRUNDY said the Judiciary Committee wanted no money; but, if the gentleman from Mississippi was disposed to grant an appropriation, it would be agreeable to the committee to know what amount he was willing to give.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his surprise at the course of the gentleman from Tennessee. Did that gentleman mean to say that no money would be required for the purposes of the bill? The fact must be apparent, that no appropriation is a universal appropriation. The President would be able to take from the treasury what he pleased, and Congress and the people would be pledged to replace it in the treasury. He was surprised at this course. It belonged to those who had introduced and who advocated this bill to say what amount of money would be required. It did not belong to the Senator from Mississippi. If the Senate intended to give the sword to the President, they ought not to give him the purse also. He looked upon this as one of the most arbitrary of all the provisions of this most arbitrary bill.

Mr. GRUNDY stated that the Senator from South Carolina was more competent than any other person to determine whether or not there would be any necessity for the employment of force. If the authorities of the State of South Carolina should offer resistance to the laws, then would arise the necessity for the employment of force. But he was of opinion that, unless it was produced by the act of South Carolina, there would be no collision; and no expenditure would be necessary, unless there should be collision. The committee hoped that no such collision would arise; but, if it should, provision could be made for the expenditure by the next Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the whole of this business indicated an unsoundness of legislation. The bare possibility of a collision ought to be deemed sufficient to induce the committee to make the appropriation. Unsound legislation! He had never seen any instance of a nation hurrying so rapidly towards a state of despotism. The gentleman had said that there would be no expenditure unless resistance should be commenced by South Carolina. What did the Senator mean by resistance? It would be seen that, in this bill, the President had the power to interrupt the civil process of the State courts. Did the Senator suppose that the State of South Carolina would acquiesce in this interruption? No. If the President had the power to interrupt the process, he would also have the power to close the courts, and to close the hall of legislation. He might treat the Legislature as a lawless assemblage; and what course could be then left to the State but resistance? She would be forced into resistance. Yes, she would be thus compelled to resist. But the question of time was a far different question. He thanked God that this question was in other hands to decide. South Carolina, in deciding this question, would make the issue with a deliberate judgment, but with irresistible firmness. He was amazed at the course which had been taken. The provisions of this bill went beyond any thing he could have conceived. He would reverse the argument of the Senator from Tennessee, and say there could be no collision unless it proceeded from the conduct of the General Government.

Mr. SMITH referred to the course which had been pursued in reference to the dispute with Pennsylvania, when similar powers were vested in the President, and the military force was called out. An appropriation was made at the following session to defray the expenditures caused by that disturbance. He did not apprehend the occurrence of any war. He believed that the very first section of the bill put it out of the power of South Carolina to go to war. There could be no fighting, as a sufficient guard was provided against the State of South Carolina getting hold of any property which could produce such an evil.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the yeas and nays were ordered on this question.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Calhoun, Mangum, Moore, Poindexter—5.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Black, Buckner, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, King, Knight, Miller, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins, White, Wright—41.

Mr. BIBB then moved to amend the bill by adding a section limiting the expenditure to three millions. And on this question the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FORSYTH commenced a series of observations on this motion, which he continued until three o'clock. His argument, commencing with the precise motion before the Senate, gradually expanded into a view of the whole subject under debate. Before he concluded—

At 3 o'clock, the Senate, according to its new rule, adjourned, to meet again at 5.

Mr. WILKINS gave notice that he should, at the evening session, unless some gentleman was anxious to make some observations, urge the question on the engrossment of the bill.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. FORSYTH resumed. As regarded the exciting question of nullification, that doctrine he held was untenable. No individual State possessed the right of nullification from any sovereignty residing in her. Sovereignty, he contended, did not exist in the States, separately or individually, since the Union. Since that period, it resided in the United States as a whole; and by them alone could it be exercised, and in the mode defined by the constitution. Much ingenuity had been called forth in support of nullification; but mystify it as they pleased, it could not stand the test of argument. The doctrine was preposterous; it was a mere web of sophism and casuistry. And the arguments in its favor, if analyzed,

FEB. 18, 1833.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

and put through the alembic, would result in the double distilled essence of nonsense. But, having thus denounced nullification, he would admit that the position which South Carolina had taken had served one good purpose, that of opening the eyes of the country to the injustice done to the South by an odious and oppressive tariff. As regarded the tariff, the whole South were with South Carolina, in the general principle of resistance to it; but they differed from her in the mode which she had thought fit to adopt. But if the tariff was odious, and must finally be put an end to, neither could the course of South Carolina be defended, or tolerated, with safety to the Union. He looked forward in anticipation to the period as nigh at hand, when the protective system must expire, and, in like manner, when nullification would sink into the grave. He hoped soon to see them buried in the same tomb; and willingly would he then pronounce their funeral oration, and inscribe on their monument the epitaph—"requiscat in pace."

Mr. F. then proceeded to defend the course which Georgia had taken relative to the missionaries and the Cherokees, contending that there was nothing analogous in it to that of South Carolina. Alluding to the imprisonment of the missionaries, he thus continued his remarks: The character of a minister of the gospel is most respectable, who, for the welfare of men, gives up the interests and the objects of earth. He is the object of the greatest respect. To me he is an object of envy. I never see such a man without feeling my own worthlessness. There is something divine in his pursuits. Behold him sitting

"Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
With sorrow, guilt, and fear, by turns dismayed,
The reverend champion stood. At his control,
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
Comfort came down, the trembling wretch to raise,
And his last faltering accents whisper'd praise."

Such a man partakes of that divine nature, that came among men to spread the doctrines and sentiments of peace. But the man of the opposite character, who mixes politics with religion; who relies on the world, while he professes to live above it; who covers with a cloak of hypocrisy his ambition and avarice, no language could express what every man should feel in view of such a man: to me he is the object of extreme abhorrence.

Sir, the State of Georgia warred in a contest, not against justice and religion, but against craft and hypocrisy. The subject of dispute did not relate to human rights, but to the rights of citizens of the United States. The citizens of the United States had no common bond of justice to individuals and the State. I hope this liberty was reserved to the families whom they voluntarily abandoned. I hope they had a consciousness of being in the right. But we may look back on this affair with no other emotion than that of self-respect. It was mixed with politics. We struggled, not against the United States, but a meddling priesthood. It has been said in the Senate, and every where else, that Georgia wished to grasp the possessions of the Cherokees; that South Carolina beat the bush, but Georgia got the bird. Sir, nothing is more untrue. Sir, the property was ours by all the principles of right and justice. There was an incumbrance on our rights, which required to be removed. All deemed it necessary to remove it. This was a duty not belonging to us, but to the United States. Government had promised peremptorily to effect its removal. Sir, we had waited thirty years for the fulfilment of this promise; and now we have been accused of disregarding all considerations of justice. We have gained nothing by the contest, except our own property. As to the Indians, the race has never been treated with the same kindness in any State in the Union. They held the use of the property, and if they were disturbed by those citizens of Georgia to whom it had fallen, the possession was forfeited. Georgia had no interest in the affair, but to exact the performance of a solemn contract.

Sir, the distinguishing difference between Georgia and South Carolina is this: in virtue of a compact Georgia was the rightful owner of the property, for which she contended. She did not interfere to interrupt the laws of Congress; but she relied on her own contract, a contract with her equal. The Georgia controversy was of a peculiar character, and might last a hundred years, without interrupting the laws, or disturbing the peace of the country. If the question had ultimately gone to the Supreme Court, and that court had decided against us, in the last extremity, the President might have called on military force to execute its decree. But it would be for him to decide whether or not he should do it. Sir, I do not dive into the policy of the President; but I know one thing: I am confident he would not have resorted to force without necessity. I saw a variety of ways in which the matter might be settled without such necessity. In the extremity of the contest with the Cherokees, the language of the President might have been this, in case the great question in the Supreme Court had been decided against us: I ask you now, Governor of the State of Georgia, in order to prevent further trouble, to turn these Cherokees out of doors.

It is very important, Mr. President, in all questions in a Government like ours, particularly in discussions in a body like this Senate, that justice should be done to the motives of every body; and I hope, therefore, I shall be excused. I have seen, here and elsewhere, a disposition to liken us to colonies. Gentlemen look forward to another revolution. Sir, there is a contrast, but not a resemblance. When colonies, we did not complain that we were oppressed by a tax, but that we were taxed, and not represented. We believed that it was the right of our own legislative bodies to impose taxes. Sir, is this the complaint of South Carolina? It is of a different character. Their complaint is not that they are not represented, but that they have not a sufficient influence; that here they are heard, but not heeded; that it is in vain to reason and remonstrate; it is all an empty mockery. They have their full share of talent, but their voice is not heard. Sir, I am sure this is not true; it is founded on an assumption that a great majority of the people of the United States are interested in maintaining the protective system. I hope it is not true that they are so interested; but the business of protection, even if it fail now, will be resumed, if the majority of the people are satisfied that it is for the happiness and interest of the majority. The doctrine, as it is now regarded in the Senate, makes me believe that it is not for the interest of the majority, but prejudicial to the United States. The whole burden is, that the many may be taxed for the benefit of the few, composing a very small portion of the community. There is a great contrast, and we could fear nothing, but for what South Carolina admits she has done.

Sir, this bill has been likened to the Boston port bill, which was adopted in consequence of throwing the tea overboard. Sir, is it intended to operate to the injury of Charleston, for the benefit of another port? It is quite the reverse. It is the object to keep the custom-house in Charleston, and that its advantages shall be enjoyed by Charleston. Here, too, is a contrast between the case of the colonies and that of South Carolina. There is another, in the language of the proclamation of the President of the United States, that was kind and conciliatory; while the British general, in his proclamation, was thirsting for vengeance.

Sir, may I be permitted to say, with regret, that any overture from the President is received with dislike, on the part of South Carolina? They reject his kind offers and soothing speeches, and call him a tyrant, wrea-his vengeance on the land of his birth. He has a great desire to do justice, but he is misinterpreted and disbelieved. But from the high-tariff men, when they make an offer of an equivocal character, it is hailed with joy; it is the rainbow on the bosom of the thunder storm; it is oil poured on the troubled waves. While the offers of the President are rejected, they are about to make a peace with their inveterate enemies. They reject the President, doubting his desire that peace should be made.

South Carolina, in the midst of all her projects during the last year, has professed a devoted attachment to the Union. She loves it with all her heart. Sir, she loves it too much; she is so devoted to it, that she is scarcely willing that any body should save it but herself. Similar professions were made by the Hartford convention; they loved the Union, were devoted to the Union so much, that nobody must govern it but themselves. They put the people in distress, that the people might take refuge in their arms. Their affection was like that of the lover, who gets the object of his attachment into distress and difficulty, that he may show his heroic gallantry by coming forward to afford her relief, that she may then fly to him for refuge. Sir, she usually goes the other way, and the stratagem seldom produces the effect desired; it causes a suspicion of the purity of the flame within.

Sir, from all existing appearances, this question is in a course of settlement. If every thing were in the hands of South Carolina, it would be settled at once. But it is not so, and therefore I hope this bill will pass. Under existing circumstances, any foreigner has the power to compromise the peace of South Carolina. A wretch, a heartless foreign agent, who desires to lay this fair fabric waste, has it in his power to bring this matter into collision at once. There are already symptoms that some foreign agents in Charleston are about to do so. They have begun to nibble, and ought to be arrested. I hope, sir, this bill will pass, that the custom-house may be removed, and that the foreign villain may be shot down like a wolf. Sir, would any man hesitate? Never, never; it would be the extravagance of weakness to do so. And yet Carolina, proud and generous, has placed the issue of blood in such hands.

Sir, I ought to apologize to the Senate for not preparing for this discussion; and I hope the unexpected circumstances of the case will be deemed a sufficient apology.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BISS, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Calhoun, Miller, Moore, Tyler—4.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buckner, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, King, Mangum, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins, White, Wright—38.

Mr. MILLER said he rose to explain the reasons which had influenced his vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, and against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was to restrain or limit the amount of expenditure which the President might incur under this bill; although the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi may have had the same object in view, yet it did not, on the face, purport to be a limitation, but an appropriation to carry into effect the enactments of the bill. This he could not consent to vote for. It would be a virtual assent to the provisions of the bill, to furnish the means to carry it into effect.

While upon the floor, I will notice some of the positions of the Senator from Georgia. It is an act of justice to the State I represent, and to myself individually, to set the Senator right upon more points than one, in the observations he has just closed. The Senator from Georgia has affirmed that South Carolina has not met, in a proper spirit, the efforts of the President to adjust the tariff, while she has manifested a perfect cordiality towards the advances made from another quarter. Pray, sir, on what foundation does the Senator rest this assertion? Where is the evidence of the fact? where the proof? I appeal to every one who hears me, to say whether the voice of South Carolina, by her representatives here, and her press at home, has not strenuously sustained the President's opening message on the subject of the tariff? The sentiments of the Chief Magistrate, recommending the repeal of the act of last session, and the reduction of the taxes to the wants of the Government, have not only been approved of by the South Carolina delegation, but universal approbation has been the echo from the people of that State. We have nothing in view but legitimate reform. Every aid in achieving our object is cordially and most cheerfully received. When the Senator from Kentucky had made his move upon the troubled wave, but little hopes were entertained that the Executive influence would succeed, at the present session, in reforming the evil. We had met the proposition to adjust this controversy, coming from that quarter, in the same spirit of kindness. Sir, I repeat it, there is no foundation for the imputation made by the Senator from Georgia, that we have not met, in a proper temper and feeling, the President's efforts to adjust this question.

Mr. M. said, it was his duty to notice some other expressions of the Senator from Georgia, having a direct bearing on South Carolina. He did me no more than justice when he intimated that he presumed I was gratified at the successful termination of the Georgia controversy. I have always maintained that Georgia was right, in her contest with the Federal Government. In an official form, in another responsible station, I have expressed my friendship for that State, and I have been assailed in no very measured terms, by the political friends of the Senator in South Carolina, for these opinions. It was considered a great outrage upon principle in me, to treat the United States as a foreign Government, so far as she attempted to control the local and domestic rights of Georgia.

I have always considered the questions made by Georgia and South Carolina as one and the same. I am entirely incapable of perceiving any difference. With such a belief, it was natural that the people of South Carolina should feel gratified at the successful termination of the Georgia controversy. While that State was struggling with power, and boldly and bravely standing forth the champion of State rights, we stood ready to aid her with our strength, and sustain her by our countenance and sympathy. If, while the battle was raging, South Carolina moved alongside of her sister, with a firm determination to stand by her in the contest, we take no credit to ourselves, we ask no return of kindness. Her cause was the cause of the constitution and the rights of the States; her cause was our cause. If, when South Carolina stands upon similar grounds, in a great contest for Southern rights and constitutional liberty, Georgia can reconcile it to her notions of consistency, or honor, or interest, to change her position, and fire a broadside upon Carolina, be it so. I do not envy any one the gratification he may feel in pursuing such a course.

Mr. M. said he had not meant, when he addressed the Senate before, to reflect in any degree on the State of Georgia for the course pursued by that State in the Indian controversy. He meant simply to state, that the abandonment of the cause in the Supreme Court, recently, under existing circumstances, was evidence of a political intrigue, disgraceful to the parties concerned, be the parties who they may. If Georgia stood erect upon her principles, and the missionaries were but the instruments of a cabal, who saw the necessity of sacrificing their religion and constitutional rights to the love of money, of course none of the censure would attach to her. If, on the other hand, her authorities were a party to the intrigue by which the President was to be relieved from his position in regard to the Supreme Court, in order to enable the patrons of the missionaries to bring the unbroken force of Presidential power, prejudice, and passion, backed by federal authority, into play against South Carolina, then Georgia would come in for a full share of his animadversion. He would take the liberty to say, that the Senator from Georgia was entirely mistaken in supposing this controversy had, in any degree, affected the reputation of the Supreme Court. The court had moved forward in the even tenor of its way, volunteering nothing, seeking nothing, but to decide matters brought before it. The loss of character sustained in this affair did not fall on that tribunal; it fell elsewhere. The Senator from Georgia had undertaken to tell us something as to the manner in which this law-suit had been terminated; but he confessed his details were so general as to throw but little light on the subject. One thing we all know, that the Senator from Georgia now stands side by side in this contest with the missionaries and their friends, in the crusade they are making against South Carolina. The Senator from Georgia had said he was opposed to nullification, because it had the appearance of sneaking into war. Sir, I confess this is a most singular objection. The idea was novel, purely original; such a thing as sneaking into a fight, he believed, was never before conceived of. There was such a thing as sneaking out of one; but as to sneaking into one, he conceived it impossible. If the gentleman from Georgia dislikes South Carolina nullification because it savors of sneaking into a fight, he must permit me to reply that I dislike Georgia nullification so far as it savored of sneaking out of a fight.

Again, sir: the Senator from Georgia has put the case of the caterpillar laying waste the fields of adjoining planters, and one insisting on setting fire to the woods, which might consume the cotton as well as caterpillar. I thank the Senator for his illustration. If there is any truth in the maxim no nocitur a sociis, it can be demonstrated that the Senator belongs to the caterpillar party in this controversy. In the outset of the Senator's argument, he admitted that nullification in South Carolina had done much good; that it had put the American people to reasoning on the subject of the tariff; that it had caused a pause; and that public opinion was undergoing a most beneficial and salutary change, operated on by the steps taken by Carolina. Although these results have been acknowledgedly produced by South Carolina, we find the Senator from Georgia joining in the chorus with the reverend missionaries and manufacturers, lending all his influence to destroy the planter and sustain the caterpillar. Sir, whatever of chivalry, or character, or good feeling, there is in this course of the honorable Senator, he is welcome to for me. Strange to tell, while the Senator deprecates as so fatal nullification, he has told us that this system of protection is so outrageous, that he is prepared to dissolve the Union, if it be not abandoned.

We propose to throw off an unconstitutional law, and still remain in the Union; and the gentleman reprobates this, but proposes to throw off all constitutional laws, and go out of the Union, unless this law is repealed; and yet he assumes to read lectures to us upon patriotism, the love of the Union, and the supremacy of the laws of Congress. Sir, I take this occasion to protest against the oft repeated charge that we deny the supremacy of constitutional laws; our position is, that the tariff for protection is not a law made in pursuance of the constitution, and, therefore, it is void.

In resisting such a law, we commit no crime. We stand upon our reserved rights, having parted with some of our freehold. We resist the right to take all in doing so. We deny that we oppose the constitution, or violate our oaths. Georgia refused obedience to the Indian intercourse law, because she thought it unconstitutional. She put herself on her reserved rights, and refused to obey not only the law, but the judicial exposition thereof; South Carolina does the same as to the tariff. She does not admit, in doing this, she commits either perjury or treason. If the Senator from Georgia will have it that those who refuse obedience to unconstitutional laws add treason to perjury, let it be so. If he will have it that Georgia, in maintaining her rights, adopts revolutionary principles, commits perjury as well as treason, and ought to atone for her crimes on the gallows, it is not for me to make a defence for her. If this be conformable to her moral taste, there can be no disputing about it. All we ask is, to let South Carolina, when she occupies her ground, maintain that she neither is guilty of perjury or treason, according to her own showing at least. Standing on soil she never parted with, she maintains she has a lawful right peaceably to repel a trespasser. If the trespasser will press on with force, then comes the tug of war. This is our creed. If it varies with Georgia orthodoxy, we cannot help it. We will not pronounce sentence of condemnation on our own act. We leave that for the Senator from Georgia, the reverend missionaries, and patrons of the tariff.

The honorable Senator has said, the latter clauses in the bill, those relating to the judicial departments of the States, were violative of higher principles than the military clauses. Sir, we have a most precious confession, that this bill, in its civil and military provisions, violated principle, and still the Senator proposes to vote for the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH said he had said involved, not violated.

Mr. MILLER resumed: I took down the words of the Senator differently; but the explanation does not vary, materially, his position. If the civil provisions in the bill involved higher principles, it must be a higher violation of principle than the military clauses; and it thus would seem the Senator admits he is about to support a bill that does involve unsound principles. Although I admit this bill is a series of violations of principle, still I do not admit that the degrees are as described by the Senator. My great objection to the first clause in the bill is, that it assumes to expound a law of Congress, declare constitutional, and support by force, the legislative construction; thus superseding entirely the Judicial department. It is the duty of the Legislative department to lay down the rule; the Judicial department to pronounce what is the rule thus laid down; and the Executive to enforce the rule thus ascertained. In the present bill the whole powers of Government are brought within the Legislative department. If South Carolina has erred in the opinion of the Senate, in refusing to permit an appeal to be made from her judicial tribunals, upon principle, all you can or ought to do is, to provide a mode by which appeals shall be taken. When you proceed one step further, you err yourselves, and can alone defend yourselves in doing wrong, by attributing the first error to South Carolina. Sir, by your own showing, there is not a shadow of pretence for any further legislation, than enough to subject South Carolina to the judicial authority of this Government. Hence he totally dissented from the honorable Senator, in the graduation of the erroneous principles of this bill.

Sir, the Senator from Georgia has told us that nullification was nonsense double refined; a pretty sweeping sentence pronounced on the wisdom of Jefferson, McKean, Roane, and many other great names. It will require something more than this dogmatism, passed through the intellectual alembic of the Senator from Georgia, to make any rational mind assent to the position that the doctrines taught by the sage of Monticello can thus be characterized, or that the primitive opinions of the fathers of the republic can be so easily put down. Sir, the Senator from Georgia, in commenting on the South Carolina proceedings, has said that the address to the people of the United States, in assuming that a majority of the people of the United States were in favor of the American system, had asserted that which was not true. The honorable Senator has tendered, in a manner not the most courteous, a direct issue upon a matter of fact, between himself and the collected wisdom, character, and moral sense of the people of South Carolina.

I see no way of settling this controverted fact but by referring it to the good sense of the Senate. It is admitted that a majority of this body are in favor of protection. I put the question to that majority—do they misrepresent their constituents? If they do not, then the Senator from Georgia has asserted that the South Carolina address did not speak the truth, when it appears most palpable that it does speak the truth. [Mr. FORSYTH said he meant only to say, in his opinion, the address was mistaken in attributing to the majority of the people of the United States a disposition favorable to the American system.] Mr. M. continued. He willingly received the qualification just made. The Senator from Georgia now said, it was his opinion that the address did not state the truth. The gentleman has clearly a right to his opinion. I should not dispute the right of a Cherokee chief to his opinion, as to the truths contained in that address. What he controverted was the correctness of the opinion of the Senator from Georgia; and he was glad now to have it in his power to submit this question to the majority of the Senate, with whom the honorable Senator is associated.

Sir, it is quite fashionable, on this floor, for gentlemen to set up their opinions as exclusively correct upon constitutional points, and denounce, in the most unmeasured terms, every sentiment which does not conform to their own. We must understand and construe the constitution as they do, or come under the ban, and be read out of the church. They arrogate to themselves the exclusive right to be the guardians of the Union. Let me tell the gentlemen there are two ways to destroy the Union, one by pressing State rights to extremities, and the other by a fusion of the separate interests of the States into one solid mass. You can commit disunion as well by consolidation and amalgamation as by State interposition. If the barriers which separate the reserved rights of the State be broken down, our Government will be as completely revolutionized as if we dissolve into any given number of separate and distinct Governments. The Senator from Massachusetts has told us that his opinions have received the sanction and confirmation of the American people. Sir, I am not so sure the honorable Senator has not over estimated the strength of his opinions with the country. It may be true that the present administration have endorsed the high-toned federal doctrines of the Senator; he is now the alpha with the powers that be; it is not long since he was the omega.

It will be recollected, when the present Chief Magistrate was elected, he stood pledged to sustain State rights. He was the very opposite of the Senator from Massachusetts. He stood upon his opinions, expressed repeatedly in favor of State sovereignty. Bank veto sentiments, so much reprobated by the Senator, seem not to have been so unfavorably considered by the people. I shall be very slow to believe the doctrines of the Senator, as endorsed by the late proclamation, are the popular sentiments of the people of the United States. Whenever the people shall pass upon the claims of the honorable gentleman to their favor, bottomed upon his much boasted correctness, it will be time enough to surrender long cherished opinions to the more powerful voice of public will. The sentiments of the President, expressed in his late proclamation, have not met with any countenance or support from one entire section, once his cordial and strong supporters. Honorable gentlemen mistake public sentiment south of the Potomac, if they suppose that they will enforce, at the point of the bayonet, the federal dogmas of the proclamation. Gentlemen from the tariff States have appealed most pathetically to the States adjoining, and similarly situated with South Carolina, to rally around the standard of their country, and maintain the supremacy of the law. They call spirits from the deep, but will they come? Will the Massachusetts militia, even to sustain their tariff interests, have no scruples as to the constitutional power of the President to order them beyond the line, or march them out of their own State?

Mr. FORSYTH replied, and said, he meant to say that the South Carolinians questioned the serious and sincere desire of the President to effect a revision and modification of the tariff. He did not admit that when a State rightfully resisted a law of Congress she was guilty of treason; it was, if successful, revolution. He further went on to say, the existing tariff was contrary to the spirit of the constitution.

Mr. MILLER, in reply, said, as soon as the Senator from Georgia admits that a State may rightfully resist a law of Congress, he was identified with the Carolina doctrine. On the constitutionality of the tariff, he said he had understood Georgia as taking a more decided objection than now intimated by her representative here. The Legislature of the State of Georgia had spoken on this subject in the most clear and unequivocal language. They had not used the qualified language of the Senator, but had declared that the tariff was a gross and palpable violation of the constitution. For one, he would say, if he believed the tariff unconstitutional, he should regard himself false to his oath to support the constitution, recreant to his country, and lost to all sense of public morals, if he were to vote for the use of military power to enforce such a law.

Before he would vote to sustain an admitted unconstitutional law by the sword, he would prefer that his tongue might be paralyzed.

Mr. BIBB then moved further to amend the bill, as follows:

Sec. 1, line 3, strike out the word "combination;" line 5, after "shall," insert "have;" line 6, strike out the words "in the judgment of the President;" line 15, after the word "paid," strike out the residue of the section, and insert "or secured to be paid according to law."

Sec. 2. Add the following: Provided always, That in any civil action, or criminal prosecution, authorized by this section, it shall and may be lawful for the defendant to rely upon, and give in evidence under the general issue, the fact that the revenue act of Congress of the United States, passed in 1832, entitled "An act to alter," &c. was not enacted solely for the purpose of raising revenue, but was enacted with a design and intent to assert and act upon a power in the Congress of the United States to lay duties and imposts for the substantive and direct purpose of protecting the manufactures of the United States against the competition of similar fabrics from all foreign countries, and may require the decision of the court distinctly to be put on record whether or not such a power of protection to manufactures is a power delegated to the General Government, or reserved to the States; and as the court shall decide that question, the judgment shall be for the plaintiff or defendant, prosecutor or prosecuted, according to the relevancy and effect of that question in the case: and such decision shall bind the parties in that case, subject, however, to be reviewed, affirmed, or reversed, in the Supreme Court of the United States, as the said question shall be ruled, and notwithstanding the value in the controversy may not amount to the value of two thousand dollars.

The Tariff.—Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

Strike out the third and fourth sections, and insert—[This substitute authorizes the collector, if resisted in the execution of his duty, to call on every male citizen above the age of twenty to his aid and assistance; likewise on the marshal of the district, who is authorized in part to call out every male citizen for the same purpose; and in case of the refusal of any citizen so to assist, a penalty is imposed not exceeding three hundred dollars, or three months' imprisonment.]

Two more sections followed, one of which provides that the United States' officers, if sued or indicted for any act done under the revenue laws, may plead the general issue, and give the several acts of the Congress of the United States in evidence; and the other adopts the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th sections of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee in the House of Representatives.

Sec. 6, line 7, after "places," insert "on land."

Mr. BIBB asked for the yeas and nays on the foregoing amendments, which were ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Calhoun, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Troup, Tyler.—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Buckner, Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright.—32.

So the amendments were rejected.

The CHAIR then put the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" which was decided in the affirmative, 32 to 8, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Buckner, Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright.—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Calhoun, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Troup, Tyler.—8.

The Senate then, at half after 11 o'clock, adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. CLAY, from the Select Committee to which was referred the bill to modify the several acts imposing duties on imports, reported the bill with various amendments.

Mr. C. then stated, that he was also authorized to say that at a proper time another amendment would be offered on the subject of the valuation of goods, which would be calculated to conciliate the conflicting opinions which had prevailed in reference to that point. He was happy to say that, although there was so short an interval for the action of the two Houses on this bill, the committee entertained strong hopes that it would be found practicable to effect some accommodation of this question before the close of the present session. He was directed to move that the amendments be printed, and further to move that the bill and amendments be made the special order for to-morrow, with the understanding that if the measure now pending before the Senate should not be disposed of by that time, the bill now reported would not be pressed to interfere with that discussion.

The amendments were then ordered to be printed, and the bill and amendments were made the special order for to-morrow.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate being about to pass to the third reading of the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports:

Mr. CALHOUN said, that as there seemed to be a desire to press this bill to its passage to-day, in order that the tariff might be taken up to-morrow, and as he was desirous to be heard on the resolutions which he had offered in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, he would now move the Senate to take up the resolutions, with a view to make them the order for Monday next.

The motion being agreed to, the resolutions were taken up, and made the order for Monday next.

Mr. WILKINS then gave notice that it was the intention of the friends of the bill to press the passage of the bill this day.

The bill was then read a third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. POINDESTER rose to address the Senate.

It was with no feigned reluctance, he said, that he rose to mingle in this discussion. The feeble state of his health, and the restless impatience manifested by a fixed majority to urge this measure to its final consummation, regardless of the fatal consequences that might flow from it, ought to have admonished him to remain silent. But an imperious sense of duty to his immediate constituents, as well as to the great body of the American people, impelled him to undertake the task of exposing to them the real character of the bill before the Senate, and the novel and dangerous principles which had been avowed by its advocates as the basis on which it rested for support. I cannot hope, said Mr. P., that any effort of mine will operate to arrest the action of this body; but the people, whose future peace and happiness, and every thing dear to them, is involved in the issue of this great struggle, may find in the investigation of this subject the means of arriving at proper conclusions in relation to it. I feel the responsibility of the position which I occupy. I know how vain it would be to indulge the belief that, with the simple weapons of reason and of truth, I could overcome the dumb eloquence of numbers, so forcibly displayed in this hall, arrayed in solid phalanx to carry into effect purposes of desolation and blood, which can neither be mistaken nor obviated, save only by the deleterious results which may be felt in all their fury, by a reaction on the heads of those who have contributed to put this ball of civil discord in motion. Under such discouraging circumstances, I must be permitted to say, that my views of this momentous question will be addressed to the calm and dispassionate consideration of a free and enlightened people, who alone can control the movements of this Government; and I wish it to be distinctly understood that I expect not, hope not, and mean not, to make an impression within these walls.

The theory of nullification, so freely denounced, and so much deprecated by honorable Senators who have preceded me in this debate, it is not my purpose at present to examine. When consolidation and the total prostration of the last vestige of State sovereignty is made the desideratum on which alone the Union can be perpetuated, I mean not to cavil about the remedy by which so great an evil may be averted. If, sir, I am left to choose between a total overthrow of the happy system erected by the wisdom of the patriots who framed the constitution, and some efficient remedy to maintain it, I will not hesitate in the course which duty and patriotism so plainly indicate.

Sir, in the downward course of events connected with the political history of this country, when power, by a long series of imperceptible advances on the fundamental law of the republic, has reached a climax which almost overshadows the temple of liberty, and threatens to extinguish the patriot's last hope in this highly favored land, the occasion demands of me one effort, however feeble and ineffectual, to arrest the strong arm which seems to aim a fatal stab at the vital principles of our confederacy, and the free constitution which cements it.

Revenue Collection Bill.

We have been taught, by experience, the useful lesson, that the love of power is inseparable from the nature of man; and we know that Governments composed of men partake largely of its influence; and whensoever the vigilance of the people shall slumber under the sedative poison of unlimited and misplaced confidence, their destinies will very soon find a resting-place among the tombs of the republics of antiquity, whose downfall may be ascribed to the triumph of ambitious demagogues over a people claiming to be free, but who placed their reliance on the frailty of human virtue. The history of the civilized world, from the earliest ages up to the present moment, affords to this generation abundant proofs that liberty can only be preserved by a people jealous of their rights; who stand on the watch-towers, and challenge every invasion of them with eyes that never wink, and hearts that never falter. In the tempest of popular commotions, by which the vessel of state is sometimes tossed from its peaceful channel till the sky is clear and the elements become tranquil, we find salutary warning to the mariner at the helm, to guard against the rocks and shoals by which he may be surrounded. Such is the price which a free people pay for the preservation of human liberty; and although the even current of Governments may be interrupted by these occasional convulsions, they serve to protect the unalienable rights of freemen against the arts of power and ambition, seeking their overthrow by force or fraud, to build on their ruins the strong edifice of regal prerogative. Under the calm of undisturbed confidence, when the public mind cannot be aroused to a sense of impending dangers, but, reposing in false security, denounce the faithful sentinel who warns his countrymen of the snares which are spread for their destruction, some popular leader may well mount the ramparts, and, assuming the seductive guise of disinterested patriotism, grasp the imperial diadem. When a whole people, influenced by such specious professions, too readily commit their dearest privileges to the umirage of one man, whose claims to their gratitude for past services are felt and acknowledged, they cannot fail to be led into errors and excesses from which there is no escape but through the tumult and desolation of a bloody revolution.

No people can long remain free who quietly submit to oppression, and hug the chains of despotism which bind them to the car of a popular dictator. Sir, I spurn the slavish apathy which is calculated to disrobe a freeman of his birthright, and compel him to bow at the footstool of power and ambition; and I indignantly repel the proposition now made to place at the disposal of the Chief Magistrate, to be used at his discretion, the whole military and naval forces of the country, the avowed object of which is to subdue the proud spirit of a large portion of the American people. But, sir, I feel that resistance to the will of the combined majority who act in concert, on this occasion, must be unavailing; yet I will not despair of the republic while the voice of an enlightened people may interpose to preserve it.

Mr. P. said he had often been amused by an honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES,] with his descriptive lists of what are called Jackson men in this and the other House of Congress. He thought the honorable Senator had classed them under the various and conflicting heads of tariff and anti-tariff, bank and anti-bank, internal improvements and anti-internal improvements, State rights and anti-State rights; to which, by the permission of the honorable gentleman, he would add another class of new recruits, who may be designated as "proclamation Jackson men," who, though last, are not least in the catalogue composing this formidable corps. They, like all new converts, evince a disposition to overreach in zeal all their competitors for Executive favor, and, like Pharaoh's "lean kine," threaten to eat out the substance of their fat predecessors! If a combination of such talents, influence, and numbers shall be unable to maintain the majesty of the laws, aided by the strong arm of the Executive, it would at least be an omen that our legislation had not been founded on the principles of equal and impartial justice. Of this he would speak more particularly hereafter.

I will (said Mr. P.) proceed to examine some of the provisions of this bill in connexion with the existing laws authorizing the President to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, in order to place the measure in a clear light, when I shall contrast it with the principles of the constitution. The due execution of the laws of the Union, made in pursuance of the constitution, is an object from which no gentleman, whatever might be his political opinions, would dissent. Such laws would find their best support in the virtue and patriotism of the people, and would, therefore, never require extraordinary means to enforce them. It has been said by the advocates of this bill that it is both peaceful and harmless, and confers less power on the Executive, in relation to the employment of physical force in cases of emergency, than the existing law on that subject. It has been eulogized as an expedient to preserve peace and avert the calamities of civil war, while I deprecate it as eminently calculated to produce precisely the opposite consequences. Is it then true that this bill confers no higher powers on the President than the act authorizing the employment of the militia of the several States to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions?" Let this be tested by a reference to that part of the act which is now on our statute book, and which I beg leave to read to the Senate. [Here Mr. P. directed the Secretary to read the act of 1795.]

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any State against the Government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress."

Mr. President, I ask what are the cases to which the President of the United States is limited under the act which has just been read? He cannot call out the militia, or even issue a proclamation, until he is called on by the Legislature of a State, if in session, and, if not, by the Governor, for aid and assistance to suppress an insurrection which is too powerful to be overcome by the physical power of the State. He cannot interpose the power granted to him to aid the civil authority in the execution of the laws, until he shall have received the certificate of a district judge that such interposition is absolutely necessary, in consequence of combinations, or assemblages of persons, with the avowed intent of resisting the process of the court or the laws of the Union. Such are the limitations on the powers of the President, under the act of 1795, which had been read at the table of the Secretary. They are salutary checks on the exercise of this power, designed to operate in the furtherance of justice and the preservation of order, in co-operation with the judicial tribunals or the constituted authorities of the States. Compare these, I beseech you, sir, with the first section of the bill, which we are told curtails the power of the President in this respect. It will be seen, at once, that for all the guards in the existing law the arbitrary will of the President is substituted. His judgment and discretion are made supreme, and cannot be controlled by any other authority whatever. No call from the State Legislatures or Executives, no certificate from a district judge, is required to enable him to call forth the militia; but he is made the sole judge of the necessity, and has the unlimited power to determine what shall constitute an unlawful assemblage of persons, to justify the employment of military force; which he is authorized to organize and put in motion by virtue of the high powers with which he is invested, against the consent, and without the co-operation, of any department of the State Governments. Sir, his powers are as wide as human language can make them, differing essentially from those conferred by any former legislation on this subject.

If this bill is not intended to clothe the President with the new and extraordinary power of marching an army into South Carolina, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary, is worse than useless. By the act of 1795 he could not enter the State with an armed force, but on the application of the Legislature or the Executive; and the militia of the State could not be called out for any purpose without the approbation of the Governor, or by the authority of the Legislature. It is therefore manifest that this peace measure is nothing more nor less than a power conferred on the President to make war on the legislation of a sovereign State of the confederacy. For all the purposes enumerated in the constitution, it must be obvious to every gentleman that this bill was wholly unnecessary. The powers of the President are enlarged beyond all former example; they cover the whole ground of undefined discretion, to enable him to place the physical force of the country in hostile array against the State of South Carolina. But this is not the only novel feature in this war bill. The President is authorized, at his discretion, to confide the execution of high constitutional powers, which can only be intrusted to that officer, to any person whatever whom he may depute or appoint for that purpose. Thus, he may designate some petty custom-house officer, at any of the ports of the United States, to decide the delicate question, when the contingency shall have happened requiring the exercise of the power to call forth the militia! This custom-house officer may be authorized to order the militia into actual service; to issue his mandate—to whom? To the Governor of the State? Who is to command the militia so called out? How is it to operate? Not under the orders of the President of the United States, but under those of any person whom he may appoint for that purpose. Will any gentleman seriously contend that the constitution warrants this transfer of the highest executive power under this Government? Sir, the proposition is monstrous, and cannot be endured by any portion of the American people. But the intention of this bill is not what it purports to be. It is one of those deceitful acts of legislation, which seems to be confined and particularly adapted to the laws for the protection of domestic manufactures, commencing with the act of 1824, and running through all the laws subsequently enacted to carry out the system of protection. It speaks in general terms of the ports and harbors of the United States—of all the twenty-four States of the confederacy; but how has it been argued? We have heard nothing in this whole debate but South Carolina—South Carolina—nullification—nullification. This has constituted the theme on which the advocates of the bill have dwelt; and yet on the face of the bill it is equally applicable to every State in the Union! This wide scope given to the President over the militia of the States of the Union, without limitation or restraint, was evidently necessary to effect the object of marching a militia force from one State into another in time of peace, when none of the contingencies had arisen specified in the constitution and the laws, as they now exist in the statute book. The judgment of the President is made the rule, and he may, at his own good will and pleasure, determine the character of assemblages of persons, declare them unlawful, however peaceable and constitutional; fix in his own mind what acts amount to unlawful obstructions or combinations to prevent the execution of the revenue laws, and forthwith put in requisition the army, and navy, and militia of the United States; remove the custom-house to such place as he may designate; demand that the duties be paid in cash; and enforce his mandates at the point of the bayonet. And yet this high-handed measure, under which the President may commence and carry on military operations within the State of South Carolina at any moment when he may deem it proper to do so, without the happening of any event made necessary by law to justify such a proceeding, is defended on this floor as peaceable, and in accordance with the powers conferred on him by the constitution and laws of the United States now in force.

Sir, what are the facts? Has any thing occurred in South Carolina dangerous to the public peace? Has any offence been committed by her citizens? Has the Legislature or Governor called on the President for aid and assistance to put down insurrection or rebellion? Has the district judge certified that the laws cannot be executed in the ordinary way? No, sir, it is not pretended that any act of violence has been committed, calling for the exercise of extraordinary means to resist or subdue it. What, then, is the basis of this hostile movement on the State of South Carolina? Most certainly to compel her to retrace her steps; to annul a fundamental law of the State; and, by military force, to overawe her Legislature, and demand the repeal of certain offensive laws which the President has thought proper to condemn and denounce as treason against the United States. State legislation, primary and secondary, must be put down by violent means, and the President clothed with the powers of a dictator, to enable him to fulfil his kind promises to his "children!" Is this the free Government handed down to us by our fathers, who so gallantly achieved the independence of these States? No, sir; if the doctrine of the present day prevail, and this bill be passed and put into practical operation, we live under a Government of unmixed despotism. We are told of an armed force in South Carolina. There is no such thing. She has, it is true, passed laws to reorganize her militia, which she had a perfect right to do, in common with every other State in the Union, without giving just cause of offence or apprehension to her sister States. Sir, has it come to this, that a sovereign State of this confederacy cannot enact laws to organize and discipline her militia, without being liable to the odious imputations of treason and rebellion? Can such laws be made the foundation of powers so enormous as those with which it is now proposed to invest the Chief Magistrate, in the execution of which powers he is only limited by his own arbitrary discretion; and under which he may enter the State, at the head of his army, and demand the repeal of them as a sine qua non to the withdrawal of his forces? These are the facts and the principles on which alone this bill of pains and penalties can be defended, unless honorable gentlemen draw on their imaginations for their premises, and on their ingenuity for their conclusions. There is no military force enlisted and paid by the State of South Carolina; she, like every other State, must rely on her militia for her defence against every assault, external or internal. Have not the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut a well-organized militia? Do they not rely on them for protection, and the preservation of their rights against a foreign foe, or domestic intrusion? If my information be correct, these States can, at the tap of the drum, call into the field, at a moment's warning, the best organized and most efficient militia in the world. Would they hesitate to employ this force on any emergency which might threaten their safety? No one can doubt that they would not. And yet, sir, this constitutes the military array in South Carolina, of which we have heard so much, calling for the concentration of the army and navy in the port and harbor of Charleston to suppress it. There is nothing in the State to excite the fears or apprehensions of the General Government. She has legislated, and that is all. It is, therefore, most evident that if we operate on her by means of a military power, it must be for the purpose of enforcing the proclamation of the President, which demands the abrogation of the ordinance and laws enacted by the sovereign authority of the people, and for which she can only be responsible in her character as one of the parties to the compact of Union.

Can this Government, of limited and defined powers, interfere with, or control, by the exertion of its military power, the internal action of a State in its highest sovereign capacity? This is a grave question, and I shall presently give it a full and fair examination. Sir, by what authority did the President of the United States put forth his proclamation, promulgating only political dogmas under the broad seal, with denunciations against all who should be guilty of the crime of non-conformity to his new views of the constitution? Can any gentleman point to the law on which this extraordinary state paper is founded? I presume not; for, if there be such a one, it has escaped my observation. It has a strong resemblance to a Pope's bull, from which none of the church may dare to dissent, without incurring the vengeance of the Almighty.

The President reads to the people of South Carolina a political lecture, in the nature of a 4th of July oration, and a very bad one too, in which he demands their concurrence, and admonishes them, by virtue of his high prerogative, as a father giving advice to his children, to compel the convention to re-assemble and repeal their ordinance; and, in like manner, to require their Legislature to repeal the laws which they have enacted to carry this ordinance into effect. A non-compliance with this demand is threatened with the most signal punishment. Sir, if the President has power to impose his constructions of the constitution on the world; to give them the force and effect of law; to record them in the Department of State, under his sign-manual, for the instruction of his successors; he might, with equal propriety, appoint political preachers, propagandists, whose duty it should be to inculcate his orthodox principles of government throughout the Union, and pay them out of the public treasury. But this extra-official document owes its origin, in reference to the political heresies which it contains, to the speech of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] delivered in this body in 1830, on what was familiarly called "Foot's resolutions." These principles had never before been avowed by any political party in this country. They leave the old federal school far in the rear in their ultra-consolidation tendencies, and were for the first time introduced to the notice of the American people in the speech of the honorable Senator to which I have referred. Sir, although I accord to the Senator much credit for his labored effort to overturn the well-settled principles of the constitution, and to change this simple confederation of States into a popular Government of unlimited powers, I am very sure that the honorable Senator never dreamed that those doctrines were so soon to be canonized, and find a place among the records of the Department of State, under the sanction of the broad seal, and the signature of the Chief Magistrate. But, sir, we now see that such was the fortunate destiny which awaited the speech of the honorable Senator. He finds himself suddenly translated into the company of his former political antagonists, and, like Asmodeus when he found himself in a church, may well look around him with astonishment, and wonder how he came there.

Sir, this singular proclamation is mandatory in its character. It speaks this language to the people of South Carolina: "If you agree with me in opinion, all's well; if not, you shall be punished by the strong arm of power, and more particularly your leaders, on whom I charge all your errors." Let me suppose an interview to take place between the President of the United States and some obstinate State rights citizen of South Carolina. The former reads this proclamation, and then he asks the latter, "Do you concur with me in opinion?" The citizen replies, "Sir, I do not." Upon which he receives a gentle slap on the face, and the question is repeated. Again, the answer is, "Sir, I do not assent to your doctrines." He receives a blow which fells him to the ground. "Do you now presume to deny the accuracy of my opinions?" "Sir," the astonished citizen replies, "I claim the privilege of a freeman, and utterly reject your doctrine as false and unfounded." What next? "Off with his head, so much for Buckingham."

"To be hung for treason is a common evil,
To die for false opinions is the devil."

Will the high-minded freemen of South Carolina bow to this imperial dictation, menaced as they are by the presence of a military force to humble them into obedience? I am much mistaken if they do.

Having taken this concise view of the military features of the bill, I proceed to the analysis which has been given of the origin of the Government founded on the political history of the country from the commencement of the revolution up to the time of the adoption of the federal constitution. This review is rendered necessary by the course of reasoning drawn from a misrepresentation of facts, which has been resorted to by the advocates of the theory of consolidation, to establish the position that the people of the United States, since the Declaration of Independence, have been governed as one consolidated mass, and that they now constitute a single nation, within which the States are mere corporate bodies, possessing only municipal powers, without the high attributes of sovereignty. It is not my intention to fatigue the Senate by a particular reference to official documents which might be applicable to this part of the subject, but shall pass rapidly over the early events of the revolution, to demonstrate that this new theory cannot be supported by a recurrence to the true character of the Union, formed between the several States at that eventful period. The proclamation of the President, concocted and matured, doubtless, by his constitutional advisers, assumes for the Federal Government supreme powers; and to sustain this postulat, carries us back to our colonial dependence on the parent country. This state paper is not more remarkable for its political sophistry than for the wretched caricature which it presents of historical facts connected with the revolution. It affirms, 1. That under the crown of Great Britain, prior to the Declaration of Independence, "we were known in our aggregate character as the United Colonies of America." 2. That by the Declaration of Independence "we declared ourselves one nation by a joint, not by several acts." 3. That the confederation was "a solemn league of several States, by which they agreed that they would collectively form one nation." But this is subsequently qualified by the admission that under the confederation "we could scarcely be called a nation." 4. That the constitution of the United States was made in the name and by the authority of the people of the United States, whose delegates formed, and whose conventions approved it. 5. That the President and Vice President, and members of both Houses of Congress, represent the whole people of the United States, to whom they are responsible, and not the particular States or districts in which they are chosen.

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

Now, sir, (said Mr. P.) I maintain precisely the converse of all these propositions, in their whole extent. They conform, almost to the letter, with the principles advanced for the first time in this country by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in the memorable debate to which I have already referred. He, it is true, does not carry his principles of consolidation quite so far as the President does in his proclamation; but they are so nearly allied, that any attempt to discriminate between them would be superfluous. Kindred of the same family, they might almost be considered of common parentage. Is it then true that we were known as the United Colonies of America under the British crown? No, sir; every page of our history contradicts it. The earliest dawn of the revolution made its appearance in the colony of Massachusetts. Other colonies had exhibited symptoms of discontent, and resolutions were passed in their assemblies and popular meetings, indicating their dissatisfaction of the arbitrary and oppressive acts of the British Parliament. But the distinguished honor belongs to Massachusetts to have taken the lead in measures of resistance. She gave the first impetus to the ball of the revolution; the battles of Concord and Bunker's Hill attest the fortitude, patriotism, and bravery of her people, in which they successfully contended, almost single-handed, with the disciplined troops of the mother country. Partial leagues, for common defence, were very soon formed with the neighboring colonies, and committees of correspondence were appointed, to bring those more distant into the common cause. We are told by Mr. Jefferson, that the messengers of Massachusetts and Virginia passed each other on their way, bearing similar propositions, to produce a concert of feeling and of affection in opposition to their oppressors. These bold measures had very soon their desired effect, and a general Congress from most, if not all the colonies, assembled at Philadelphia, to consult on the means best calculated to meet the emergency, and provide for the safety of the whole. This body of patriotic men were appointed, in some instances, by the Colonial Legislatures, and in others by assemblages of the people, without regard to form, or to the general suffrages of the inhabitants of the colonies which they professed to represent. They were united only by a sense of common danger; but, in all other respects were separate and distinct, wholly independent of each other; in which character they acted on their own convictions and responsibility. This was our condition prior to the Declaration of Independence. For some purposes the colonies acted together, but without any other obligation to continue so to act, distinct from the interest which each had in throwing off their allegiance to the British monarch. It remains to be seen how far the Declaration of Independence changed the relative condition of the colonies towards each other. It was "a declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled," each acting for itself, with full power to dissent from the measure, without incurring the displeasure of those who might think proper to adopt it. It was, therefore, a joint and several act, and the parties to it became bound by their own voluntary consent. It declares, in express terms, "that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free, sovereign, and independent States." To make the instrument correspond to the character given to it by the proclamation, the appropriate language would have been, "that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, a free and independent nation." But it was not so in fact, nor was it so considered by the patriots who signed it. Can this be doubted by any one who will take the trouble to look at the manner in which the war of the revolution was conducted? As one nation, all who fought under our flag would have been responsible to the common head, and entitled to demand compensation for their services out of the general fund. And was it so? Certainly not. Each State had its separate army, organized, equipped, and paid out of the separate fund of each; and what was then called the continental army, and that only, was paid out of the general fund. Many of the States, having waste and unappropriated lands, made large grants of their domain to the officers and soldiers of the militia who were called into service for the defence of the State.

This single fact, if it stood alone, is abundantly sufficient to show that the States retained their separate and individual sovereignty, while each contributed its just proportion, both in men and money, to accomplish the glorious result. From the declaration itself, which announces to the world that "these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free, sovereign, and independent States," and from the manner in which the war was prosecuted, am I not warranted in the conclusion that we were not looked upon, either at home or abroad, as one nation? Had this been the construction put upon the Declaration of Independence by those who signed it, we should have heard nothing of State troops as a distinct body of men, but the whole army must, of necessity, have been deemed national.

It has been reserved for the political jugglers of the new school to discover the hidden secret that we achieved our independence as one nation; and thereby to bring into contempt and derision the "proud sovereignty of the States."

I will make only a few remarks on the articles of confederation. These are designated as a "league of several States, by which they collectively agreed that they would form one nation;" but, in a subsequent paragraph of the same paper, it is said that under their operation "we could scarcely be called a nation." It may be asked, with great force and propriety, if, by the Declaration of Independence, we became one nation, whence the necessity of forming a union of States, by adopting the articles of confederation? These articles were not binding on the States until they were acceded to by the Legislature of each State, acting in its sovereign capacity. They were not finally accepted by the concurrence of all the States, until the year 1781, more than three years after they had been submitted for ratification. By the second article of confederation, "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence." Could they retain that which they did not possess before? I deem it needless to multiply reasoning on this subject; a bare recital of the facts will satisfy all candid men that this novel idea of our forming one nation is perfectly absurd and ridiculous. We declared ourselves free and independent States. As such, the articles of confederation were entered into, which expressly declare that the sovereignty, freedom, and independence, possessed by each State prior to their adoption, were retained.

It may well be said that under these articles of confederation we could "scarcely be called a nation;" for, in fact, we were not so; but we were united then, as we are now, by a compact binding on each separate community to the extent of the delegated powers.

This view of our political condition is strongly enforced by the treaty of peace made with Great Britain at the conclusion of the war. It is a remarkable fact, that our independence was acknowledged, not as one nation, but as distinct, independent sovereignties, named in the treaty itself. And having thus treated with the crown of Great Britain, the view which was entertained at the time of our political condition can no longer remain doubtful. If we had, indeed, declared ourselves one nation, we should have treated in that character; but there is not in the records of the country one solitary fact which in the remotest degree warrants the assertion, that the several States who were parties to the Declaration of Independence, ever did, or intended, by any act whatever, to disrobe themselves of their sovereignty.

Revenue Collection Bill.

As colonies of Great Britain, we were separate and distinct, owing a common allegiance to the crown; we declared ourselves independent as States, we confederated as States, we retained this distinctive character throughout the revolutionary struggle; as such, our independence was acknowledged, and we were introduced into the family of nations as a confederated republic. Thus we commenced our political career; and the only remaining subject of inquiry is, have the States, by a voluntary surrender of their sovereignty, created a General Government, supreme in its structure, overwhelming in its influence, and against the action of which no State can interpose its authority but by resorting to the natural and inherent right of revolution?

It is my purpose now to examine this important question, than which none has ever arisen, or can arise, in the practical operation of the Government, more deeply interesting to the American people. On this point hangs the perpetuity of the Union, and the brightest hopes of human liberty throughout the civilized world. Is this a popular Government, wielding without restraint or limitation the destinies of the country? If so, the free institutions of which we have so long and so justly boasted have been misunderstood by all who participated in their establishment.

I had supposed that if there was any thing connected with our complicated system clearly settled by general acquiescence, it was the source from which the power of the Government sprang, and the real parties to the constitutional compact. The phrases which are familiar to all who speak of the Government, would seem to leave no room for doubt on this subject. The term "federal," which every one applies to the constitution, means league or compact; union is the joining together of separate bodies or communities; ergo, the United States form a Federal Government, league, or compact. The effort to overthrow all the checks and balances, which have been so carefully interposed to preserve the purity of the system against usurpations of power, and to render the Government supreme, by tracing its origin to the people as a consolidated mass, was reserved for the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who has been so fortunate, in the transmutations of political parties, within the last four years, as to gain for those bold innovations the sanction of the individual who now "rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm." It is assumed in the proclamation that the constitution was "formed in the name and by the authority of the people of the United States, whose delegates framed, and whose conventions approved it."

The Senator from Massachusetts has entered into the defence of these broad principles, and has given to the Senate a revision of his former speech, delivered in 1830. I will not attempt to draw the line of distinction, if there be any, between the opinions of the Senator and the official recognition of them by the President, but shall consider them as comprising one undivided view of the questions to which they relate. The Senator says: "I hold this to be a popular Government, erected by the people; those who administer it responsible to the people; and itself capable of being amended and modified, just as the people may choose that it should be. It is popular, just as truly emanating from the people as the State Governments." Again, he says: "We are here to administer a constitution emanating immediately from the people. It is not the creature of the State Governments; nay, more, if the whole truth must be told, the people brought it into existence, established it, and have supported it, for the very purpose, among others, of imposing salutary restraints on State sovereignties. The people, then, sir, erected this Government. No State law is to be valid which comes in conflict with the constitution or any law of the United States." I have deemed it proper to place these extracts from the speech of the Senator in juxtaposition with the proclamation, to show that I have not mistaken the strong resemblance which they bear to each other. Sir, is it true that this is a popular Government, erected by the people, and subject to be amended and modified as the people may choose it should be? Let the history of the constitution answer. In what manner shall we fix the nature and character of the Government? Not by the extent of the powers conferred on it in the instrument by which it was formed, but by a recurrence to the authority which established and put it in motion. If it was brought into existence by the people, no one can deny that it would be strictly a popular Government. If it owes its origin to a league, compact, or concessions of power between separate political communities, without regard to the powers delegated, it is to all intents and purposes a Federal Government; and although the constitution in some of its features may be executed by the popular will, the original character of the Government is not thereby changed. I will suppose, in illustration of these positions, that we still remained a part of the British empire, and derived our form of government from the charter of the crown; if, in such a charter, all the principles of the constitution under which we now live were incorporated, and we were in the full enjoyment of all the freedom which it secures to us, it must be admitted that it would nevertheless be a colonial Government, deriving its character from the grantee, and not from the enumeration of the powers granted.

I have been induced to make these remarks, because it has been contended, in the progress of this debate, that we must look into the constitution of the United States, and from its various provisions determine whether the Government which it created is derived from the States or the people. The Senator from Massachusetts affirms that "the Government was erected by the people." I maintain that it was the work of the States, in their sovereign capacity, from its inception to the period when it was put into full operation. I appeal to a well known historical fact in support of my position.

The defects of the confederation have been so often referred to, and so fully disclosed, that I deem it unnecessary to trouble the Senate by going into a further examination of them. Experience had shown that the powers conferred upon Congress were not sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all the general objects connected with our foreign relations—the regulation of commerce; the payment of the debt of the revolution; and the preservation of internal tranquillity. Impressed with a necessity of extending these powers, and forming a more perfect system of government, the old Congress, by a resolution bearing date the 21st day of February, 1787, recommended the appointment of delegates by the Legislatures of the several States, to meet in Philadelphia, for the purpose of revising and amending the articles of confederation, and forming a constitution, adequate to the exigencies of Government, and the preservation of the Union. The people were not consulted, and had no agency whatever in this movement. The Congress, by which it was proposed to appoint delegates to a general convention, did not directly represent the people of the several States. But the Legislatures adopted the recommendation, and elected delegates to the convention, which assembled in Philadelphia, on the 25th May, 1787. This body was neither chosen by, nor responsible to, the people. No authority was vested in the convention to form a constitution, and give it effect, or even to send it to the people for their consideration and adoption. The plan of a constitution, however, was formed, claiming in its preamble to have been authorized by the people of the United States. Such was not the fact; the whole proceedings up to this period amounted to nothing more than an effort between the States, as political sovereignties, to amend the articles of confederation, and erect a Government better calculated to conduct our foreign intercourse, and execute those general powers which were necessary to the welfare of the whole, and to form a more perfect union of the States. The articles of the constitution, thus agreed on, were binding on no one; they were transmitted to a Congress for its consideration, on whose recommendation the Legislatures of the States made provision for calling the convention, to whom the plan was submitted for ratification. During all these incipient proceedings, we hear not one word of the people. The States acted in their federative character, in the organization of the general convention; the Congress, who gave the first impulse to the measure, represented the States, and not the people. Is it not, then, absurd, to allege, in the face of these undeniable truths, that the constitution emanated "immediately from the people;" that this Government was "erected by the people," when every official document, connected with the transaction, contains unequivocal evidence that such declarations are without the shadow of foundation to support them.

Could not the Legislatures of six of the States have defeated the constitution, by refusing or neglecting to pass the necessary laws authorizing the call of conventions to ratify it? Most certainly they could. The ratification of nine States was requisite to put the system in operation; without the concurrence of these the whole scheme must have failed, although it had been approved by three-fourths of the people of the United States. The action of the Legislatures of the several States was essential to impart life and vigor to the constitution, which, without their co-operation, must have remained a dead letter. The people were not allowed an opportunity to approve or disapprove of the contemplated reform in the Federal Government; they might, indeed, have heard that such a project was in progress, but they were not permitted to speak until the good work was finished; then, and not until then, they were required to repair to the polls, and choose delegates to State conventions, to which the plan was submitted. Both the Congress of 1787 and the convention at Philadelphia, as I have already shown, were removed from popular responsibility. The Legislatures of the respective States, and they only, represented the people, as separate communities, but their constituents had not instructed them on the subject of this new form of government. Sir, I must be permitted to express my surprise that, in the face of these undeniable facts, the bold declaration should have been made, in grave state papers and learned speeches, that this constitution emanated from the whole people of the United States; and as a corollary, that the Government which it established is popular, and not federal. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has admitted that the articles of confederation constituted a league or compact between the States, by which each retained its sovereignty and independence; but he insists that the constitution, coming directly from the people, and approved by them, amounts to a voluntary surrender of this sovereignty to a Government pervading the whole, with supreme and paramount powers, in the execution of which, the only check that can be interposed against the exercise of usurped powers is to be found in the will of the majority. If this be true, then the limitations specified in the constitution, for the express purpose of restraining the action of the Government, and thereby protecting the rights of the minority, as the best security for the preservation of liberty and the purity of the system, are a mere mockery on the common sense of mankind. I agree with the honorable gentleman, that the confederation was a union between the States, founded on league or compact; and it would seem to follow, as a necessary consequence, that as the constitution was designed to form a more perfect union, the original league or compact remains unimpaired.

The great object intended to be accomplished by the new organization and extension of the powers of the Government, was to render it efficient for the purposes of a general administration, which would embrace all the great interests of the country, internal and external, leaving the States, as parties to the compact, precisely in their former condition, as separate political sovereignties, reserving to themselves the full enjoyment of all the powers, rights, and privileges which they had not thereby expressly delegated. The States were the grantees of power under both systems. If it be true, as I admit it to be, that the people of each State, in convention, ratified the constitution, it is equally true that the same people, represented in their legislative bodies, adopted the articles of confederation. There is no substantial difference in either case, as to the mode in which the popular will was ascertained. Hence, I arrive at the conclusion, that if the constitution of the United States can with propriety be said to have emanated from the people, the articles of confederation have just as high a claim to that distinction. If there be any discrimination, it consists in this only, that the one was a Union imperfectly formed, and the other a Union similar in its character, disrobed of the imperfections of the former system. The idea cannot be credited that the States ever intended to commit an act of self-immolation, to part with their sovereignty and independence, and place themselves in the attitude of dependent corporations, subject to the uncontrolled discretion of one consolidated empire. No, sir; their sole object was to create an agency for their mutual benefit, and to vest in it the necessary powers to provide for their common defence and general welfare, without departing in the slightest degree from the old federal basis to which they had ever adhered with such jealous vigilance and pertinacity. But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has said that he will look no farther than the constitution itself for the source from which the powers of the Government are derived; and, from some expressions in the instrument, he draws the conclusion that it is not a compact between the States, but a noun substantive, "a Government erected by the people," in which they are individually represented, and to which they owe an allegiance paramount to all other social obligations. He has dwelt with emphasis on the words with which the preamble of the constitution commences: "We, the people of the United States." From the arbitrary use of these words, he infers that, as sovereignty is an attribute belonging exclusively to the people, they have, by their own act, transferred and vested it in the Government of the United States. He rests on the inference against the fact; I rely on the fact against the inference; and submit the issue to the impartial judgment of an enlightened people. The convention assumed the name and authority of the people of the United States, in opposition to the commission under which they had assembled. They derived their authority exclusively from the States, as political communities; the Legislatures, by whom they were appointed, limited their powers simply to a revision of the articles of confederation.

Each State was equally represented in that body, without regard to population. Rhode Island and Delaware were placed on an equal footing with the large States of Virginia and Pennsylvania; and yet, against all these facts, recorded in the journal of their proceedings, they professed to act in the name and by the authority of the people. The constitution was not so formed, nor can it be so modified and amended. The people of the United States cannot change a single feature in the instrument, that power having been expressly confided to the Legislatures of the several States, with the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. The article of the constitution providing for amendments, and prescribing the mode in which they may be made, puts it in the power of three-fourths of the States, comprising less than one-third of the whole population, to change or modify the system against the will and the interests of the other States, having the physical strength to subdue and the numbers to control the small States, if it were indeed true that this Government rests on the popular suffrage. The principle assumed by the advocates of consolidation is repugnant to that part of the article to which I have referred, which provides that "no State shall, without its consent, be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." This federative feature is made perpetual, and cannot be changed without a total overthrow of the Government. Is not this permanent provision of the constitution strictly applicable to a Government federal in its origin, and which must ever remain so in its practical operations? Is it not wholly inconsistent with the opinion advanced by the honorable Senator, that the constitution may be "amended and modified just as the people may choose it should be?"

This is the ground on which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts rests his argument in favor of popular rights and consolidation, which, if it could be maintained, must at once put the constitution, in all its parts, without exception, in the power of a majority of the people of the United States, who might at any moment, by a combination of the large States, expunge the provision which secures to each State an equal representation in the Senate. These views of the origin of the Government, imperfect as I know them to be, will, I trust, satisfy all who are in search of truth, and who are disposed to examine this important subject with candor, that it did not originate with the people in their primary sovereign capacity; that, as such, it was not erected by them; that, in their aggregate character as one nation, they have no power to amend the constitution in any respect whatever; that it was formed by concessions of power from the States, as separate communities, and constitutes between them a compact of union which can exist only by their co-operation; and that, with the concurrence of three-fourths of the parties, it may undergo such modifications as may from time to time be found necessary to render the system more perfect.

I will now, sir, proceed to notice, very concisely, some objections that have been urged against this theory of the constitution. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has resorted to a verbal criticism on the word "accede," which is found in one of the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He says this is not a constitutional word, and is no where to be found in the debates and proceedings of the conventions by which the constitution was adopted. He deprecates the phrase as a dangerous interpolation, because he admits that, if the States acceded to the Union, it necessarily implies the correlative right to secede. My attention has been drawn, since I heard the remarks of the honorable gentleman, to the language of the statesmen who formed the constitution, and I find this precise word applied exactly in the sense which is so offensive to him. I will not multiply the references which I might make to the speeches of the most eminent members of the General and State conventions, to fortify myself on this point; it will be sufficient to show that the use of this word "accede" is coeval with the very inception of the constitution, and was familiar to and well understood by the members of the State conventions. I refer to Yates's Minutes of Debates in the General Convention, page 86. Mr. Martin, a member from Maryland, said: "When the States threw off their allegiance to Great Britain, they became independent of her and each other. They united and confederated for mutual defence, and this was done on principles of perfect reciprocity; they will now again meet on the same ground. But when a dissolution takes place, our original rights and sovereignties are resumed. Our accession to the Union has been by States." In the same page of these debates, Mr. Lansing, of New York, said: "I am clearly of opinion that I am not authorized to accede to a system which will annihilate the State Governments." Several other gentlemen used the same language; but, not wishing to fatigue the Senate, I pass on to the debates in the Virginia convention. Mr. Henry said: "Maryland did not accede to the confederation till the year 1781." Again: "Give me leave to say that, if the smallest States in the Union were admitted into it after having unreasonably procrastinated their accession, the greatest and most mighty State in the Union will be easily admitted, when her reluctance to an immediate accession to this system is founded on most reasonable grounds." I might quote this word from the speeches and public papers of Governor Randolph, Mr. Madison, and many others, but I content myself with having shown that this proscribed word, "accede," is a "constitutional word," frequently used while the constitution was under consideration; and if it implies, as the honorable Senator seems to think, a right in the parties acceding to the Union to secede from it, I leave him to the full and free exercise of his acknowledged ingenuity to extricate himself from the dilemma into which he has fallen. He will not, I trust, persist, in the face of the high evidence I have adduced, to aver that this word was unknown to the patriots who formed the constitution. The States, it is true, in the resolutions of their respective conventions, use the term "ratify;" but, by the same act which ratified the constitution, they acceded to the Union, on the conditions therein expressly specified and defined. Sir, said Mr. P., I regard the existence of the States as separate political communities as the great conservative principle of the constitution, and the foundation on which the Union can alone be preserved. They ought to be cherished as pillars of strength in the temple of liberty; remove them, and the superstructure must tumble into one general heap of irretrievable ruin.

It has been well said by a distinguished statesman, to whom we are much indebted for the free institutions under which we live, that it is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution, that free Governments are to be preserved; and if this great country had not been already divided into States, that division must be made for the security of all its parts against unjust and arbitrary oppression. The powers which have been so wisely distributed among the several departments of this Government, and those reserved to the States, while each is confined within its proper orbit, are so effectually restrained by checks and balances, that no danger to civil liberty can ever arise but by encroachments which shall destroy the beauty and symmetry of the system. But, if the same extent of powers be lodged in one head, they would constitute the very essence of arbitrary government. The most important of these salutary checks on the exercise of usurped powers will be found in the State Governments, without whose interposition the weaker portions of the confederacy would very soon fall a sacrifice to the avarice and ambition of the stronger. It is essential to the preservation of our system, that each department should be kept separate and distinct, exercising only the powers confided to it, and subject to suitable restraints if it shall at any time attempt to encroach on those properly belonging to another. In this light I place the Governments of the several States, who, by a positive reservation, possess all the powers not expressly delegated to the General Government, which they created for the common benefit. I have said that the constitution is an existing compact between the States; that, as parties to it, they can and ought to judge of its infractions. On this principle depends the very existence of the confederacy. There can be no union, without parties between whom it was formed; and, if there be parties to any instrument, it is a compact or agreement binding on each, so far only as they have voluntarily consented to become bound. The amalgamation of all the States into one consolidated mass is the most direct and efficient dissolution of the Union which could be imagined. What, sir, are the arguments by which it is attempted to prove this a National Government, and thereby prostrate the State sovereignties? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has, on this point, reasoned in a circle. He says that the articles of confederation were a compact; that the constitution was formed as a compact, but, when approved by the people of the several States, and put in operation, it became a Government; and, from that moment, lost its original character. He has referred, in support of this novel idea, to the sixth article of the constitution, which declares that "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." The honorable gentleman read this article to prove that, inasmuch as the constitution is declared to be a law, the supreme law, therefore, on its final ratification by the States, it was no longer a compact, but a Government of the people, with powers co-extensive with the Union, of which it was the sole judge, and subject to no other control than the will of the majority, expressed through the medium of popular elections. "Who ever heard," says he, "of a compact constitution, or of a law founded on compact?" He thus endeavors to change the structure of the Government, by putting the powers contained in the grant above the grantees from whom they were derived.

What, sir, gave to the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, this high attribute of supremacy over the constitution and laws of the several States? Was it not the compact which, by the common consent of the parties, made them supreme to the extent of the powers delegated? The necessity of such an article is conclusive to show that, without it, the mere establishment of the Government would not have given to its acts supremacy over State laws. It was, therefore, by the mutual consent of the parties to the compact, that the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States were made supreme. It is the very essence of the compact which confers on them this exclusive character; but the honorable gentleman seems delighted and absorbed in the contemplation of the powers, while he totally overlooks the source from which they sprang. That which begins in compact cannot be changed by its final consummation. The contrary opinion is supported neither by reason nor precedent. If an individual possessed of a large estate divides it by his last will and testament among thirteen legatees, would it be said, after his death, that the instrument ceased to be a will, and became, by adoption, the act of the legatees? A proposition so absurd would not be listened to for a moment by any court of justice before whom the case might be brought; and yet, sir, it looks very much like the argument of the honorable Senator, according to which, the constitution, acknowledged to be entered into as a compact between the States, became the act of the people of the United States by its ratification! The edifice of the constitution rests on the solid foundation of contract or agreement between independent sovereignties; but the instant it begins to operate as the parties intended it should, the rock on which it reposes is removed, and the stupendous fabric moves supremely in the atmosphere, sustained by the majesty of its own strength, and menacing with inevitable destruction all who shall dare to approach it. Such is substantially the picture, presented to the Senate, of the charter which unites this great confederacy; it is a refinement of the imagination which cannot bear the scrutiny of reason and of candid investigation. But, to put this matter in a light still more clear and striking, I need only refer to the article of the constitution on which the honorable Senator relies to support his conclusions. In the same sentence which the Senator quotes to prove the constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, to be supreme, and therefore incompatible with the idea of a compact, (because it would be ridiculous to speak of a supreme compact,) I find that "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States," are put on an equal footing with the constitution itself, and are expressly declared to be the supreme law of the land. Will the honorable Senator from Massachusetts rise in his place and advance the proposition, that a treaty, although formed as a compact between the high contracting parties, becomes the supreme law when ratified, and from that moment it ceases to be compact, because it is ridiculous to speak of a supreme compact? I take it for granted that he will not so far compromise his elevated character, or the dignity of his station, as to hazard an absurdity so palpable. A treaty concluded between the United States and any foreign Power must, of necessity, be a compact; and its original character is not and cannot be merged in the constitutional provision which makes it the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. I ask, then, sir, if it be admitted, as it has been, that the constitution was formed as a compact between the States, who were parties to it, can any distinction, founded on legal reasoning, be drawn, which would disrobe it of that original character, not equally applicable to a treaty with a foreign Power? They are both expressly made the supreme law; and if, in consequence of that provision, the constitution ceased to be a compact after its ratification, it is obvious that, if the same words mean the same thing, a treaty also, on its ratification, would become a supreme rule of action, and could no longer be regarded as a compact. I call on the honorable gentleman, if he can, to distinguish the one case from the other. I understood the honorable gentleman to yield the right of the States to judge of a breach of the constitution, if it be an existing compact between them, which I cannot but hope has been already fully demonstrated; but if it be necessary to give to reason the adventitious aid of precedent, I have a rich fund of these on which to draw, commencing with the convention of 1787, and running through every subsequent exposition of the constitution given by the most enlightened members of that body.

It is not my intention to wade through the numerous state papers which recognise the constitution as an existing compact between the States—a bare compilation of them would fill a volume; but I shall present to the Senate a summary comprehending the objections urged against the constitution, founded on the apprehensions of many distinguished patriots who opposed it, that it might be construed to annihilate the sovereignty of the States, and the manner in which those objections were answered and explained. Concurring with Mr. Jefferson, whose letter to Mr. Gerry has been read by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Rives,] that the constitution ought to be received as it was explained by its friends, and not as its enemies characterized it, I rest on this ground, with perfect safety, the question of compact and State sovereignty. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts takes the broad principle for granted, that the ratification of the constitution by the people of the States, in their conventions, constituted a National Government, "erected by the people," with supreme powers; capable, by its laws, of binding the States in all cases whatsoever, and liable to no other restraint than the popular will. He avers that it was advocated by its friends as such, and so accepted by the several State conventions. I deny the premises of the honorable gentleman, both in form and substance, and appeal with confidence to the political annals of the country, to show that the sovereignty of the States was conceded, on all sides, to be a part of the system; and that the grant of powers created a federal league or compact, under definite limitations, and not a National Government, in the sense applied to it by the honorable Senator. In the general convention there were many who desired to establish a National Government, and some who would have created a limited monarchy. Propositions were made, embracing, to a certain extent, both those plans. The members from the large States were generally in favor of surrendering the sovereignty of the States, and enlarging the range of powers to be vested in the Government which they were about to erect; but the small States, having an equal vote with their powerful neighbors, saw the dangers to which they would be liable by an abandonment of their federative rights, and combined to preserve them, by retaining their original sovereignty. The resolutions submitted by Governor Randolph were national throughout; had they been incorporated in the constitution, and ratified by the States, then, indeed, this Government would have assumed a character decidedly national; but they were successfully resisted on this very ground, and so modified as to secure the independence of the smallest member of the confederacy. We are indebted to the firmness of the small States for all the restrictions contained in the constitution on the powers of this Government; without their interposition, the sovereignty of the States would have been swept away before the irresistible current of federal or national authority. They succeeded in the struggle, or, at any rate, thought themselves successful in guarding their reserved powers; or, rest assured, sir, this constitution would never have been acceded to by them. Rufus King, a distinguished member of that convention, a strong advocate of the constitution, a federalist of the ultra school, when he found that their efforts must fail if the State Governments were not properly secured and protected, gave to the system its true interpretation, in a very short speech, which I beg leave to read to the Senate. Mr. King said: "I am in sentiment with those who wish the preservation of State Governments; but the General Government may be so constituted as to effect it. Let the constitution we are about forming be considered as a commission under which the General Government shall act, and, as such, it will be the guardian of State rights." Sir, I should think myself fortunate if I could bring the doctrines of the dominant party, and their new allies, back to the standard of the federalists who participated in the formation of the constitution; I should certainly prefer sailing under the political flag of Jefferson and of Madison, as he was in 1798-9; but when I see the strides which are now made, by a union of avarice and ambition, to break down all the barriers of the constitution, and rear on its ruins a military despotism, I would gladly compromise, amidst the general wreck, by adopting the comparatively moderate creed of Rufus King, of Hamilton, of Ames, or even of the elder Adams, who fell under the weight of the alien and sedition laws, enacted during his disastrous administration. Mr. King, than whom no man understood better the force of words, says that the "constitution we are forming ought to be considered a commission, under which the General Government shall act." By whom was the commission granted? By the States, represented in the convention, as separate political communities. For what purpose? Assuredly, not to effect their own dissolution and destruction. No, sir. Mr. King tells us that, acting under this commission, the "Government will be the guardian of State rights." Who ever heard of a commission, from subordinate parts to a single nation, clothed with the omnipotent powers of the British Parliament? The crude idea which ordinary men entertain of a commission, is responsibility, on the part of him who takes it, to him who grants it; but we are now called on to invert the common understanding of mankind on this point, and render the party who accepts the commission supreme over the grantors from whom the authority is derived. But I will not dwell longer on the reference which I have made to the language of Mr. King, deeming it sufficiently plain to show the opinions of that great man on the subject to which it relates. But I turn to the journal of the convention for an authority which must forever put at rest the assumption that this Government was designed to form of the whole people one nation. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has bestowed a merited eulogium on the character and talents of Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut. He has read a paragraph from the speech of that gentleman delivered in the State convention, of which he was a member, to show that he regarded the Government as a national one. I confess, the part of the speech read to the Senate did not make the same impression on me that it seems it did on the mind of the honorable Senator; I saw nothing in it which I felt disposed to condemn. But, as I feel very sure that the authority of Mr. Ellsworth will have great weight in the adjustment of this question, I refer with confidence to his opinions, given in the most imposing form, in the proceedings of the convention held in Philadelphia.

Extract from Yates's Minutes.

"Wednesday, June 20, 1787.—Met, pursuant to adjournment. Present, eleven States.

"Judge Ellsworth.—I propose, and therefore move, to expunge the word 'national,' in the first resolve, and to place in the room of it 'Government of the United States;' which was agreed to, nem. con."

Thus, the convention, after the constitution had been fully discussed and nearly matured, unanimously expunged the word "national" from the first resolution offered by Governor Randolph, and thereby closed the door to all future controversy concerning the real character of the Government. We are familiarly called a nation; and, to some purposes, we may be properly so called. In all the foreign action of the Government, we are a single nation, one people, presenting one undivided front. If war with a foreign Power should break out, we defend our national honor and rights as one nation; treaties of commerce and navigation, with all the nations of the world, are entered into and executed by the United States of America, as one nation. The entire scope of our diplomatic intercourse is conducted as one nation. We share, in common, the dangers and the glory of our country. But when we look at home, into our domestic relations, our system is far otherwise. We exhibit a new and admirable structure of government, founded on free principles, composed of twenty-four distinct parts or communities, each independent of the other, confederated for certain great purposes, in the accomplishment of which each has an equal interest; and, for all other purposes, they remain in the full possession of their original rights and sovereignty.

We find, in all the debates on the constitution, the deepest solicitude manifested by those high-souled patriotic men who opposed its ratification, for the preservation of the State Governments. The fulfilment of their pre-ditions have been referred to as evidence of the true meaning of the constitution, and we are about to carry them out into full operation. The evil tendencies of the broad phrases in the constitution, which they deprecated, and for which they were laughed at as political enthusiasts, are now fast ripening into historical truths. Sir, who can doubt, that if the fears and apprehensions of Henry and Martin, and a host of others, had been generally received as sound constructions of the constitution, it would have been rejected nearly by every State in the Union? It was because their objections were explained away by the friends of the system, and more especially on the delicate point of State sovereignty, that the States (many of them reluctantly) ratified the constitution. Throughout the debates in the conventions of the States, there was a striking uniformity in the reasoning of the statesmen of that day who opposed the constitution, and almost the same uniformity on the part of its advocates in smoothing the way for its ratification. I will refer to a few examples on both sides of the question, from which it will be seen under what views and pledges the friends of the system recommended it to the people of the States. Mr. Henry, of Virginia, was, perhaps, the most formidable opponent of the new plan of Government, and the stoutest champion of State rights. I therefore quote from him a few passages. (See note A.)

This extraordinary man, animated by the purest impulses of patriotism and a devotion to liberty, which he so strongly manifested at the dawn of the revolution, looked on the powers conferred on the Federal Government with alarm and apprehension. He predicted that they would result in consolidation—the annihilation of State sovereignty—the establishment of military power to overawe the civil authorities of the country, and systems of exorbitant taxation, unequal, unjust, and oppressive. How far his predictions have been fulfilled, let the history of our legislation for a few years past testify. To the opinions of Mr. Henry, I beg leave to add those of Luther Martin, given in his celebrated exposé to the Legislature of Maryland, a few extracts from which I will now read to the Senate. (See note B.)

If the age of prophecy had not passed away; if men were permitted by the all-wise Creator to look into futurity, and speak a language applicable to the events of another generation, we might well imagine that Mr. Martin had anticipated the very measure now under consideration, and warned his fellow-citizens of its fatal consequences to their liberties. Yes, sir, we now see the prediction of Mr. Martin, in this respect, fulfilled to the letter. The very first case which has occurred under our system, where a State has thought it necessary to put her militia in a situation to “counteract the arbitrary measures of the General Government,” has been denounced as “rebellion and treason;” and the bill on your table proposes to put at the disposal of the commander-in-chief the army and navy, with a discretionary power to march at the head of his troops into the State, and subdue her into obedience to the laws, which she in her sovereign capacity has declared to be unjust, and unconstitutional, and oppressive beyond all reasonable endurance. Sir, it seldom happens that human reason, limited as it has been by divine wisdom, can penetrate through the vista of time, and point to remote consequences with such precision and accuracy as Luther Martin has done in that part of his exposition of the constitution to which I have referred. I might enlarge these references, but I forbear. The same views, in substance, were taken by the venerable George Clinton and his compatriots, in the convention of New York; by Findley and Smiley, in Pennsylvania; and they are also to be found in the debates of all the State conventions which have been published. How were they answered by the friends of the constitution? The Senator from Massachusetts has asserted that the enemies of the system gave to it the true construction; that it was so advocated by its friends, and ratified with a full and fair understanding on all sides; that it erected a supreme National Government; and the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHOYSEN] has said that one great object of the constitution was to “subdue the proud sovereignty of the States.” Now, sir, I utterly deny that the constitution was admitted to be liable to the constructions put on it at the time of its adoption by those who opposed it, or that the subjugation of the States was avowed as one of its objects. On the contrary, it will be seen, by a recurrence to the journals and debates, that the friends of the constitution insisted that the fears entertained and expressed by its opponents were wholly unfounded; that the State Governments constituted an essential part of the system, and must be preserved; that they had the means of protecting themselves against the exercise of usurped powers, and would be justifiable in doing so if Congress should, at any time, pass laws not falling within the obvious intent and meaning of the delegated powers. What is the language of Alexander Hamilton on this subject? (See note C.)

On the same subject I subjoin extracts from the answers made by Judge Wilson, in the convention of Pennsylvania, to members of that body who opposed the ratification of the constitution on the ground of its tendency to absorb, and ultimately to destroy, the State Governments. (See note D.)

I give also Mr. Madison's views, in the Federalist, a work comprehending a general commentary on the text of the constitution, in which he largely participated; the object of which was to render the system acceptable to the States, and to obviate objections which had been made against it. To this I add an extract from the speech of Mr. Madison, in reply to Mr. Henry, in the convention of Virginia; and with these I shall close the authorities on which I rely to show the light in which the constitution was explained and recommended by its most active and talented friends. (See note E.)

I have selected from the numerous sources to which I might have resorted, for similar opinions, the names of Hamilton, Wilson, and Madison, as they stood at the head of the original friends of the plan of Government, of which they were the most enlightened expounders. It will be seen, by a careful examination of the explanations given by those individuals, whose biography illustrates the American name, and whose fame will go down to the latest posterity as ornaments to our country, that they disclaimed the idea of consolidation—a single nation—military coercion on a sovereign State; and earnestly contended that, under the constitution, the State Governments would be secure against usurped powers, and could not be overthrown until the “whole people of America were robbed of their liberties.” If, sir, the bold declarations had then been made which we now hear from honorable Senators, that “one great object of the constitution was to humble the proud sovereignty of the States,” that the Government which they were about to establish was to combine all the divisions of the confederacy, and form of them one nation with supreme powers; if, in fine, all the extravagant doctrines of the President's proclamation, as they have been expounded and defended in the progress of this debate, had been openly avowed in the general convention at Philadelphia, or in the several State conventions, no man, possessed of the most ordinary share of human reason, can believe that the Union would ever have been formed on principles so abhorrent to the patriotism and pride of the States who compose it.

Mr. President, having, as I hope, satisfactorily explored the elementary principles of the Government, in reference particularly to the subsisting relations between the several States and the Union, I pass on to the expositions subsequently given to these principles in the practical operations of the Government under the administration of Washington, and the illustrious men who succeeded him as Chief Magistrates of the republic. No one can be so blind, or so ignorant of the nature of man, as to believe for a single moment that a written constitution, conferring specific and defined powers, can be administered over a number of distinct political communities, without the occurrence of dangers and difficulties, which can only be overcome by the exercise of wisdom, forbearance, and moderation, on the part of those who, for the time being, wield the destinies of the country. Such dangers and difficulties have often arisen under our system; and we may derive instruction, in the present alarming crisis, by a candid review of the actions of our predecessors on similar occasions. I shall look to the example of Washington, as most worthy of imitation, and contrast it with the mad ambition of the present administration, seeking to grasp the military power of the nation to enforce obedience to the laws, against a member of the confederacy, at the hazard of civil war, with all its inevitable horrors. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has thought proper, in his opening remarks on this bill, to liken the proceedings in South Carolina to the insurrection which took place in Pennsylvania in 1794, commonly called the "whiskey insurrection." The analogy which the honorable Senator attempts to draw between the two cases might be tolerated, if Pennsylvania, in her sovereign capacity, had authorized the resistance then made to the execution of the excise laws of Congress. But such was not the fact. A small portion of the people of the State had withdrawn from the great body of their fellow-citizens, and threatened, by force and violence, to obstruct the execution of the laws of the Union, made in pursuance of an express provision of the constitution, in defiance of the power of the State Government to which their allegiance was due, and of the Government of the United States, to the laws of which they refused obedience. This amounted to open rebellion, according to every definition given of it by the writers on national law. The Governor of the State made a formal requisition on the President for aid to suppress it. The two Governments acted together in reducing the insurgents to subjection, and restoring tranquillity in the disaffected district. Is it not, therefore, absurd and ridiculous to place this banditti on a footing with a sovereign State, acting on her reserved rights, to protect her citizens against the operation of oppressive laws, made, as she believes, in violation of the constitution?

But, sir, wide as the difference evidently is between the two cases, and insulting as the unfounded comparison may be thought to the honor and chivalry of South Carolina, I should have felt less mortification if the President had treated that State with the moderation and respect which was extended by Washington and Mifflin to a band of Pennsylvania rebels! If the honorable member will take the trouble to turn over a few pages of Ramsay's History of the United States, relating to this subject, he will find that this rebellion had broken out into acts of violence and blood before the proclamation of President Washington commanding them to disperse was promulgated. On the 15th of July, 1794, the marshal of the United States, while in the discharge of his official duty, was beset on the road by a body of armed men, who shot at him. On the next day, the insurgents, to the number of 500 men, attacked the house of the inspector. He had obtained from the garrison a detachment of eleven men for his security and protection. They were called upon by the assailants to march out and ground their arms; which being refused, they set fire to several adjacent buildings; upon which, the besieged party came out and surrendered. The insurgents violently stopped the mail from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, and took out the letters. They openly avowed their intention to resist by force of arms the authority of the United States, and thereby to extort a repeal of the excise law. What, sir, after all these outrages had been committed, was the mild course of President Washington? He refused to exercise the power vested in him to call out the militia, until he received the certificate of the district judge "that the laws of the United States were opposed, and their execution obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshal." The proper certificate having been obtained, what was the next step of the President? He consulted with Mr. Mifflin, then Governor of Pennsylvania, and, with his concurrence, commissioners were appointed on the part of the State and of the United States, to meet commissioners from the insurgents, and if possible bring them to reason without a resort to force. After the cup of conciliation was exhausted to the dregs, and every expedient to restore order and tranquillity among the insurgents had failed, then, and not till then, proclamations were issued as well by the President of the United States as by the Governor of Pennsylvania, and a competent number of the militia of the several adjoining States were called out to suppress the insurrection. The lofty spirit of Washington did not feel humbled by sending a minister to soothe the exasperated feelings of a few misguided men, whose crimes subjected them to instant punishment. He treated them with kindness and moderation, even after overt acts of treason and rebellion had been committed by them. His counsels were those of wisdom, and his acts were dictated by the purest patriotism; public opinion sustained him, and the empire of the laws was maintained without the shedding of one drop of blood. How has this noble example been dishonored in the course of President Jackson towards a sister State of the confederacy? No combinations or assemblages of persons have been found to resist the execution of the laws; no act of violence has been committed or attempted against the officers of the Government; no obstructions have been interposed to the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; no application from the Legislature or the Governor for aid to suppress an insurrection, (for in truth none such has existed); no certificate from the district judge, that the laws cannot be enforced by the powers vested in the marshal: but South Carolina, in her highest sovereign capacity, has declared certain acts of Congress unconstitutional and oppressive, and therefore not law within the limits of that State. Her Legislature has enacted laws in conformity with the wishes and opinions of the people of the State, on that subject; and, without the happening of any event which, in the slightest degree, violated or endangered the public peace, the President fulminates against the whole people of the State a proclamation, denouncing those acts of sovereignty as treason and rebellion, and demanding their repeal under the menace of the most signal punishment, by the strong arm of military power. He did not condescend to open a correspondence with the Governor of South Carolina to smooth away the impending difficulties, which were yet in a condition to be amicably settled. He sent no commissioner of peace to soothe the feelings of the State by assurances that their reasonable complaints should be listened to and redressed, nor even to give them the poor consolation that his influence would be exerted to produce that result. But the presence of the army and navy in the port and harbor of Charleston gave the first intimation of the future operations which he contemplated against them, followed up by a proclamation, issued in violation of the laws of the Union, when there was no armed force for any purpose assembled, which he had authority to disperse, and no violence had been either perpetrated or meditated against the laws or judicial tribunals of the United States. The whole machinery has been levelled against the legislation of the State, with less ceremony and courtesy than Washington, in the zenith of his glory, extended to a banditti, arrayed in full force, with arms in their hands, which had actually been used for purposes of insurrection and rebellion. "Can such things be, and overcome us like a summer's cloud, without our special wonder?" Sir, I have been forcibly struck with the resemblance between the recent proceedings of the executive branch of the Government against South Carolina, and those of Lord North against the colony of Massachusetts, prior to the commencement of the American revolution.

The colony of Massachusetts protested against the tax on tea, as a usurpation of power in the British Parliament. Lord North, then at the head of the administration, answered them by sending the army and navy of England into the port and harbor of Boston, to enforce the tax, and awe the inhabitants into submission.

South Carolina has protested against the power of Congress to impose duties on foreign importations, not for revenue, but for the protection of domestic manufactures, thereby levying a tax on the exports of the State, not warranted by the spirit of the constitution, oppressive, and unjust.

The President answers her complaints by sending the army and navy of the United States into the port and harbor of Charleston, to enforce the collection of these duties, and awe the State into submission to the laws imposing them.

Lord North refused to listen to the petitions of the colonies, until they humbled themselves at the foot of the throne.

Those who echo the feelings and wishes of the President, in both Houses of Congress, call aloud for force to subdue South Carolina into obedience to the majesty of the laws and the mandates of the Executive, before any law in modification of the existing rate of duties shall be made.

Lord North exclaimed in the British Parliament, "Now is the time to assert our right to tax the colonies, and bind them in all cases whatsoever."

We are told, from a high quarter, "Now is the time to try the strength of the Union, to put down nullification forever, and enforce the majesty of the laws at the point of the bayonet."

His Majesty's proclamation was issued, commanding submission to the laws of Parliament, under the pain and penalties of high treason.

The President has sent forth his proclamation commanding South Carolina to retrace her steps; repeal her laws, and submit to unjust taxation, under the pains and penalties of treason and rebellion; and, to finish the picture, our paternal King proscribed by name all those illustrious patriots who animated their countrymen to resistance against unjust and oppressive taxation; and we, too, have had a list of proscribed names among the eminent men of South Carolina, who are designated as leaders in the measures of resistance in that State against a protecting tariff. Sir, the parallel wants nothing to give it the last touch of the pencil but the passage of the bill now under consideration; and its sanguinary enactments, if carried into effect, will end in the downfall of the constitution, or the glorious triumph of liberty.

There is another precedent to which I beg leave to attract the attention of the Senate. During the administration of General Washington, in the year 1795, it will be recollected by those acquainted with the prominent events of that period, that great excitement existed in the State of Kentucky, on the subject of the free navigation of the river Mississippi. Our negotiations with Spain had been protracted to an unreasonable length, and fears were entertained that the Spanish Government did not intend to accord to the United States the free use of the only outlet to the ocean which nature had opened to the Western people. Operated on by these powerful considerations, so intimately connected with the agricultural interests of that fertile and growing region, and feeling the importance of free access to the Gulf of Mexico, through which their surplus products could alone reach a profitable market, the Legislature of Kentucky, in a memorial, drawn with much care and ability, declared their intention to secede from the Union, if the navigation of the Mississippi was not secured to them, in a reasonable time, by treaty stipulation, or in such other manner as should place it out of the reach of embarrassments or future interruptions. This strong declaration was made in language not to be misunderstood; the ground was taken, after mature consideration, and from it they had resolved never to recede one inch. Spain was at that time intriguing with certain leading men in the Western country, to induce them to withdraw from the United States, and form a part of the colony of Louisiana, with commercial immunities and advantages highly favorable to them. In the prosecution of this intrigue, Spain had been profuse in her douceurs and pensions to many distinguished citizens of Kentucky, who were supposed to possess the confidence of the people, and strong suspicions were entertained that a general officer in the American army was among the number of her pensioners. This Spanish conspiracy to separate the Western country from the Union has since been fully exposed, and now forms a part of the history of that country. What, sir, were the means resorted to by the illustrious individual then at the head of the Government, to avert the impending storm, and preserve the integrity of the Union? Did he send a message to Congress, calling on them to arm him with discretionary powers to march an army into Kentucky, and bring the Legislature to reason, and awe her citizens into obedience to the laws of the Union at all hazards? No, sir; he reposed with confidence in the virtue and patriotism of the people. He well knew that violent remedies would be productive of incurable mischiefs; that the authority of this Government could be maintained but by an appeal to the affections, and not to the fears of the people. He asked for no new military power to meet the exigency, fearful as it was; but he evinced his respect for the dignity of a sovereign State of the confederacy by the appointment of a special and confidential commissioner, who was sent with instructions to quiet the discontents which prevailed, and restore peace and harmony to the country. Colonel James Innes, of Virginia, clothed with authority from President Washington to disclose the state of the negotiation with Spain, on the interesting subject which agitated the public feeling in Kentucky, repaired to the capital of that State, opened a correspondence with the Governor, gave satisfactory explanations to the Legislature, and fully succeeded in the important object of his mission. Who can doubt that the presence of an army to measure swords with the freemen of the State would have aroused the resentment of the people to a height which might have resulted in civil strife and a dissolution of the Union? Had the counsels of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," been followed by him who now holds in his hands the sceptre of power, we should not have been disturbed in our slumbers by the ghost of nullification. We should have been spared the tragi-comedy of proclamation, manifestoes, and bloody legislation; the tide of events would have rolled smoothly on, undisturbed by the jarring elements of infuriated passions which have conducted us almost to the verge of military despotism. South Carolina may have acted without due deliberation; she may have been rash and precipitate in her movements; nay, sir, I go further,

It may be admitted that she is wrong Both in theory and practice; but she is, nevertheless, one of the old thirteen States, whose valor made us a free people. She was surely entitled to the respect shown by Washington to the Pennsylvania rebels, and to her younger sister Kentucky; if, indeed, she is not fully justified in the attitude she has assumed in the defence of her reserved rights. But how has she been treated by President Jackson? If common, uncontradicted rumor may be credited, a spy was employed to distort and misrepresent the proceedings of the convention, to implicate particular members of it, who have been denounced as objects of Executive vengeance. A military armament was put in requisition before their deliberations had terminated. But, sir, suppose, instead of sending an individual to perform the insidious functions of a spy on the convention, he had, like Washington, have sent to them a messenger of peace, concord, and harmony: suppose he had expressed to that body his ardent devotion to the Union, and a sincere wish that no measure should be adopted which might have a tendency to endanger it, coupled with assurances that his influence would not be wanting to remove the burdens of which they so justly complained; or, if he had said no more than he did in his opening message to Congress—the expression of those good dispositions, coming from so high a source, could not have failed to make the deepest impression; and, under their influence, it is but fair to conclude that the convention would have adjourned to a distant day; and, in the mean time, the causes of the discontent being removed, there would have existed no necessity for the re-assembling of that body. But all these obvious means of restoring tranquillity were overlooked; and power, in the might and majesty of its strength, stands forth to hurl instant destruction on the heads of all who dare to resist it.

I warn those who urge this fatal measure, with a view to coercion on the action of South Carolina, to pause and reflect well on the consequences of this untried experiment. They may find, when it is too late to retrograde, that it does not comport with the genius of a free people to substitute the law of force for the wholesome corrective of public opinion; that this Government is founded on the latter, and cannot long exist if its existence should be made to depend on the former. The sword and the bayonet are the appropriate engines of Kings and despots; they speak to their subjects the language of command, and operate on their fears by the terrors of a mercenary soldiery; but, rest assured, such are not the means by which our free institutions can be preserved and perpetuated. The President, in his message which preceded the introduction of this bill into the Senate, and on which it is founded, has claimed for this Government omnipotent powers, which cannot be counteracted but by a resort to the natural and inherent right of revolution, which implies the right of the stronger party to subjugate the weaker, and places the liberties of the people on the uncertain and doubtful tenure of physical strength, without regard to justice or the limitations in the constitution, on the action of the majority, which are wholly useless if they do not protect the rights of the minority. He tells us “that nothing less than causes which would justify a revolutionary remedy can absolve the people from this obligation, and for nothing less can the Government permit it to be done; that there exist no checks on the powers of Congress but the veto of the Executive, the authority of the Judiciary, and the sound action of public opinion; which, with the ultimate power of amendment, are the salutary and only limitations on the powers of the whole.” The President then proceeds to lay down certain general principles, which, as they do not agree with any exposition given of the constitution at the time of its adoption by those who framed it, and as they are now put forth by authority, I shall give them a concise and comprehensive examination. Speaking of the posture of the State Governments as members of the Union, the President says, “The laws of a State cannot authorize the commission of crime against the United States, or any other act which, according to the supreme law of the Union, would be otherwise unlawful.” He has repudiated all the opinions which are to be found in his former messages on the powers of the courts of the United States, on which subject I think he has been more explicit than on any other; and we are now favored with a new version of the powers of that important branch of the Government. Since the missionaries have been pardoned, and there is no longer a judgment of the Supreme Court to be executed against the legislative enactments of the State of Georgia, conflicting with the constitution and laws of the Union, the President tells us that “it is equally clear, that if there be any case in which a State, as such, is affected by the laws [of Congress] beyond the scope of judicial power, the remedy consists—[in what?—] in appeals to the people, [of the whole Union, doubtless,] either to effect a change in the representation, or procure relief by an amendment of the constitution.” He further adds, that “the measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid, and consequently supreme, until these remedies have been effectually tried. (See note F.) Now, sir, this is rank consolidation. It puts the constitutional restrictions at defiance, and gives the same force and effect to laws made in violation of the granted powers, as is given in the constitution to laws made in “pursuance thereof.” Under such a Government, a written constitution is but an empty name; a promise to the ear, but to be broken at pleasure; deceptive in its practical operations, and a taunting insult to the minority, for whose protection alone it was made. The measures of the Government are emphatically declared valid, and therefore supreme, whether they be constitutional or not; and the remedies, if they can be so called, which are left open to the oppressed sections, consist in revolution; appeals to the people interested in the results of these measures, to repeal them and remove the oppression; or, what is still more hopeless, to amend the constitution, in order to prohibit, in express terms, the exercise of a power usurped by the same majority, three-fourths of whom would be required to give effect to the proposed amendments! These are the monstrous doctrines of the constitutional advisers of the President, professing, as they hypocritically do, to hold in the highest veneration the sanctity of State rights, and a strict observance of the limitations on the action of the majority, so carefully enumerated in the constitution. If this be not a Government of checks and balances, but popular in its formation, and liable to no other control than the will of the majority, it differs only in name from the arbitrary Governments of the old world. There, too, the right of revolution is recognised; their laws cannot be enacted or repealed without the concurrence of a majority; and all the remedies which are pointed out to protect the rights and liberties of the American people, are equally applicable to the Government of England or France, or of any other nation not wholly despotic. Sir, I have searched in vain for any definition of the powers of this Government, with which its founders have furnished the public, similar to that which I find in the proclamation and message of President Jackson; they are peculiar to the professors who lecture on constitutional law in the new school; and I must be permitted to defend the true faith, as our fathers have handed it down to us, and to reject the heresies of this modern political sciola. No man ever lived who cherished a more ardent devotion to the powers of the Federal Government than did Alexander Hamilton. He honestly avowed his predilections for the supremacy of the Union, and was therefore denounced as a political heretic by the republican party throughout the country. But, compared with the giant strides of those who now rule over us, he sinks into a mere pigmy. I turn from this orthodox church, in which one set of principles are preached, and others carried out into practice, with infinite pleasure and satisfaction, to the sound views of Mr. Hamilton, however much he may have been reviled in the course of his illustrious life. Did he say that the "measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid," without exception, until the majority can be prevailed on to repeal them? Let his own words answer.

"The States as well as individuals, (says Mr. Hamilton) are bound by these laws; but the laws of Congress are restricted to a certain sphere; and when they depart from this sphere, they are no longer supreme or binding."

Mr. Hamilton, the ablest advocate of the constitution, and of constructive powers to their utmost limit, claims only supremacy for the laws coming within the range of the delegated powers, and freely admits that such laws as depart from this sphere are no longer "supreme or binding." The President overleaps the barriers, and assumes for the laws of the Union supremacy in all cases, while they remain unrepealed. There is a remarkable difference, also, between them in the remedy to be interposed against usurped powers. Appeals to the whole people of the United States to change their mode of representation, or amend the constitution, is the rule laid down by the President as the only means, short of revolution, to obtain redress, or restrain the measures of the Government within the sphere prescribed to it by the constitution. Let us see what Mr. Hamilton says on this subject:

"It may safely be received, as an axiom in our political system, that the State Governments will, in all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty, by the national authority. Projects of usurpation cannot be marked under pretences so likely to escape the penetration of select bodies, as of the people at large. The Legislatures will have better means of information; they can discover the danger at a distance, and, possessing all the organs of civil power, and the confidence of the people, they can at once adopt a regular plan of opposition, in which they can combine all the resources of the community."

Here is a clear recognition of the right of State interposition, drawn from the Federalist, which, in the opinion of the writer, affords complete security against usurpation and invasions of public liberty. The precise case put by Mr. Hamilton has arisen. The power to lay imposts on foreign manufactures, for purposes unknown to the constitution, has been usurped by Congress, under specious "pretences," which might well escape the "penetration" of the people at large; but the Legislature of a sovereign State, possessing "better means of information," have seen the injustice of the system, and the injuries which it inflicts on agricultural labor; they have discovered also the "danger at a distance" to the future prosperity of the State, and to her equal rights as a member of the Union; and she has adopted a "regular plan of opposition," by resorting to her reserved rights, which ought, "in all possible contingencies, to afford complete security against an invasion" of the constitution. Well, sir, the President claims the power to coerce this State, (acting in conformity with an exposition of the principles of the Government, cotemporaneous with its inception, by one of its most distinguished advocates) to unconditional submission to these laws, which he admits to be unnecessary and unjust, and which the people of the State resisting them regard as a gross violation of the spirit, intent, and meaning of the constitution. We are called on to sanction this claim, by placing at his disposal, for the purpose, the army and navy, and the militia of the United States. How was this extravagant power considered by Mr. Hamilton, in the debates on the constitution in the convention of New York, to which I referred in a preceding part of my remarks? He indignantly repels the idea of military coercion on a sovereign State of the confederacy. He deprecates the employment of force, in strong terms, and with a clear perception of its consequences. I beg the indulgence of the Senate, while I read to them a few sentences from the speech of this eminent statesman. "It has been well observed," said he "that to coerce the States is one of the maddest projects that was ever devised. What picture does this idea present to our view? Congress marching the troops of one State into the bosom of another; this State collecting auxiliaries, and forming, perhaps, a majority against its federal head: here is a nation at war with itself. Can any reasonable man be well disposed towards a Government which makes war and carnage the only means of supporting itself—a Government that can exist only by the sword? Every such war must involve the innocent with the guilty. This single consideration should be sufficient to dispose every peaceable citizen against such Government." Such are the opinions of Alexander Hamilton, an ultra-federalist of 1789, who adhered with unbending firmness to all the powers which could properly be claimed for this Government, either by express grant or implication. Contrast them with the principles avowed by the Chief Magistrate in his proclamation and message, and it exhibits the most striking evidence of the singular transposition of political parties which has ever occurred in this country.

All parties seem to have agreed, when this constitution was adopted, that a law of Congress, not made in pursuance of the granted powers, was absolutely null and void; that neither the States nor the people could be bound by any such unauthorized act. This principle has often been recognised by judicial decisions, both in the federal and the State courts. I will refer to a few cases on this point. In the case of Marbury vs. Madison, decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "That the constitution is the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and all acts repugnant to it are void." The same principle is fully sustained by Chief Justice McKean, in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the celebrated case of the Commonwealth against Cobbett, in which that enlightened judge took an enlarged view of the powers of this Government, and of those reserved to the States, fully recognising their right to interpose and protect their citizens against the operation of an unconstitutional act of Congress. This interesting decision, which for many years fixed the political character of Pennsylvania, was adopted by the distinguished Judge Roane, of the high court of appeals of Virginia, in his very clear and able opinion delivered in that court in the case of Hunter vs. Martin. To these I beg leave to add the opinion of another learned judge in Pennsylvania, in the memorable case of Olmead. Chief Justice Tilghman, after taking a general view of the case, thus expressed himself: "The United States have no power, legislative or judicial, except what is derived from the constitution. When these powers are clearly exceeded, the independence of the States and the peace of the Union demand that the State courts should, in cases brought properly before them, give redress. There is no law which forbids it; their oath of office exacts it; and if they do not, what course is to be taken? We must be reduced to the miserable extremity of opposing force to force, and arraying citizen against citizen; for it is vain to expect that the States will submit to manifest and flagrant usurpations of power by the United States, if [which God forbid!] they ever attempt them."

Numerous other decisions, corresponding with those which I have selected, might be cited to show how far the laws of the Union are supreme and binding, and how far the States may interpose their sovereign authority against the operation, within their jurisdictions, of laws

They may find, when it is too late to retrograde, that it does not comport with the genius of a free people to substitute the law of force for the wholesome corrective of public opinion; that this Government is founded on the latter, and cannot long exist if its existence should be made to depend on the former. The sword and the bayonet are the appropriate engines of Kings and despots; they speak to their subjects the language of command, and operate on their fears by the terrors of a mercenary soldiery; but, rest assured, such are not the means by which our free institutions can be preserved and perpetuated. The President, in his message which preceded the introduction of this bill into the Senate, and on which it is founded, has claimed for this Government omnipotent powers, which cannot be counteracted but by a resort to the natural and inherent right of revolution, which implies the right of the stronger party to subjugate the weaker, and places the liberties of the people on the uncertain and doubtful tenure of physical strength, without regard to justice or the limitations in the constitution, on the action of the majority, which are wholly useless if they do not protect the rights of the minority. He tells us “that nothing less than causes which would justify a revolutionary remedy can absolve the people from this obligation, and for nothing less can the Government permit it to be done; that there exist no checks on the powers of Congress but the veto of the Executive, the authority of the Judiciary, and the sound action of public opinion; which, with the ultimate power of amendment, are the salutary and only limitations on the powers of the whole.” The President then proceeds to lay down certain general principles, which, as they do not agree with any exposition given of the constitution at the time of its adoption by those who framed it, and as they are now put forth by authority, I shall give them a concise and comprehensive examination. Speaking of the posture of the State Governments as members of the Union, the President says, “The laws of a State cannot authorize the commission of crime against the United States, or any other act which, according to the supreme law of the Union, would be otherwise unlawful.” He has repudiated all the opinions which are to be found in his former messages on the powers of the courts of the United States, on which subject I think he has been more explicit than on any other; and we are now favored with a new version of the powers of that important branch of the Government. Since the missionaries have been pardoned, and there is no longer a judgment of the Supreme Court to be executed against the legislative enactments of the State of Georgia, conflicting with the constitution and laws of the Union, the President tells us that “it is equally clear, that if there be any case in which a State, as such, is affected by the laws [of Congress] beyond the scope of judicial power, the remedy consists—[in what?—] in appeals to the people, [of the whole Union, doubtless,] either to effect a change in the representation, or procure relief by an amendment of the constitution.” He further adds, that “the measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid, and consequently supreme, until these remedies have been effectually tried. (See note F.) Now, sir, this rank consolidation. It puts the constitutional restrictions at defiance, and gives the same force and effect to laws made in violation of the granted powers, as is given in the constitution to laws made in “pursuance thereof.” Under such a Government, a written constitution is but an empty name; a promise to the ear, but to be broken at pleasure; deceptive in its practical operations, and a taunting insult to the minority, for whose protection alone it was made. The measures of the Government are emphatically declared valid, and therefore supreme, whether they be constitutional or not; and the remedies, if they can be so called, which are left open to the oppressed sections, consist in revolution; appeals to the people interested in the results of these measures, to repeal them and remove the oppression; or, what is still more hopeless, to amend the constitution, in order to prohibit, in express terms, the exercise of a power usurped by the same majority, three-fourths of whom would be required to give effect to the proposed amendments! These are the monstrous doctrines of the constitutional advisers of the President, professing, as they hypocritically do, to hold in the highest veneration the sanctity of State rights, and a strict observance of the limitations on the action of the majority, so carefully enumerated in the constitution. If this be not a Government of checks and balances, but popular in its formation, and liable to no other control than the will of the majority, it differs only in name from the arbitrary Governments of the old world. There, too, the right of revolution is recognised; their laws cannot be enacted or repealed without the concurrence of a majority; and all the remedies which are pointed out to protect the rights and liberties of the American people, are equally applicable to the Government of England or France, or of any other nation not wholly despotic. Sir, I have searched in vain for any definition of the powers of this Government, with which its founders have furnished the public, similar to that which I find in the proclamation and message of President Jackson; they are peculiar to the professors who lecture on constitutional law in the new school; and I must be permitted to defend the true faith, as our fathers have handed it down to us, and to reject the heresies of this modern political sciola. No man ever lived who cherished a more ardent devotion to the powers of the Federal Government than did Alexander Hamilton. He honestly avowed his predilections for the supremacy of the Union, and was therefore denounced as a political heretic by the republican party throughout the country. But, compared with the giant strides of those who now rule over us, he sinks into a mere pigmy. I turn from this orthodox church, in which one set of principles are preached, and others carried out into practice, with infinite pleasure and satisfaction, to the sound views of Mr. Hamilton, however much he may have been reviled in the course of his illustrious life. Did he say that the "measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid," without exception, until the majority can be prevailed on to repeal them? Let his own words answer.

"The States as well as individuals, (says Mr. Hamilton) are bound by these laws; but the laws of Congress are restricted to a certain sphere; and when they depart from this sphere, they are no longer supreme or binding."

Mr. Hamilton, the ablest advocate of the constitution, and of constructive powers to their utmost limit, claims only supremacy for the laws coming within the range of the delegated powers, and freely admits that such laws as depart from this sphere are no longer "supreme or binding." The President overleaps the barriers, and assumes for the laws of the Union supremacy in all cases, while they remain un repealed. There is a remarkable difference, also, between them in the remedy to be interposed against usurped powers. Appeals to the whole people of the United States to change their mode of representation, or amend the constitution, is the rule laid down by the President as the only means, short of revolution, to obtain redress, or restrain the measures of the Government within the sphere prescribed to it by the constitution. Let us see what Mr. Hamilton says on this subject:

"It may safely be received, as an axiom in our political system, that the State Governments will, in all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty, by the national authority. Projects of usurpation cannot be marked under pretences so likely to escape the penetration of select bodies, as of the people at large. The Legislatures will have better means of information; they can discover the danger at a distance, and, possessing all the organs of civil power, and the confidence of the people, they can at once adopt a regular plan of opposition, in which they can combine all the resources of the community."

Here is a clear recognition of the right of State interposition, drawn from the Federalist, which, in the opinion of the writer, affords complete security against usurpation and invasions of public liberty. The precise case put by Mr. Hamilton has arisen. The power to lay imposts on foreign manufactures, for purposes unknown to the constitution, has been usurped by Congress, under specious "pretences," which might well escape the "penetration" of the people at large; but the Legislature of a sovereign State, possessing "better means of information," have seen the injustice of the system, and the injuries which it inflicts on agricultural labor; they have discovered also the "danger at a distance" to the future prosperity of the State, and to her equal rights as a member of the Union; and she has adopted a "regular plan of opposition," by resorting to her reserved rights, which ought, "in all possible contingencies, to afford complete security against an invasion" of the constitution. Well, sir, the President claims the power to coerce this State, (acting in conformity with an exposition of the principles of the Government, contemporaneous with its inception, by one of its most distinguished advocates) to unconditional submission to these laws, which he admits to be unnecessary and unjust, and which the people of the State resisting them regard as a gross violation of the spirit, intent, and meaning of the constitution. We are called on to sanction this claim, by placing at his disposal, for the purpose, the army and navy, and the militia of the United States. How was this extravagant power considered by Mr. Hamilton, in the debates on the constitution in the convention of New York, to which I referred in a preceding part of my remarks? He indignantly repels the idea of military coercion on a sovereign State of the confederacy. He deprecates the employment of force, in strong terms, and with a clear perception of its consequences. I beg the indulgence of the Senate, while I read to them a few sentences from the speech of this eminent statesman. "It has been well observed," said he "that to coerce the States is one of the maddest projects that was ever devised. What picture does this idea present to our view? Congress marching the troops of one State into the bosom of another; this State collecting auxiliaries, and forming, perhaps, a majority against its federal head: here is a nation at war with itself. Can any reasonable man be well disposed towards a Government which makes war and carnage the only means of supporting itself—a Government that can exist only by the sword? Every such war must involve the innocent with the guilty. This single consideration should be sufficient to dispose every peaceable citizen against such Government." Such are the opinions of Alexander Hamilton, an ultra-federalist of 1789, who adhered with unbending firmness to all the powers which could properly be claimed for this Government, either by express grant or implication. Contrast them with the principles avowed by the Chief Magistrate in his proclamation and message, and it exhibits the most striking evidence of the singular transposition of political parties which has ever occurred in this country.

All parties seem to have agreed, when this constitution was adopted, that a law of Congress, not made in pursuance of the granted powers, was absolutely null and void; that neither the States nor the people could be bound by any such unauthorized act. This principle has often been recognised by judicial decisions, both in the federal and the State courts. I will refer to a few cases on this point. In the case of Marbury vs. Madison, decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "That the constitution is the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and all acts repugnant to it are void." The same principle is fully sustained by Chief Justice McKean, in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the celebrated case of the Commonwealth against Cobbett, in which that enlightened judge took an enlarged view of the powers of this Government, and of those reserved to the States, fully recognising their right to interpose and protect their citizens against the operation of an unconstitutional act of Congress. This interesting decision, which for many years fixed the political character of Pennsylvania, was adopted by the distinguished Judge Roane, of the high court of appeals of Virginia, in his very clear and able opinion delivered in that court in the case of Hunter vs. Martin. To these I beg leave to add the opinion of another learned judge in Pennsylvania, in the memorable case of Olmstead. Chief Justice Tilghman, after taking a general view of the case, thus expressed himself: "The United States have no power, legislative or judicial, except what is derived from the constitution. When these powers are clearly exceeded, the independence of the States and the peace of the Union demand that the State courts should, in cases brought properly before them, give redress. There is no law which forbids it; their oath of office exacts it; and if they do not, what course is to be taken? We must be reduced to the miserable extremity of opposing force to force, and arraying citizen against citizen; for it is vain to expect that the States will submit to manifest and flagrant usurpations of power by the United States, if [which God forbid!] they ever attempt them."

Numerous other decisions, corresponding with those which I have selected, might be cited to show how far the laws of the Union are supreme and binding, and how far the States may interpose their sovereign authority against the operation, within their jurisdictions, of laws plainly and palpably conflicting with the constitution. But I deem it unnecessary to extend these references.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has given us his beau idéal of a national or popular Government. He has taken it for granted that ours is such a Government, and on this basis rests his whole argument. If his premises are conceded, his conclusions are inevitable. He first imagines the Government to be just what he would have made it, in its original formation, and then concludes that all opposition to its laws must be set down as treason or rebellion. He has, it is true, the high authority of the Chief Magistrate for the assumption that the "measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid, and consequently supreme," without inquiring into their conformity to the delegated powers; and it is perhaps the best opportunity which has ever occurred to revive these exploded doctrines, and fix them on the public mind, under the patronage of one who fills so large a space in the confidence and affections of the people. I do not mean to deny the right of the honorable Senator to enlist under the banner of a popular leader, and seize on circumstances so favorable, to render his own opinions, long entertained, acceptable to the great body of the American people. I do claim, however, the humble privilege of dissenting from his theory of the constitution, and the broad ground on which he places the supremacy of the Government which it created.

The honorable gentleman complains of my friend from South Carolina, and others who have entered into this debate, for the frequent use which they make of the term "consolidation." Words, he says, are things; and this word, he seems to think, is calculated to convey injurious impressions of measures with which it may be associated, however just and proper in themselves.* Now, sir, I ask, in answer to the honorable gentleman, if precisely the same use has not been made of that much abused word "nullification?" More than half of what we have heard in this protracted and interesting discussion would have been lost but for the heavy blows which have been levelled at this word "nullification." The very able and eloquent speech of the honorable Senator himself would have been disrobed of many charms, had he been denied the privilege of bestowing his maledictions on the heresy of nullification. I hope, therefore, he will pardon us for calling by its proper name a Government such as he would make this, popular in its origin, and supreme in all its acts; the plain meaning of which is—consolidation.

This word "nullification" is more important to the enemies of State rights than all the reasoning which they can bring to their aid on that subject. It has become so terrible to the ear, that nurses use it to frighten children into a compliance with their wishes; and for the same purpose it is fulminated, without any definite meaning, to frighten grown babies, who are to be found in the halls and parlors of this wide-spread city, into obedience to the creed of the orthodox church, and to the high priest whose decrees are written in the book of the covenant, and against which no one can say aught, and yet survive the revilings of the multitude. But, sir, we all know the fact, that nullification is of the purest parentage, having descended from the clear head and patriotic heart of Thomas Jefferson; and that it means nothing more than the right of a member of the compact of Union to adopt a "regular plan of opposition" to usurped powers by the Federal Government, and thereby preserve their sovereignty and independence from annihilation; which Hamilton thought would, in "all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty."

* This part of Mr. Webster's remarks is omitted in his printed speech.

It means nothing more; and we shall presently see to what extent it has been carried out by the States in which it is now so unblushingly condemned. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has founded his reasoning on postulata, which I proceed to notice and controvert. He maintains—

1st. That nullification, in all its forms, is revolution.

2dly. That secession, under any circumstances, is revolution; because the constitution created direct relations between the Government and individuals, which cannot be dissolved by any authority whatever.

3dly. That the constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact, between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities, but a Government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, creating these direct relations between itself and individuals.

4thly. That the constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties, are the supreme law; and that, in all cases not capable of assuming the character of a suit in law or equity, Congress must judge of, and finally interpret, the extent of its own powers.

5thly. That any attempt, by a State, to arrest the operation of a law of the United States within her limits, on the ground that, in her opinion, such a law is unconstitutional, is a direct usurpation on the just powers of the General Government, and essentially revolutionary.

It will be seen, at a single glance, that all these propositions are based on the principle assumed by the honorable gentleman, that the Government was erected by the whole people of the United States, and is therefore popular in its character; and that all its acts must be recognised "as valid, and therefore supreme;" in which he accords with the view taken of the subject in the message of the Chief Magistrate, to which I have before referred.

I have already spoken of the origin of the Government, and shown, as I trust, by historical facts, that it has no claim to the popular character given it by the honorable Senator; but that its powers are delegated by "commission" from the States, in their sovereign capacities; that it is the agent of the States to execute this "commission," under which it acts; that, in making this grant of powers, each State retained its sovereignty and independence, and cannot be bound by any law without the "sphere of the powers enumerated in the grant." I am supported in this analysis by the high authority of Rufus King and Alexander Hamilton, whose opinions I have given in their own words, not because they are more to be relied on than those of other eminent statesmen with whom they afterwards differed, in construing the implied powers of the Government, but because they would not be liable to the suspicion of entertaining a desire to curtail, to any extent, the powers properly belonging to the Federal Government, or to give to the States higher rank than was intended to be given at the time their opinions were expressed.

It seems to have been universally received as an axiom, resulting from the nature of a written grant of powers, that any law or act contrary to the constitution is absolutely null and void, and not binding on the States or the people; but the difficulty arises, who shall decide on the infractions, if Congress should at any time usurp powers not specified in the constitution? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts admits that, if the instrument be an existing compact between the States, the parties have an undoubted right to judge for themselves when a breach has been committed; but, denying the existence of the compact, he affirms the right to be in Congress to determine, in the last resort, upon the meaning or extent of its own powers, in all cases which cannot be brought before the judicial tribunals either in law or equity. Thus the whole range of powers rejected by the convention may be usurped by arbitrary construction, and all the limitations on the action of the Government may be wholly disregarded; liberty may be endangered by a combination of interested or corrupt majorities; and we are to turn round, and gravely ask those who meditate the mischief, and against whom the charge of usurpation is made, to concede their guilty purpose, and thereby pass a vote of censure on themselves! Would such a system afford any security against the natural tendency of power to encroach on the rights of minorities, in favor of the interest of majorities? Of what avail would be limitations in a power of attorney, if the agent is to decide, in the last resort, how far he is authorized to bind his principal? If the solemn warnings of the illustrious Jefferson can have any weight in fixing the right of the parties to protect themselves, in cases of gross and palpable violations of the constitution, by interposing, in their sovereign capacities, to preserve their reserved rights from the encroachments of federal power, or the exercise of undefined discretion, without restraint, I will avail myself of the benefit of his able pen, so often referred to on great questions of constitutional law, of which he was, in my opinion, the soundest expositor of the day in which he lived. His language is clear and explicit, founded in common sense, which is now pretty much out of use in our halls of legislation, where refined theories and technical subtleties are substituted in its place. I find in the original draught of the Kentucky resolution, in 1798, the following sentence, which fully discloses his opinion on this point:

"That the principle and construction contended for by sundry of the State Legislatures, that the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism; since the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers: that the several States who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of the infraction."

Hamilton has, in substance, sanctioned these views of Mr. Jefferson, in the number of the Federalist written by him, before referred to, in which, without the application of the principle to any particular case, he advances the general proposition, that, under the system which it was his object to expound and defend, "State Governments will, in all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty by the national authority." He speaks not of revolution; he repels the idea of coercion on a sovereign State as one of the "maddest projects that was ever devised;" he says, further, that no "reasonable man can be well disposed towards a Government which makes war and carnage the only means of supporting itself—a Government that can exist only by the sword." It is obvious, therefore, that the security to be afforded by the States against usurpations of power by the national authority, can mean nothing else than a peaceful remedy, by interposing their sovereign authority within their respective jurisdictions, in some form or other, which should effectually arrest the operations of an unconstitutional act of Congress; the "security" which, he says, "will, in all possible contingencies, be complete;" and for which he depends on the action of the State Governments, must be afforded by the employment of physical force, or by the exercise of the sovereign powers of the States, in their constitutional legislative bodies. Who can doubt that the latter, and not the former remedy, was in the mind of the writer; or that he recognised the State Governments as an essential part of our system, on whose watchful vigilance we might safely rely for the security of liberty against every combination which, in the progress of time, might arise to subvert it? But the honorable Senator has denounced the State veto as an absurdity, which he says was fully tried under the old confederation, and found to be so inconvenient that to get rid of it was one great object of the new constitution. True, sir, the State veto, under the confederation, on the acts of Congress, was found to be inconvenient in practice; but it was not confined merely to the exercise of undelegated powers, but it extended to cases falling within the range of express powers. Had the States promptly complied with the requisitions made on them by Congress, and exercised a veto only on such acts as were manifestly not granted in the articles of confederation, I do not think the power would have formed a serious objection to the system. It was a favorite object then, as it is now, to vest in the Federal Government a complete control over State legislation; the proposition was several times submitted, under various modifications, and rejected by the convention. It was denied even to two-thirds of both Houses of Congress; and the reason was evident. The small States were against it, because it would subject them to the arbitrary rule of the large States, who would always have wielded the Government to their own purposes, if it had been so formed as to put the States in the power of a majority of the Representatives in Congress. For the same reason, the power of amendment was limited to three-fourths of the States. A proposition was made to give this important power to a majority of States, and, after that was negatived, it was modified so as to vest it in two-thirds; but it was deemed unsafe to trust it with a smaller number than three-fourths, which, it was thought, would effectually protect the small States, who must ever be in a minority, from a dangerous enlargement of the powers of the Government, by a combination of the large States, whose influence would, most probably, be directed in favor of popular rights and consolidation, in preference to an equal representation of the States in the Senate, and their separate independence on the will of the majority. These precautions were well considered at the time; but if Congress is to be made the sole judge of the extent of its powers, both express and implied, there will be no need of amendments to make the constitution just what a majority might think it ought to have been made by those who framed it. I will give to this part of the subject a closer examination in the order which I have prescribed to myself in this debate.

Mr. President, I shall not follow the example of honorable Senators, who have felt it to be their duty either to denounce or approve the particular movement which has taken place in South Carolina; my purpose is to investigate general principles. Let these be fixed on a sure foundation, and their application to particular cases, as they arise, will not be a difficult or complicated duty. I deny the power of this Government to interfere with the internal policy of a State, as such, unless her laws are properly brought before the judicial tribunals, in cases of law or equity, in the courts of the United States. I deny, more especially, the principle involved in the passage of this bill, which is designed to coerce, by military force, the Legislature of a sovereign State of the Union; a principle at war with our free institutions, abhorrent to the feelings of freemen, and destructive of civil liberty.

This Union, formed on the basis of compromise and mutual concession, by the States, cannot bear the shock of civil war. I hope never to witness so rash an experiment; but I have no hesitation in declaring my firm belief that the first gun which is levelled at the breast of an American citizen, by an army of mercenaries in the service of the United States, for the crime of obedience to the constituted authorities of the State to which he owes a primary allegiance, and from which he receives protection of life, liberty, and property, will be the signal of death to the confederacy. All wars are to be deprecated, but most of all civil wars, which are ever marked by scenes of desolation and cruelty, afflicting to humanity, and usually terminate in the downfall of liberty. The natural ligaments which bind society together are ruptured, without one cheering ray of hope that they can ever again be invigorated and restored to a sound and healthful action between the rival combatants. A statesman, who looks only to the enactment and execution of just and equal laws, would cautiously avoid any measure which in its tendency might be calculated to bring on our beloved country calamities, the effect of which no real patriot can contemplate without the deepest emotions of unfeigned regret. But, above all, we should hesitate much before we resort to the ultima ratio to enforce laws of doubtful policy, and which may be held by a respectable minority of our constituents to be both oppressive and unconstitutional. It is not always wise or prudent to push the acknowledged powers of Government to their utmost limit. Moderation and forbearance ought ever to be kept in view in the adjustment of domestic controversies, which must, in the nature of human affairs, sometimes occur in the administration of a Government composed of a numerous family of States, with interests and pursuits in many respects conflicting and diversified. I cannot bring my mind to the condition that the position occupied by South Carolina, in her opposition to imposts for the protection of manufactures, is such as to require or justify military operations against her, either to maintain the supremacy of the laws, or the dignity of the Government. Her demands are just and reasonable. Do justice, which is the highest duty of men and of Governments, and the dark cloud which hangs over the land will be dissipated by the bright sunshine of peace and tranquillity. The wrongs of which she has, in common with all the Southern States, so long and so earnestly complained, originated in a system of legislation which all agree must, to a certain extent, be abandoned.

Shall we then waste our precious time in this unprofitable discussion, when it might be so successfully employed in healing the wounds of our afflicted country, by a gradual reduction of duties on foreign importations to the necessary expenditures of the Government? But if honorable gentlemen are determined to peril the liberties of the people by lighting the torch of civil strife among the members of this free and happy confederacy, they ought at least to make one effort which might indicate a desire on their part to avoid it, before they plunge into this mad project of enforcing unjust laws on the freemen of the South by the terrors of the sword, the desolation of their fair fields, and the shedding of innocent blood. But, sir, if, as the Senator from Massachusetts has told us, "any attempt by a State to abrogate, annul, or nullify an act of Congress, or to arrest its operation within her limits, on the ground that such law is unconstitutional," is a proceeding revolutionary in its character, because it "arrests the exercise of supreme power," South Carolina has incurred this responsibility; and I should be glad to be informed by the honorable Senator how many similar revolutions have occurred in the history of our Government. The absurdity of this new definition of "revolution" cannot be better exposed than by a simple reference to the various acts of the State Governments since the adoption of the constitution, by which the right of interposition against the operation of the laws of Congress and the judicial decisions of the courts of the United States are not only asserted by the States, but carried into practical effect under the sanction of adequate penalties. I beg leave to supply the honorable Senator with a few of these State commentaries on his text.

By an act of the Legislature of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, passed on the 2d of April, 1803, a decree of the district court of the United States, for the Pennsylvania district, is declared to have been in violation of the constitution, and therefore null and void, and "ought not to be obeyed." By the provisions of this act the execution of the decree is expressly prohibited, and the Governor of the State is authorized by any "means and measures" which he might deem necessary for the purpose, effectually to resist any attempt which might be made to enforce the decree.—(Bioren's edition of the Laws of Pennsylvania, p. 152.) This was the first step taken by the authority of the Legislature to vindicate the rights of the State against a judicial decision in the celebrated case of Olmstead and the heirs of Rittenhouse, involving, incidentally, the interests of that State. It was renewed at a subsequent period, which I shall presently notice.

Again: we find in the statutes of Pennsylvania an existing act of nullification, passed on the 27th of March, 1820. By the second section of the fourth article of the constitution, it is provided: "That persons held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, and escaping into another, shall not, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." To carry into effect this article of the constitution, Congress passed an act prescribing the mode in which persons entitled to the service or labor of fugitives should prosecute their claims in the State in which such fugitives from labor might be found. It will not be pretended that this act violated any principle of the constitution; on the contrary, it was made in pursuance thereof, and was essential to the preservation of harmony among the several States on a subject of deep and absorbing interest. Well, sir, in opposition to this act of Congress, made in obedience to an express provision of the constitution, Pennsylvania has interposed a penal statute, declaring, "that if any alderman or justice of the peace of this commonwealth shall take cognizance of the case of any fugitive from labor from any of the United States or Territories, under a certain act of Congress, passed on the 12th day of February, 1793, entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' such alderman or justice of the peace shall, on conviction thereof, be sentenced to pay, at the discretion of the court, any sum not less than 500 dollars, nor exceeding 1,000 dollars; the one-half whereof shall be paid to the party prosecuting, and the other half to the use of the commonwealth."

Now, sir, I have given two several acts of the highly respectable and patriotic State of Pennsylvania, (towards which State I certainly feel the greatest respect,) resisting the judicial authority of the United States in the one case, and "arresting the operation of an act of Congress within her limits" in the other; not, indeed, on the ground that "such law is unconstitutional," because it is not liable to that objection, but merely on the ground that it did not accord with the feelings of the people of that State! Here is a case of living practical nullification, as broad as language can make it. Will the honorable Senator from Massachusetts apply his rule to good old Pennsylvania? Is she, too, involved in his general denunciation of "revolution," or of treason and rebellion, as we have it officially defined in the proclamation? If so, this revolution has endured these thirty years, and is certainly the most quiet and peaceful revolution of which we have any account in history. We heard of no pompous parade of proclamations and armies to maintain the "majesty of the laws," or the supremacy of this "National" Government. Pennsylvania has not "legislated the United States out of her limits;" she is still a most valuable and cherished member of the Union; and, as far as I know, she intends to remain so.

Again: the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in 1809, rendered it the imperative duty of the Governor to put in requisition the whole body of the militia of the State, to resist the execution of a judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Olmstead case, before mentioned. Did President Adams fulminate a proclamation against the State, and charge her Legislature with the high crime of treason, rebellion, or revolution? No, sir, he opened a friendly correspondence with the Governor, which resulted in a pacific accommodation of the difficulty; the militia force was withdrawn, and the authority of the Government was maintained without a resort to extraordinary means to enforce it. But these were not the days of proclamations for political effect; or messages calling for the army, and the navy, and the militia, to humble a sovereign State into obedience to the "majesty of the laws," and bring her to the footstool of this "supreme National" Government. Public feeling would have been shocked if such a measure had been submitted under executive recommendation, as the bill now before the Senate, to make war on the legislation of Pennsylvania. No administration could have withstood the torrent of popular indignation which would have burst forth on its head, if any such arbitrary means had been resorted to on that occasion. Wisdom and moderation were then regarded as indispensable qualifications in those who wielded the powers of the Government. Under their guidance we have thus far prospered, and overcome the circumstances which threatened to disturb our domestic peace; and so it will be while such counsels prevail, and while rash men and political jugglers are not permitted, for the gratification of revenge or ambition, to break down the ramparts of the constitution in pursuit of victims or power.

I will now call the attention of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to another case nearer home, and with which he is, doubtless, familiar. Prior to the declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain, Congress, in anticipation of that event, on the 10th of April, 1812, passed an act authorizing the President of the United States to arm and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, 100,000 militia, to be drawn from the several States, according to their respective proportions. The power to pass this act is expressly granted in the constitution, and the necessity for it was obvious, as we were on the eve of a war with the most powerful nation of Europe. In the execution of this act, the President of the United States, through the Secretary of War, made requisitions on the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut for their respective quotas of militia, directed by law to be organized for the national defence. In reply to the letter of the Secretary of War, his excellency Caleb Strong, then Governor of Massachusetts, after taking the advice of his council, informed the Secretary that "he was unable, from any view of the constitution of the United States, to perceive that any exigency exists which can render it advisable to comply with the said requisition." He afterwards required the opinion of the justices of the supreme judicial court of the State, upon the question whether the Governors of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies contemplated by the constitution of the United States exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him, pursuant to acts of Congress? To this question three of the justices of the Supreme Court, Theophilus Parsons, Samuel Sewall, and Isaac Parker, gave the following answer: that they were of opinion, "that the right to judge of the existence of the exigencies, contemplated by the constitution, to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States any part of the militia of the several States, is vested in the Governors or commanders-in-chief of the militia of such States." And, among other reasons which they assigned for this opinion, they state, that, "as the power is not delegated to the United States by the federal constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, it is reserved to the States respectively." The judges proceeded further to declare, that a different construction would give to Congress the right to determine when these special cases exist, and thus the whole of the militia might be subjected to the command of the President, which would, in effect, produce a military consolidation of the States. The Governor, acting in conformity with these opinions, also absolutely refused to obey the requisition of the President, and thereby effectually arrested the "operation of the act of Congress within the limits of the State." In this determination he persisted throughout the war, and was supported in his resistance to the laws of the Union by the Legislature of the State. Was this revolution? It was clearly nullification; not, it is true, of a law of Congress, either unconstitutional or oppressive, but of a law conforming to the very letter of the constitution, requiring nothing more of the State than was required of every other State of the Union, in a crisis which forcibly appealed to the patriotism of every man in the nation, who cherished the feelings of an American citizen. Compared with this resistance to the laws of Congress, the ordinance of South Carolina sinks into insignificance. This was not merely an attempt to "arrest the operation" of a law of the United States within the limits of Massachusetts, but it put the law, the constitution, and the highest obligations which a sovereign State can incur as a member of the Union, at defiance in the midst of foreign war, when the common enemy hovered on our sea-board, and menaced invasion at every vulnerable point. It covers the whole ground of the honorable Senator's definition of revolution, treason, or rebellion, and it has remained for him to stamp on it one of those distinctive appellations. But it was not by any means so fruitful in its results as the more recent revolution which the honorable Senator has discovered in South Carolina. It did not produce even a proclamation; it was not met by army or navy; nor was Congress invoked to clothe the President with military armor to suppress or put it down, whenever, in his judgment, it might be necessary or proper to march into the State, and vindicate the "majesty of the laws" at the point of the bayonet. No, sir, none of these things happened, but it was the peculiar good fortune of this quiet "revolution" to have ended in the assumption by this Government of the debt incurred by the State to the militia, who were held in readiness to resist the national forces; who were never ordered to repel the foreign invaders by the commander-in-chief of the State; who treated with insolent contempt, and actually defied, the authority of the United States. This same militia, whose services were denied as a part of the common defence against an enemy powerful in resources and military discipline, was actually paid out of the national treasury, for doing that which their distinguished Senator has been pleased to designate as revolutionary in its character! If, sir, the President should need volunteers, under the provisions of this bill, to march into South Carolina and chastise her into submission, I hope he will not fail to remember the strong evidences which have been given in this ancient commonwealth of Massachusetts, of her determination, at all hazards, to preserve "our Federal Union," and assert the "majesty of the laws." Such troops, in a cause so holy, might be safely relied on! The same views would be applicable to Connecticut and several other States, who "arrested the operation of the laws of Congress within their limits," at this eventful epoch in our history; but as the facts and the results, in relation to either, do not materially vary, I shall not refer to them in detail; they were, I presume, all revolutionary.

Virginia, also, is liable to this imputation of revolution. Her Legislature "arrested the operation" of the sedition act, by a penal law, which is now to be found in her statute book. But she was not then aware of the interpretation which, in the march of intellect and political science, might at some distant period be put on an act, the intention of which was self-preservation and protection against the exercise of usurped powers by the General Government, in violation of personal liberty, guarantied by an express article of the constitution. She meant nothing more; and the effect of her law has proved an innocent and salutary check on the encroachments of arbitrary power. I have a long list yet remaining of these revolutions, sui generis, but I will not fatigue the Senate by any further references, to show to what ridiculous extremes these new versions of the doctrine of revolution, treason, and rebellion would lead us, and how widely they differ from the well-settled opinions of those who have gone before us in the practical administration of the Government. The reserved rights of the States, secured by the tenth amendment of the constitution, has almost become obsolete, and, to mention them in debate, excites only a sarcastic, reproachful smile. State interposition, cognomened nullification, is still more offensive, and has been strongly reprobated by the Legislatures of those very States in which it has heretofore been solemnly recognised and carried into practice. Let their own resolutions speak.

Mr. P. here read the resolutions and proceedings of the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Maine, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Virginia, Ohio, and several other States, each declaring for itself, in substance, "that, as a member of the Federal Union, the Legislature acknowledges the supremacy, and will cheerfully submit to the authority, of the General Government, as far as that authority is delegated by the constitution of the United States. But, whilst they yield to this authority, when exercised within constitutional limits, they trust they will not be considered as acting hostile to the General Government, when, as guardians of State rights, they cannot permit an infringement of those rights by an unconstitutional exercise of power."

There is, (said Mr. P.) some difference in the precise language used in these various resolutions, but they are all substantially the same, and affirm the right of each State to resist the operation of an unconstitutional law of Congress within its limits. On this principle the States have invariably acted, and so they will continue to act whenever their particular interests are invaded; and I will add—so they ought to act in all cases of unjust and oppressive usurpations of power, which cannot be brought before the courts of justice in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. Dangers to human liberty are not to be found in restraints on power; they must be looked for in an opposite direction. Power, in its nature, is cumulative; it seizes on every favorable circumstance to extend and ramify itself, until it reaches an elevation where it may repose in safety, and bid defiance to all opposition; it never voluntarily recedes, but must be driven back to its proper orbit by means which it is unable to resist. If, therefore, I am left to choose between the evils of State interposition and those which might reasonably be apprehended from a Government of defined powers, of the extent of which it is made the sole arbiter—I accord my preference to the check, however inconvenient it may sometimes prove in practice, and utterly reject the wide range of constructive powers which are claimed for the Federal Government, without limitation or restraint. I admit that evils may present themselves on both sides, but the States, individually, are the weakest, and most liable to injury and oppression; I would therefore trust them with the reasonable means of resistance, sooner than make the strong arm of the General Government still more powerful, by rendering it supreme and irresponsible to the several members of the Union. I will briefly contrast the mischiefs which might arise from an abuse of power by the States, with those which would inevitably result from a Government subject to no control but its own arbitrary discretion: and see on which side the scale preponderates. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts says that a majority must govern; that the judgment of the majority must stand as the judgment of the whole; that the right of State interposition strikes at the very foundation of the legislative powers of Congress; that Congress must judge of the extent of its own powers so often as it is called on to exercise them; and he ridicules the idea of twenty-four different constructions of the constitution, in the twenty-four States, as tending to produce anarchy and revolution. Well, sir, I will take the great principles of the Government, for which the honorable gentleman contends, to be as he would have them—how then would the system operate? What security would he give us that liberty might not be driven out of the country? that free government would not very soon give place to one of absolute authority, incompatible with the existing relations between the States, and subversive of personal rights? Permit me to range the propositions of the honorable Senator under their appropriate heads, and we shall then discern more clearly the consequences to which they must lead.

1. The will of the majority must, in all cases, govern; or, in other words, the judgment of the majority must stand as the judgment of the whole.

2. Congress must judge, in the last resort, of the extent of its own powers.

3. That any attempt by a State to abrogate, annul, or nullify an act of Congress, or to arrest its operations within her limits, on the ground that such law is unconstitutional, is revolutionary in its tendency, and must be settled by the "longest sword."

4. That secession by a State from the Union is revolutionary, which can be understood only at the head of an army:

If these are the legitimate powers and immunities of this Government, I maintain there is no security under it for personal liberty or the rights of property. We have, it is true, a written constitution, defining the powers of Congress; "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther;" but what of that? We are told by the honorable Senator that we have the sweeping power to make "all laws which may be necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." And he plainly tells us that if this means any thing, it means that Congress may judge of the true intent and just interpretation of the specific powers granted to it. Is the Government, thus expounded, one of checks and balances? or is it not, in effect, a Government of the most broad and unlimited powers, to do whatever may seem to the majority necessary and proper to promote the general welfare? There can be but one opinion on this subject among reasonable men. Let us then inquire what guaranty the States south of the Potomac, who are in a minority, have for their slave property; for equality in the public burdens; or even for the rights of conscience, the liberty of speech and of the press? One of the specified powers in the constitution guaranties to each State a republican form of government. Suppose a majority of Congress, coming from the non-slaveholding States, should decide that to carry into execution this guaranty, it is "necessary and proper" to provide by law for a general manumission of slaves from and after a given day; that slavery is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of a republican form of government. Many instances may be shown where powers much more inconsistent with the letter of the constitution have been usurped and exercised by Congress. What would be the answer of the slaveholding States to such a law? They would most certainly "attempt to abrogate, annul, or nullify" it, and "arrest its operation" within their limits, on the ground that "it is unconstitutional." But this is revolution, says the honorable Senator; treason and rebellion, the proclamation echoes! What then? Would the States, whose rights were thus outraged, submit? Such a surrender of their rights would not be expected of a high-minded gallant people. The ultimate and only remaining remedy by which they could avoid the impending blow at their happiness, independence, and prosperity, short of civil war, would be a solemn declaration that the States did not unite on such principles; that the compact of union meant to confer no such power on Congress; and that, for the preservation of their reserved rights, they had deliberately determined, as a dernier resort, peaceably to secede from the Union. Here, again, the complaining States would be met with the denunciation of revolution, treason, and rebellion against the supreme power, which they could not throw off but by successfully resisting it by war. They are further told, that Congress is the sole judge, in the last resort, of the extent of its implied powers; "the judgment of the majority must stand as the judgment of the whole;" and, according to the dictum in the message of the President, "the measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid, and therefore supreme;" that nothing less than causes which would "justify a revolutionary remedy can absolve the people from their obligation;" and thus the Government would make war and carnage the means of supporting itself; and all questions of doubtful powers would be settled by the "longest sword!" If the resisting States are strong enough to defy the power of the majority, then the law must be deemed unconstitutional; but if they are overpowered by the numbers opposed to them, and the "majesty of the law" is maintained, then, of course, it must be declared constitutional, and binding on the conquered States. This is the alternative; and I ask if such monstrous doctrines can be acceptable to a free and enlightened people? The supremacy of the National Government; the absolute will of the majority; the right of Congress to judge, in the last resort, of the extent of its own powers; all these high prerogatives are to be asserted at the point of the bayonet, and the barriers of the constitution are to be overthrown by the minions of power, purchased and paid by the money extracted from the pockets of the people, whom they are employed to enslave! Are honorable gentlemen prepared to transform our boasted system of confederated States into a consolidated Government, which can only exist by brute force? I hope not. But, sir, it is evident that if State interposition, in any form, is to be considered revolution, treason, or rebellion, the last argument of Kings will be the first in this republic. The "longest sword" will make the laws of Congress constitutional and supreme, when the common sense of all mankind would pronounce them unconstitutional and void. Laws respecting an establishment of religion might be passed by Congress; the sedition act, abridging the freedom of speech and of the press, might be revived; the writ of habeas corpus might be suspended; the law of primogeniture might be enacted; taxation for the clergy, or privileged orders, might be imposed on the States; and, extravagant as all these suppositions may appear, if the right of a State, in its sovereign capacity, to interpose a peaceable remedy to arrest their operation within its limits is denied, they must all be settled by the "longest sword," according to the doctrines which now, for the first time, seem to prevail in the councils of the nation. Sir, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has drawn a highly colored picture of the consequences which he imagines would result from practical nullification, secession, revolution, and disunion, with all their complicated evils. I am unable to discover any of those hydras in the present political condition of the country. When such a crisis shall arrive, I shall not fall behind the honorable gentleman in deprecating the misfortunes which it will bring on the land; but, thank God, as they exist only in the imagination, are neither seen nor felt by this free and happy people, I dismiss from my mind this whole catalogue of fancied ills, by the single reflection that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Our past experience has fully demonstrated that such evils are not to be expected from occasional interruptions to the action of the Government by the interference of a single State, or of any number of States, with the operation of laws which they consider unequal, oppressive, and unconstitutional. Such cases will but seldom occur under our system, and, when they do occur, they may be easily obviated by following the dictates of prudence and conciliation. If injustice has been done, it can readily be removed by peaceable means; but if civil strife should ever spring up among the people of this Union, it will owe its origin to the intemperate exercise of doubtful powers on the part of this Government. We may safely rely on the fidelity of the States to the Union which they have themselves formed, until the "whole people of America are robbed of their liberties." No State can, with a proper respect for its own interests, separate from the whole; it could not exist under the pressure of internal and external exactions on its commerce. No State will ever erect for itself a Government independent of her sister States, unless impelled to it by the most extreme necessity; a necessity which can never arise so long as this Government acts within the sphere of the powers delegated to it. This is our security against the evils of State interposition, which honorable gentlemen seem to look upon with such prophetic horror. I look with equal apprehension on the advances of federal power to consolidation and despotism. Sir, my attachments to the Union are not of modern growth; they are coeval with my entrance on the theatre of life, and have been manifested in all my public acts. When a member of the other House, in the year 1811, a distinguished member from Massachusetts, in the debate on the bill for the admission of Louisiana into the Union, used these emphatic words: "If this bill passes, the Union is virtually dissolved; and it will be the right of all, and the indispensable duty of some of the States, to prepare definitely for a separation—amicably if they can, forcibly if they must!" I rose in my place and called the honorable gentleman to order, for words which menaced a dissolution of the Union. The venerable Joseph B. Varnum, a soldier of the revolution, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, decided that it was not in order to use words in debate which threatened the stability of the Union; but the member was permitted to proceed on an appeal to the House, by a majority of only one vote. At that period the bare mention of a possibility that the Union might be dissolved was a reproach to any one who might make the intimation. Since then, it has become a prevailing topic of conversation; and why is it so? Sir, it is because federal power has become odious, in consequence of the extremes to which it has been carried by a widely expanded latitude of construction. The Union, which has now so many charms for those who bask in the sunshine of manufacturing prosperity, was not then held in such high veneration in that quarter. History affords some curious facts on this subject; and if any one is desirous of more explicit information concerning it, I refer him to a correspondence of the late President Adams, which may be found in the library of Congress. I do not believe that a single man can be found south of the Potomac who is not the firm, disinterested friend of the Union; not for gain, but because it was won by the common arms, and erected by our common ancestors. It is the last pledge of human liberty in the civilized world, and will be so estimated and cherished, until it is disrobed of its true character by avarice or ambition. It sheds a common glory over all its parts, of which all participate, with a glow of patriotic pride. Let us do justice, and the republic will endure to the end of time.

We have heard much from honorable Senators who think this a National Government, and the States municipal corporations, on the subject of citizenship and allegiance. On this point I go a step further than my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER,] who denies that he is a citizen of the "Government" of the United States. I deny that there can be, in the strict sense of the term, a citizen of the "United States," under the constitution. I admit that we are all familiarly called citizens of the United States, but it results from the union of the States, and is not a substantive claim to citizenship, which can be recognised as independent of the States. I cannot conceive of an individual who is so situated that he has an exclusive right to the appellation of "citizen of the United States." I am a citizen of the State of Mississippi, which is one of the States of the Union, and therefore I am a citizen of the United States. Congress may pass laws to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. This power was given for general convenience, that the rule might be the same in all the States; but if it had not been given, each State would have established a rule for itself. A foreigner who complies with the provisions of the law of naturalization, becomes from that moment a citizen of the State in which he may have taken up his residence; and if he removes into another State, he is entitled by the constitution to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in the several States. But no one can be a citizen of the United States who is not a citizen of some one of the States or Territories thereof. I owe a primary allegiance to the State which affords protection to my life, liberty, and property, and in which all my social duties and obligations are to be fulfilled; and I owe obedience to the constitution, and laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof, and am bound to contribute my equal proportion of the national burdens, and perform such other duties as Congress may by law require of me, within the intent and meaning of the constitution of the United States. The personal relations subsisting between the citizens of a State and the Government of the United States are few; they are well defined and well understood; but they can in no case supersede the primary and unqualified allegiance which every citizen owes to the constitution and laws of the State to which he belongs. If these conflict with the laws and constitution of the Union, the State, and not the individual, must be held responsible for them: any other rule would amount to a total annihilation of the State Governments, and place the creature above the creator. No citizen of a State can be compelled, by the authorities of the United States, to perform military service, even in time of war, against the will of the State to which he owes allegiance. No citizen of a State can be tried, convicted, and punished for the crime of murder, nor any other crime, treason and piracy only excepted, in the courts of the United States. I do not mean to include breaches of penal statutes relating to currency and revenue, or such other matters as fall within the exclusive powers of Congress. But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts overlooks all the high obligations of a citizen to a State, and assumes the broad ground that "the constitution of the United States creates direct relations between the Government and individuals;" that the Government possesses the power of "demanding from individuals military service;" and concludes with the avowal that no "closer relations can exist between individuals and any Government." The honorable gentleman has fallen into this manifest error, in his ardent zeal to establish the supremacy of the National Government. I deny that the Government possesses the power of demanding military service from the citizens of any State in the Union. Congress, it is true, may pass laws to provide for calling forth the militia for certain purposes specified in the constitution; but no such law can be carried into effect without the intervention of the State authorities. If it, indeed, possessed this high power, it would go far to show that this is a National Government; but it cannot "demand" the services of a single militiaman without the co-operation of the Governor, who is commander-in-chief of the militia of the State. The conduct of Massachusetts and other New England States during the late war, to which I have referred in another part of my argument, is a practical illustration of the absence of any power in this Government to demand the military services of individuals. If the citizens of the several States owe a direct and paramount allegiance to the Government of the United States, they are bound by that very allegiance to perform military service whenever called on for that purpose; that they are not so bound, is conclusive proof that their primary and paramount allegiance is due to the State Governments, in which alone the absolute power resides to command those services. It is the highest attribute of sovereign power, without which it could not exist. Will the honorable Senator deny that the States are sovereign in this respect? If he does, he will find abundant proof of the fact in every page of our history, from the Declaration of Independence up to the present moment.

The honorable Senator has said that the "people in every State live under two Governments. They owe obedience to both." Treason may be committed by resistance to the constitutional acts of either. The Government of a State possesses all powers not prohibited to it by a bill of rights, or by the constitution of the United States. This Government possesses only such powers as are expressly delegated. The honorable gentleman says further, that the powers of the two Governments are not adverse, but each has its separate sphere, and its "peculiar powers and duties." But yet we know that there are many important powers common to both Governments. The supreme power, however, is claimed for the National Government; and any attempt by a State to resist the operation of a law of Congress within its limits, under any pretence whatever, we are told, is revolutionary, and may be treated accordingly. I understand the Senator to say, that, for any such resistance, he would hold the citizens individually responsible. Thus the unfortunate citizen who resists a law of Congress may be punished for treason against the United States. He cannot plead the State law in justification, because that would deny the supremacy of this Government. If, on the other hand, he resists the law of the State, he may be punished for treason against the State; and it is difficult to conceive a more unpleasant situation than that in which the Senator would place the people of the States, where the laws of the two Governments are incompatible and conflicting. They are left to take the chances of treason against the State or the United States: in either case the punishment is death. I refer to this argument of the honorable Senator to show how impracticable it is to establish direct relations between individuals and the Government of the United States, without the co-operation of the State Governments, who possess the exclusive right to demand the military services of all who live within their jurisdictions. The only responsibility which a citizen can incur directly to the Government of the United States, is for the violation of a constitutional act of Congress, for which he has no warrant or authority under the laws of the State; if such State law authorizes resistance to the laws of Congress, it devolves on the State, and not on the citizen, to answer the consequences.

It is inconceivable how we can make war on the people of a State, and exclude the idea of war on the State itself. Of what is a State composed, but the people who form the social community? Sir, it cannot be concealed that this bill is intended to operate immediately on the State of South Carolina, to coerce her into obedience to the tariff laws, which she has abrogated and annulled by a fundamental law of the State; a power no where to be found in the constitution, and which was unanimously refused by the convention which framed that charter of our liberties. I am sensible that nothing can arrest the passage of the bill, but my reliance is on the patriotism of the people of the United States. They will not embark in a contest against a sister State of the republic, to enable a few capitalists engaged in domestic manufactures to fatten on the spoils of the cultivators of the soil. The honest, independent yeomanry of New England have no feelings or interests in common with these overgrown manufacturers, or the statesmen who support their cause. I firmly believe that when they are asked to take the field, and shed the blood of their Southern brethren in such a cause, they will indignantly refuse to be made the instruments of oppression on any portion of their fellow-citizens. The sons of the patriots who refused to pay tribute to the British monarch, and who threw the tea overboard in Boston, in the face of a British army, have not so far degenerated as to sully the glorious deeds of their fathers, by giving their aid and support to a like system of unjust taxation on their own countrymen.

But the overwhelming popularity of the Chief Magistrate may enable him to embody a force to carry into execution the contemplated invasion of South Carolina. He may enter the State at the head of his legions, and spread terror among its innocent and unoffending inhabitants. He may cast his eyes around him, and take a view of the scenes of his early youth; but before he unsheathes the sword of desolation and of blood, before he encounters the stout hearts and well-nerved arms of the freemen who are prepared to meet him and perish, or triumph in the defence of liberty, it may reasonably be expected that he will animate his followers to victory and to glory by the usual address of a commander-in-chief; and, as it may not suit his convenience to prepare one for the occasion, I have taken the liberty to perform that duty in advance; and here it is:

Address of the Commander-in-chief to his army, on entering Carolina.

FELLOW SOLDIERS: You have this day entered the territory of Carolina, one of the sovereign States of this confederacy; it is your high duty to humble her to obedience to the majesty of the laws of a great and powerful nation, of which she is a component part. Her heroes and patriots bravely fought and freely bled in the glorious revolution which achieved our independence. 'Tis the land of Sumpter, of Marion, of Washington, and of Hayne, whose memories live in the pages of history and in the hearts of their countrymen. When the cloud of despotism darkened and obscured the sun of civil and political liberty, and the face of our common country was overcast with gloom and despondency, her sons, among whom your commander-in-chief is one, breasted the storm, put at defiance the mercenary minions of the British crown, and by their valor rescued these States from oppression and unjust taxation, and all the fearful consequences of usurped power. The sons of these noble ancestors are now the enemies of my Government, and on your swords I depend to bring them into subjection to our Federal Union. Fellow soldiers! Candor demands of me to make the declaration, that the system of taxation which this people have resolved to resist, I have, in another capacity, denounced as unnecessary, unjust, and oppressive. I have admonished the Legislature that the laws imposing them ought to be repealed. They have not been repealed, but remain in full force and effect. Your countrymen and fellow-citizens of this State have long complained of this oppression, but their remonstrances have remained unanswered. Their complaints are just, and their cause is that of an oppressed people. But they refuse obedience to these laws; and my motto is, "The Federal Union must be preserved." It is the duty of a soldier to act, not to think. The majesty of the laws demands that these offenders be punished, without regard to the oppression which they seek to redress.

To arms, then, and vanquish these haughty sons of Carolina; let your watchword be tribute or extermination; and when none are left to contest my power, you will return in triumph to your homes; and I will cause that justice to be done to those who survive, which has been denied to the victims of your invincible prowess.

Sir, this address may not be in good taste; it may not satisfy him who has at his command a whole cabinet of caterers, ready to dress up a dish to suit the palates of all the political epicures of the day; but there is one thing for which I think I may safely vouch: it contains more unsophisticated truths than are to be found in any state paper which we have seen on this subject. The records of the country attest these truths, and it would ill become the illustrious individual who is supposed to deliver the address to conceal them. If these can gain it admission in the archives of the Department of State, under the broad seal, I claim for it that high distinction. Sir, I ask, what man who breathes the free air of this favored land, and who is not dead to all the sensibilities of our nature, could be induced to raise his arm or point his bayonet against his fellow man, in such a cause? If we cast our eyes over the Atlantic, and view the scenes which have transpired in ill-fated Poland, we may profit by the lessons they impart to us. We are told that, not many months past, an order was given to a battalion of Prussian soldiers, (those machines of royalty and despotism, who are accustomed to execute the will of their master with as little remorse or compunction as the butcher feels who slaughters the meek and innocent lamb,) to fire on the unfortunate exiled Poles who had fled for refuge to the territories of his Prussian Majesty, after having bravely and heroically fought to give liberty to their country; but the latent spark of humanity, which can never be wholly extinguished, even in the bosom of the highway robber, broke through its icy casement, and arrested the arms of these minions of the palace. They refused, at the imminent hazard of their lives, obedience to a command so revolting to the honor of a soldier! May I not hope, sir, that such an example from the slaves of a despot will not be disparaged by the gallant freemen of America? Can it be possible that the noble spirit which animated the patriots of the revolution has departed from among us, and given place to the vilest passions of the human heart? If such is not the humiliating fact, that redeeming spirit will dispel the mist which for a while may obscure the sun of our glory; and those who seek to cover the land with desolation will learn that the hand of a freeman becomes paralyzed when raised to shed his brother's blood. I trust I do not overrate the high chivalry of my countrymen in forming this estimate of their character. In such a war no laurel wreath can be gathered, but the cypress of mourning will darken the brow and tarnish the fame of him who wears it. Sir, this mad scheme of military operations against a sovereign State is not now for the first time brought before the Senate. During the administration of President Adams, the Legislature of the State of Georgia passed laws to annul or nullify the laws of Congress regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes within her limits, and also the treaties which had been entered into between the United States and the Creek and Cherokee tribes of Indians. These laws assumed the right of the State to legislate over the territory in the occupancy of the Indian tribes within the boundaries of the State, the laws and treaties of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. They provided severe penalties on all who should violate them; they were carried into effect in their courts of justice; and the authority of the President of the United States was set at defiance.

Sir, I am one of those who think that Georgia had a right, in her sovereign capacity, to exercise jurisdiction over all persons who might reside or be found within her chartered limits; but I have entertained doubts whether the oath which her laws prescribed to citizens of other States, residing among the Indians, was strictly compatible with that article of the constitution of the United States, which secures to the citizens of each State "all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in the several States." But, nevertheless, this oath was prescribed and enforced, and citizens of Massachusetts were incarcerated in the penitentiary for refusing to take it. Well, sir, President Adams made a communication on the subject of these acts of the State of Georgia, and the question arose, whether the Government possessed the power to coerce the State into obedience by military force. This was a case of Georgia nullification; a clear case of revolution, according to the dictum of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; and of treason or rebellion, as it is defined in the proclamation. The message of the President was referred to a select committee of the Senate, of which the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] was chairman, and the Vice President elect [Mr. VAN BUREN] was a member of the committee. Supported as I am by these expounders of the constitution in the orthodox school, I trust I may feel myself safe in reposing on their opinions. The committee made an elaborate report, from which I beg leave to read a few sentences.

"The belief that we have arrived at a crisis when one of the members of this confederacy, placing herself in an attitude of hostility to the residue, has rendered it necessary to resort to the military power of the General Government to coerce her to submission, would be appalling to every friend to the union and happiness of these States; and, though infinitely less in degree, it would be matter of unaffected regret to have forced upon us the conviction that an unwarranted anticipation of such a crisis had led to the unnecessary suggestion of even a conditional determination to have recourse to so afflictive a measure."

"It is believed that, among those axioms which, in a Government like ours, no man may be permitted to dispute, the only security for the permanent union of these States is to be found in the principle of common affection, resting on the basis of common interest. The sanction of the constitution would be impotent to retain in concerted and harmonious action twenty-four sovereignties, hostile in their feelings towards each other, and acting under the impulse of a real or imagined diversity of interests. The resort to force would be alike vain and nugatory. Its frequent use would subject it, with demonstrative certainty, to ultimate failure, whilst its temporary success would be valueless for all the purposes of social happiness. In such contests, however unequal and however transient, the seeds of disunion would be thickly sown; and those who may be destined to witness them will speedily thereafter be called to lament the destruction of the fairest prospect of civil liberty which Heaven in its mercy has vouchsafed to man."

"The committee will not enlarge upon the frightful consequences of civil wars. They are known to be calamitous to single Governments, and fatal to confederacies. Reason tells us this, and history, with her warning voice, confirms it. A contagious fury rages in such contests. No matter how small the beginning, or how insignificant the cause, the dissension spreads until the whole confederacy is involved. The third sacred war, which ended in the ruin of all Greece, began in a trifle, in the attempt of the Amphycions to punish the smallest member of the confederacy for violating some ground which had been consecrated to the god Apollo. The committee will not multiply examples of the same fatal character, of which history is full. They will say that the ultima ratio regum, which cannot be resorted to between two foreign Powers until all the arguments of reason have been tried and exhausted, ought not to be hastily used in a community of States bound together by a confederated Government. The last argument of kings ought not to be the first among associated republics. The tribunal of public opinion should be resorted to. In a free Government it is almost as omnipotent over communities as over individuals. None can despise it. Coupled with a judicial decision, the umpirage of public opinion will be as binding as the decision of arms. In this case the laws have already been appealed to, and the committee most earnestly recommend a reliance upon their efficacy, and upon that instinctive sagacity of public opinion, which rarely fails to discover and to sustain the just side of every great question."

I give to these constitutional views my entire approbation, and can but regret that the distinguished authors of the report are now ranged on the opposite side, when it is proposed to clothe President Jackson with the precise power which they so learnedly and forcibly deprecated. But South Carolina is not Georgia, and President Jackson is not President Adams! In this, I presume, sir, will be found the true solution of the enigma.

Governor Troup, than whom no man has maintained a more uniform and consistent political career; than whom a more pure and enlightened patriot has never adorned the councils of the country; and who, I rejoice to say, is now, as he was while Governor of Georgia, the sincere friend of State rights and constitutional liberty, addressed a message to the Legislature of that State, an extract from which I submit, containing reflections well worthy the attention of honorable Senators in their deliberations on the pending question:

Extract from Governor Troup's Message, Nov. 6, 1827.

"But other rights and interests than those of Georgia are concerned. The doctrine assumed in justification of the menace involves the rights of all the States; it asserts the broad powers of the Executive, the General Government, in any controversy between a State and the United States, to decide the right and wrong of that controversy promptly, absolutely, and finally, without appeal; and to enforce such decision by the sword. A power most awful, tremendous, and unnatural, and not given by the constitution even to Congress. In such a contest Georgia could make no sacrifices too dear, because she contended in a just and righteous cause, not for herself alone, but for all the States, whose honor, dignity, and independence, were alike at stake. Happily for the country, the enforcement of this measure has not been as yet attempted. Whether, on consideration, it has been yielded to more deliberate suggestions and more prudent counsels, or decided as wholly indefensible, and therefore impracticable, or reserved for some other and future occasion, is not known to me, and can only be conjectured; it is reasonable, at least charitable, to conclude that what in this respect ought to be done has been done; and wisdom and moderation can find no amends for the calamities of a civil war in the transfer from Georgia to the Indians of a comparatively worthless fraction of territory, which, but for the principle involved, this Government would not deign to make a subject of angry contention with that of the United States."

But, sir, what shall I say of the course of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORSTER], who is the advocate of this bill? When his own State, acting on her reserved rights as a sovereign member of the Union, nullified the laws and treaties of the United States, which the Legislature considered inconsistent with those rights; when she was threatened with the strong arm of military power to reduce her to obedience, (not so rudely, certainly, as South Carolina has been by the present incumbent of the executive chair,) the honorable gentleman took fire at the indignity and insult offered to Georgia, and, with his usual eloquence, painted in glowing colors the deleterious results which must flow from so great an outrage on State sovereignty. I hope the honorable Senator will pardon me for adopting a part of his able argument on that occasion as a part of my own.

Extract from Mr. Forsyth's speech on the use of force against a sovereign State.

"No judge was called on, no magistrate sought, to command the services of the marshals, sheriffs, or any other civil officer; but a direct appeal was made to force, in the most odious of its forms—military force; a portion of the standing army, of the hired soldiery, were the instruments ordered to be used against a State law, a military force previously carried to the scene of action with the design of preserving peace among the Indians! I ask by what authority the President employed this military force, in a time of profound peace, against one of the confederacy?"

"Whence did the President derive this tremendous power? Did he get it by law? Did he possess it by the constitution? If he did, let it be shown. It is but a short time since, that, on a dispute with South Carolina on the subject of a law of that State prohibiting persons of color from coming into it in foreign vessels, the President, after taking the opinion of the Attorney General, applied to the State to repeal the law, as inconsistent with the obligations of the United States, under the treaty with Great Britain. What was the result? The Legislature vindicated the act, and it still stands on their statute book, in force, and to be enforced, whenever it shall be necessary. Will it be pretended that the President has authority to execute the treaty with Great Britain, by sending a major general, with a portion of the standing army, to Charleston or Beaufort, to rescue from confinement persons who may be in custody under that State law? Would it be endured? Yet, sir, he has done precisely the same thing in Georgia. He has interposed military force to the State law. The bayonets of the United States have been flashed in the eyes of the State authorities, within its own jurisdiction. And for what mighty purpose?"

South Carolina had prohibited persons of color from coming into her ports in foreign vessels, which was deemed a violation of existing treaties with foreign nations. The State was applied to, in a respectful manner, by President Monroe, to repeal the act; she refused to do so, in consequence of the view which her Legislature entertained of the peculiar local condition of the State. That was a plain case of State interposition against the operation of the supreme law of the United States within her limits; another revolution! Let us hear the honorable Senator on that subject: "Will it be pretended that the President has authority to execute the treaty with Great Britain, by sending a major general, with a portion of the standing army, to Charleston or Beaufort, to rescue from confinement persons who may be in custody under that State law? Would it be endured? Yet, sir, he has done precisely the same thing in Georgia. He has interposed military force to the State law." Thus the honorable Senator reasoned when Georgia was concerned. I ask, what principle would prevent the President from sending a major general, and a portion of the standing army, to Charleston, to execute the supreme law of the land, in opposition to a law of the State, which would not equally apply to the sending a major general, with the army and a part of the navy, into the same port, to execute an unconstitutional act of Congress, imposing duties for the protection of domestic manufactures, against a primary law of the State, arresting the operation of the act within her limits? Can it be an outrage "not to be endured," to send a military force into Georgia, to enforce the laws and treaties of the United States against a law of that State, and yet be right to assert the "majesty of the laws" at the point of the bayonet in South Carolina, under circumstances precisely similar? I cannot do less than express some surprise to find the honorable Senator the friend of a measure which he so earnestly condemned in his arguments to which I have adverted. I understand the honorable Senator to maintain, that a protecting tariff is unconstitutional, and therefore void. This bill is intended to make war on South Carolina, to give effect to that which is void in itself; and we find the honorable Senator ranged among its friends! I have read, sir, with great pleasure and satisfaction, a very able speech of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, for whom I feel all the respect which is so justly due to his elevated character and talents, in which he vindicates the right of a sovereign State to interpose and arrest the operation of an unconstitutional act of Congress within her limits. I now find the honorable Senator supporting, with all his great ability, a measure to subdue a State which has so interposed, under the influence, perhaps, in some degree, of his own advice! I cannot exactly comprehend the ground on which these two honorable Senators stand in this debate. The Senator from Tennessee denounces the tariff in the most unqualified terms, as unnecessary, unjust, and oppressive; the Senator from Georgia has given a pledge, yet unredeemed, that he will "die in the last ditch" in opposition to this iniquitous, unjust, and oppressive system; but yet both these Senators may compare advantageously with the stoutest champion of the American system in their support of this bill, which has no other object than the enforcement, by military power, of that system for which they profess so much detestation! I think, sir, the situation of the two honorable Senators may be well described in a single stanza which I have at hand:

"I hate the tariff with all my heart,
And in its support will take no part;
But when Old Hickory calls for the army and navy,
He shall have what he wants, or I'll go to Old Davy."

Honorable Senators who support this bill attempt to console us by the assurance that there is no danger of an indiscreet use of the powers which it vests in the Chief Magistrate; that he was never known to abuse power, in the course of a long life of public service. Now, sir, I frankly own that my opposition to the bill is strengthened by the conviction that the individual now at the head of the Government is not a safe trustee of the extraordinary powers which it confers on him. His passions and prejudices, with honest intentions, too frequently lead him into the most extravagant errors; and we know that, his ground once taken, he is not apt to reason about the consequences: his course is onward to the death; he seldom pauses, and never recedes. I have no confidence that military power in his hand, with victims in his eye, will be discreetly exercised. I have an instinctive dread of mischief, when the bad passions of the human heart are combined with power to gratify their purposes of revenge. I need not remind the Senate of historical facts connected with the biography of President Jackson, which more than justify the remarks which I have made concerning him. I can take no pleasure in a retrospect which might imply a censure on my own judgment, having been one among his most zealous supporters, when his path to the present high elevation which he occupies was overcast by clouds and darkness. I acted on the honest convictions of my mind, and, if I have any thing to regret, it is for my country, not myself. But have we not sufficient warnings in the scenes which are passing before our eyes? To punish crime is the incumbent duty of every civil magistrate; but there is a point at which public justice is satisfied, and at which the divine attribute of mercy interposes to soothe the unfortunate victim of the law. The only prayer that God has given to his creature man, bids us to say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us." Sir, at the commencement of this administration, a bureau officer,* in the Department of the Navy, was found to be a defaulter to the public treasury in some five or six thousand dollars; he was prosecuted, convicted, and imprisoned. He has remained in close confinement for nearly four years, breathing an impure atmosphere, and separated from all the soft endearments of an amiable wife and their lovely offspring. I mean not to defend the act for which he has suffered such unusual punishment, nor to palliate the offence by a reference to the numerous examples of others in like cases offending, but more fortunate in the result. He had appropriated the public funds to his private use, and overrated his means of restoring them. In this I do not hold him guiltless; but,

"Where the oak that sometimes is not blast?
Or, where the sun by clouds not overcast?"

The purest and best of men are not exempt from misfortune or the frailties of human nature, and are sometimes led into errors which inflict a wound on their happiness through life. But this unhappy individual, after all his sufferings, so long endured in a loathsome prison, from the grated windows of which he could look on the spot where peace and domestic felicity once smiled on him, was brought before that high tribunal of justice which sits in another part of this building. His case was maturely considered, and he was regularly discharged. But the cup of Executive vengeance was not yet full; the unfortunate man was permitted to breathe the free air, and to receive the embraces of his fond children, only for a few short moments, before the unrelenting hand of vindictive power again plunged him into the cell from which he had been released by the highest judicial tribunal in the country. No one can believe that the officer who prosecutes in behalf of the Government, in this District, would have been guilty of this wanton act of judicial persecution, without a full knowledge that it would be approved by his master. For the public good, the act was unnecessary; for private revenge, it would seem that four years of imprisonment might have sufficed to soften a heart as indurate as marble. I ask, if the power of war and peace can be safely intrusted to any one, whose turbulent passions cannot yield to the benign influence of humanity?

Sir, if the Union of these States be in danger, it cannot be saved by concentrating exorbitant discretionary powers in any one department of the Government; and especially that which in all Governments is the most dangerous to liberty. The symptoms of plethora in the rush for power and patronage in this Government, portend dissolution; a result which can only be avoided by the depletion of State interposition. Let the new readings of the constitution, with which we have been astounded in this debate, drawn from the Executive proclamation and message, be firmly fixed in the public mind, humble the "proud sovereignty of the States," and erect on its ruins a Government without limitation, capable of executing its own will by the sword; and liberty cannot long endure under the accumulation of causes which must tend to its destruction. With the corrupting influence of patronage, power is purchased by those who dispense it; and by the same means it may be perpetuated in the same hands. We are gravely told that the Legislature of a State may express an opinion that a law of Congress is unconstitutional, and there it must stop until the moral influence of that opinion shall produce the wonderful effect of reformation. A State may petition and remonstrate, and implore other States to unite in its supplications! Sir, the mayor and corporation of Liverpool may express an opinion that an act of Parliament is contrary to the constitution of the realm; they may petition the throne for a redress of grievances, and request other corporations to unite with them. Will honorable gentlemen yield nothing more to a sovereign State of the confederacy than may be claimed as a matter of right by the corporation of Liverpool, under the regal Government of England? The miserable slave who receives the lash of an inexorable master may petition and remonstrate, and implore others to unite with him! Is this poor privilege, which is common to all mankind, under any form of government known in the civilized world, all that the States reserved by an express article of the constitution, when they set up this Government for their own benefit and convenience? Sir, the idea is shocking to the feelings of a free people; it is a monstrous absurdity, and cannot be endured. I fall behind no man in my devotion to the Union, unless he is prepared to place it above the liberties of the country; and, so help me God, I would rather trust this Union to the umpirage of South Carolina, much as she has been abused on this floor, than to any State, or body of men whatever, who are ready and willing to "sell their birthright for a mess of pottage."

Mr. President: It was not my intention to have said any thing on the subject of a tariff for the protection of domestic manufactures. I do not think it ought properly to have been introduced into this debate. But, as several honorable Senators have delivered their opinions on that branch of national policy, I will briefly express my own in relation to it. I do not intend to take a mercantile view of the operations of the existing tariff; I freely confess that I feel myself incompetent to the task. I am no merchant, and cannot therefore discuss the question by a calculation of dollars and cents. I differ from some of my friends in estimating the actual injury which, as a cotton planter, I sustain by the effects of the system. On this part of the subject, however, I am conscious that I do not possess accurate information.

"He who is robbed, not wanting what is stolen, Let him not know it, he's not robbed at all."

It is this blessed ignorance which renders indirect taxation tolerable, when the same amount, taken from the pockets of the people by direct taxes, would produce a revolution in good earnest; not one of those imaginary revolutions which have given so much uneasiness to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] I deny the power of this Government to regulate labor by bounties, monopolies, or penal enactments; such a power is incompatible with human liberty, and is exercised only in despotic or arbitrary Governments. Of this character, I consider the power claimed to levy imposts for the protection of domestic manufactures. A despot regulates the industry of his subjects by proclamation, and they are bound to obey. We have not yet reached that point, but the same end is accomplished by legislative inducements. We tax one description of labor, and grant bounties to another description of labor, and leave the people to choose between the tax and the bounty! This is wholly inconsistent with the principles of free government, and contrary to the spirit of the constitution of the United States, which secures to all an equality of burdens and benefits. The power of taxation, in any form, is in its nature despotic; it is yielded only on the ground of absolute necessity. By what authority does an officer enter the dwelling of a citizen, and, without the intervention of a court or jury, sequester a part of his estate, and put the proceeds into the public treasury? The right is derived from the consent of those who form the social compact. The members of the State, or community, individually receive from the Government and laws protection of life, liberty, and property; the virtuous are protected against the injustice of the vicious; the weak are protected from the depredations of the strong. In consideration of these securities, the power of taxation is given by common consent, and is limited to its only legitimate object, the necessary wants of the Government. Each individual is bound to contribute his just proportion of the expenditures incurred in the enactment and execution of the laws. Whenever this high power is exercised for any other object, the Government assumes the character of unmixed despotism. No people can be free where the power of unlimited taxation is claimed and exercised. The constitution has been formed in vain, if such a gigantic power belongs to this Government. The most unbridled despot would be harmless, if disrobed of the power to tax his subjects; and with such a power, without limitation, a Government, free in all its forms and features in every other respect, would be in fact despotic. If the power of direct taxation, which is expressly granted in the constitution, be used for any other purpose than the necessary expenditures of the Government, it would amount to a violation of the spirit of the constitution, resulting from the abuse of the granted power.

Sir, I have trespassed already too long on the patience of the Senate, and will, therefore, forbear to enlarge further on these topics, which open a wide field of interesting matter for the consideration of an American statesman. The power to levy imposts on foreign importations was not intended to be used for the purposes to which it has been applied. Protection to domestic manufactures is the result of duties imposed for revenue, and is not a substantive power granted in the constitution. If honorable gentlemen think otherwise, I challenge them to pass a law for the express purpose of protecting any branch of domestic industry; let it speak a plain, honest, and intelligible language, which will enable the Supreme Court of the United States to decide the question, and I, for one, will abide by its decision. But I take it on myself to say they will not, that they dare not, pass such an act. I quote the opinion of Mr. Hamilton, whose able report on domestic manufactures has been so often referred to, and in most of which I fully concur, to show that an extension of the revenue was considered by him the proper limitation on the power to tax articles of consumption. I beg leave to give the concise view which he has taken of that subject, in his own words:

"It is a signal advantage of taxes on articles of consumption, that they contain in their own nature a security against excess. They prescribe their own limits, which cannot be exceeded without defeating the end proposed; that is, an extension of the revenue. When applied to this object, the saying is as just as it is witty, that, 'in political arithmetic, two and two do not always make four.' If duties are too high, they lessen the consumption, the collection is eluded, and the product to the treasury is not so great as when they are confined within proper and moderate bounds.

"This forms a complete barrier against any material oppression of the citizens by taxes of this class, and is itself a natural limitation of the power of imposing them."

The whole argument may be compressed into a very narrow compass; the power to levy duties on foreign importations is expressly granted; it was intended to produce a revenue, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. Every duty so imposed for these enumerated objects is, to the extent of it, a protection to the domestic manufacturer of the same article; but every protection is not necessarily a duty for revenue. The conclusion is unavoidable: whenever we arrive at the point where revenue ceases, and protection forms the only object of our legislation, we are exercising a substantive power not to be found in the constitution. I will detain the Senate no longer on this question, incidentally touched in this debate, but will hasten to the close of my arguments. Sir, I am not the enemy of domestic manufactures; I would not, if it were in my power, disturb that interest by any rash or precipitate measure. I wish to see it flourish and prosper, but not at the expense of agriculture and commerce, which are so intimately connected, that the one cannot exist to any great extent without the aid of the other. But I admonish honorable gentlemen who represent the manufacturing States on this floor, that it is not by means of military power, such as is provided for in this bill, that the system is to be preserved. March an army into South Carolina, if one can be embodied in such a cause, and from that moment the manufacturing interest of the Eastern and Northern States may date its downfall. Deprived of the Southern market, they could not survive a single year. Sir, where there is no "goose to pick," we shall not, I presume, quarrel about the feathers. Modify the tariff, as proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY;] preserve the manufacturing interests from sudden depression; render but half justice to the brave and generous people of the South; and tranquillity will be restored to the country.

Mr. P. then adverted to the remarks of Mr. WEBSTER in relation to the speech of Mr. CALHOUN, delivered in the House of Representatives in 1816, on the tariff act of that year. Sir, (said he,) I regret that the honorable Senator has opened the door to an examination of the opinions ascribed to my friend from South Carolina, on the subject of a tariff for the protection of domestic manufactures; but, as he has thought proper to do so, he will pardon me, I hope, if I look into his own political parlor on this subject, and see if the furniture has not undergone some change long subsequent to the year 1816. The act to which the honorable Senator refers was passed under peculiar circumstances. We had just emerged out of a war with Great Britain; manufactures had sprung up during that war; we had incurred an enormous debt, of one hundred and thirty millions of dollars; to meet the payment of which required the revenue to be placed at the highest practicable point. The course of the Senator from South Carolina was dictated by these considerations; and if liberality to the manufacturers was one of them, they ought to be the last men in the world to complain of it. Sir, it is not my province to pronounce the eulogy of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, but I think it due to candor to say, that no man has been more injured by unjust imputations and unfounded calumnies than that honorable gentleman. Prior to and during the late war, he ably and manfully defended the rights, the honor, and independence of his country; and in every high public station which he has subsequently filled, he has maintained the elevated character which he then acquired, as an enlightened statesman, a patriot, and an honest man. Posterity will do him that justice which has been denied by the demagogues and political aspirants of the present day.

Mr. P. then adverted to the speech of Mr. WEBSTER delivered at Faneuil Hall, in opposition to a protecting tariff, and to the speech of the same Senator in the House of Representatives, on the tariff of 1824. He then proceeded to make a few remarks, the tendency of which was to show that at those periods the honorable Senator from Massachusetts held the constitutionality of a protecting tariff to be at least extremely doubtful, and altogether inexpedient. Sir, (he continued,) since the year 1824, the opinions of the honorable Senator seem to have undergone a total change on these great questions; and all I mean to say is, that if there be times and seasons when a statesman may put down one set of political opinions and take up others, the honorable gentleman has enjoyed his full share of that privilege.

The Senator from Massachusetts has, in strong language, denounced the State of South Carolina, and along with it the entire South, who have, with one voice, pronounced the system of protection to domestic manufactures to be unjust and unconstitutional. He considers resistance, in any form, to this favorite measure, in no other light than as revolution, treason, or rebellion against the Government of the United States, calling for signal punishment by means of the strong arm of military power.

He has told us that the supremacy of the law must be vindicated, and supported, be it just or unjust. In such a cause, the honorable Senator has promised to stand in the foremost ranks, and stretch forth his arm to defend the constitution and the laws against every assault which may be made on them; and if, in a contest to maintain their supremacy, he should fall a victim to his enthusiastic patriotism, his expiring words to his surviving countrymen would be, "rescue, rescue, rescue."

The honorable gentleman cannot expect that language like this should pass without animadversion. Sir, I come from that abused section of the confederacy; and it becomes my imperious duty to defend it against the unmerited reproaches which have been cast on it with such unbridled freedom by the honorable Senator. Where stood Carolina in the recent arduous struggle with Great Britain—a war which, like that of the revolution, had its origin in Faneuil Hall, and was prosecuted exclusively for the protection of our commerce on the high seas? Where stood the whole South in those days which tried men's souls, and called forth all the energies and patriotism of the American people?

Sir, they were at the post of danger whenever it was to be found, fighting to maintain the honor and independence of their country, freely contributing to the public burdens, and sharing in the common dangers and hardships of their countrymen, in a cause where they had nothing to gain, but the proud distinction which a free people ever accord to the defenders of liberty. These facts are recorded in the pages of history, and cannot be denied or perverted.

Where stood that honorable Senator and his constituents on the same memorable occasion, when the hostile fleets and armies of a foreign enemy enveloped the whole coast, and even occupied the soil of the State of which he is now a representative on this floor? When the standard of the enemy waved over the territory of Massachusetts, and her authorities were defied and contemned; when all that ought to be dear to the patriot's heart was staked on the issue of the conflict; was the honorable Senator found in the foremost ranks of his country's defenders, and did he then exclaim, in sad despair, "rescue, rescue, rescue?" No, sir. In that arduous but glorious contest with the most powerful nation in Europe, we defended the honor of our flag, and gained among the nations of the earth a name of imperishable renown. We did not "scramble" for plunder and bounties; and the voice of the Senator was not heard to animate his countrymen to the rescue. The arms of his invaded country had no charms for him, nor was he to be found in the front or rear rank of the patriotic few who breasted the storm in that hour of national peril. No, sir, there was then no need of rescue, and the gentleman's patriotism became torpid and lifeless, amidst the hostile array and desolation of the invaders.

If, sir, there is any want of decorum, or any apparent departure from the courtesy of debate, in this review of the past history of our country, I claim to be exempt from all responsibility for its introduction on this floor. The honorable Senator has put forth all his powers in popular denunciations of Southern men and Southern principles; and if, in our own defence, the ear of the gentleman should be offended by words once familiar to him, he cannot complain when we send him a Roland for his Oliver.

[Here Mr. POINDEXTER read the proceedings of a meeting held in Massachusetts, in September, 1814; the speech of Mr. WEBSTER in the House of Representatives; and quoted the votes of the Senator, refusing supplies to carry on the war.]

Foreign war, actual invasion, the national honor and independence, staked on the issue of physical force; and yet the Senator refused his assent to the necessary appropriations for carrying on the war, and taunted the constituted authorities, to whom the prosecution of the war had been confided, with the failure of our arms, while he, by his votes, denied them the means of more effectual operations, and a more vigorous resistance to the common enemy.

Did the rebels of South Carolina encourage the hopes of our adversary? Did they pass resolves to treat with commanders of British armed vessels cruising in our waters for pecuniary advantages? Did they repose in apathy, and suffer the armies of a foreign nation to tread the soil of America, without an effort to expel them? No, sir. They met with manly firmness the ruthless invader; shed their blood and expended their treasure in the common cause. Now, sir, the patriotism of the honorable Senator has risen to its climax; he finds the people of one State resisting what they deem to be oppressive and usurped legislation on the part of this Government; he finds those people in a fearful minority; he refuses to listen to their complaints; and, to reduce them to obedience to unjust taxation, he calls aloud for vengeance and the law.

Where resistance is comparatively feeble, the danger cannot be great; and with such an assurance the honorable gentleman boldly comes forth the champion of the "majesty of the law;" and where the blows are hardest, and the bullets fly thickest, there will he be found, in the foremost ranks, in a war with those whom he has contributed to ruin and oppress. For the glory of such chivalry, sir, I am no candidate.

The Senator from Massachusetts ranges himself on the side of power. I take my stand with those who seek to limit power within its defined boundaries. He supports the supremacy of the laws; I defend the rights of the people. And, sir, I say in conclusion, that when liberty is assailed by the combined forces of avarice and ambition, I will be found in the foremost ranks of her votaries; and, if vanquished by the strong arm of arbitrary power, and the brightest hopes of freedom which God has ever permitted his creature man to enjoy shall be annihilated and extinguished forever, my last words to my countrymen who survive the conflict shall be—"Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God!"

[Mr. P. continued his remarks until half-past 6 o'clock, (with the exception of the recess,) when, complaining of fatigue, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried by the casting vote of the President. The entire speech is given above.]

NOTES TO MR. POINDEXTER'S SPEECH.

Virginia Debates, p. 66.

Mr. Henry said: "The honorable gentleman who presides [Judge Pendleton] told us that, to prevent abuses in our Government, we will assemble in convention, recall our delegated powers, and punish our servants for abusing the trust reposed in them. Oh, sir, we should have fine times, indeed, if to punish tyrants it were only sufficient to assemble the people! Your arms, [with which you could defend yourselves, are gone; and you have no longer an aristocratical, no longer a democratical spirit. Did you ever read of any revolution in any nation, brought about by the punishment of those in power, inflicted by those who had no power at all? You read of a riot act in a country which is called one of the freest in the world, where a few neighbors cannot assemble without the risk of being shot by a hired soldiery, the engines of despotism. We may see such an act in America."

Revenue Collection Bill.

[SENATE.]

Again: "The honorable gentleman, [Mr. MADISON,] in endeavoring to answer the question, why the militia were to be called forth to execute the laws, said that the civil power would probably do it. He is driven to say that the civil power may do it instead of the militia. Sir, the military power ought not to interpose till the civil power refuse. If this be the spirit of your new constitution, that the laws are to be enforced by military coercion, we may easily divine the happy consequences which will result from it. The civil power is not to be employed at all. If it be, show me it. I read it attentively, and could see nothing to warrant the belief that the civil power can be called for. I would be glad to see the power that authorizes Congress to do so. The sheriff will be aided by military force. The most wanton excesses may be committed under color of this. For every man in office in the States is to take an oath to support it in all its operations. The honorable gentleman said, in answer to the objection, that the militia might be marched from New Hampshire to Georgia; that the members of the Government would not attempt to excite the indignation of the people. Here, again, we have the general unsatisfactory answer, that they will be virtuous, and that there is no danger. Will gentlemen be satisfied with an answer which admits of dangers and abuses, if they be wicked? Let us put it out of their power to do mischief. I am convinced there is no safety in the paper on the table as it stands now. I am sorry to have an occasion to pass a eulogium on the British Government, as gentlemen may object to it. But how natural it is, when comparing deformities to beauty, to be struck with the superiority of the British Government to that system."

Extract from Luther Martin's exposé to the Legislature of Maryland.

"In answer to these declarations it was urged, that if, after having retained to the General Government the great powers already granted, and among those that of raising and keeping up regular troops without limitations, the power over the militia should be taken away from the States, and also given to the General Government, it ought to be considered as the last coup de grace to the State Governments; that it must be the most convincing proof that the advocates of this system design the destruction of the State Governments, and that no professions to the contrary ought to be trusted; and that every State in the Union ought to reject such a system with indignation, since, if the General Government should attempt to oppress and enslave them, they could not have any possible means of self-defence; because the proposed system, taking away from the States the right of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, the first attempt made by a State to put the militia in a situation to counteract the arbitrary measures of the General Government, would be construed into an act of rebellion or treason, and Congress would immediately march their troops into the State."

Extracts from Mr. Hamilton's speech in the New York convention.

"It has been well observed, that to coerce the States is one of the maddest projects that was ever devised. A failure of compliance will never be confined to a single State. This being the case, can we suppose it wise to hazard a civil war? Suppose Massachusetts, or any large State, should refuse, and Congress should attempt to compel them, would they not have influence to procure assistance, especially from those States which are in the same situation as themselves. What picture does this idea present to our view? A complying State at war with a non-complying State; Congress marching the troops of one State into the bosom of another; this State collecting auxiliaries, and forming, perhaps, a majority against its federal head. Here is a nation at war with itself. Can any reasonable man be well disposed towards a Government which makes war and carnage the only means of supporting itself—a Government that can exist only by the sword? Every such war must involve the innocent with the guilty. This single consideration should be sufficient to dispose every peaceable citizen against such a Government."

"The States can never lose their powers till the whole people of America are robbed of their liberties. These must go together; they must support each other, or meet one common fate."

"The States, as well as individuals, are bound by these laws; but the laws of Congress are restricted to a certain sphere, and when they depart from this sphere, they are no longer supreme or binding."

"In the first formation of government, by the association of individuals, every power of the community is delegated, because the Government is to extend to every possible object; nothing is reserved but the unalienable rights of mankind. But, when a number of these societies unite for certain purposes, the rule is different, and for the plainest reason: they have already delegated their sovereignty and their powers to their several Governments; and these cannot be recalled, and given to another, without an express act."

Extract from the Federalist, p. 70.

Mr. Hamilton: "There is one transcendent advantage belonging to the province of State Governments, which alone suffices to place the matter in a clear and satisfactory light: I mean the ordinary administration of criminal and civil justice. This, of all others, is the most powerful, most universal, and most attractive source of popular obedience and attachment. It is this which, being the immediate and visible guardian of life and property, having its benefits and its terrors in constant activity before the public eye, regulating all those personal interests and familiar concerns to which the sensibility of individuals is more immediately awake, contributes more than any other circumstance to impress upon the minds of the people affection, esteem, and reverence towards the Government. This great cement of society, which will diffuse itself through the channels of the particular Government, independent of all other causes of influence, would insure them so decided an empire over their respective citizens, as to render them, at all times, a complete counterpoise, and not unfrequently dangerous rivals to the power of the Union."

Extract from the Federalist, p. 116.

Mr. Hamilton: "It may safely be received as an axiom in our political system, that the State Governments will, in all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty by the national authority. Projects of usurpation cannot be marked under pretences so likely to escape the penetration of select bodies of men, as of the people at large. The Legislatures will have better means of information; they can discover the danger at a distance; and, possessing all the organs of civil power and the confidence of the people, they can at once adopt a regular plan of opposition, in which they can combine all the resources of the community. They can readily communicate with each other in different States, and unite their common forces for the protection of their common liberty."

Extracts from Mr. Wilson's speech in the Pennsylvania convention.

"But in the constitution, the citizens of the United States appear dispensing a part of their original power in what manner and what proportion they think fit. They never part with the whole, and they retain the right of recalling what they part with. When, therefore, they possess, as I have already mentioned, the fee-simple of authority, why should they have recourse to the minute and subordinate remedies, which can be necessary only to those who pass the fee, and reserve only a rent-charge?"

"It has been mentioned, and attempts have been made to establish the position, that the adoption of this constitution will necessarily be followed by the annihilation of all the State Governments. If this was a necessary consequence, the objection would operate in my mind with exceeding great force. But, sir, I think the inference is rather unnatural, that a Government will produce the annihilation of others, upon the very existence of which its own existence depends."

"Does it appear, then, that provision for the continuance of the State Governments was neglected in framing this constitution? On the contrary, it was a favorite object in the convention to secure them."

"The President of the United States is to be chosen by electors appointed in the different States, in such manner as the Legislature shall direct. Unless there be Legislatures to appoint electors, the President cannot be chosen: the idea, therefore, of the existing Government of the States is presupposed in the very mode of constituting the legislative and executive departments of the General Government. The same principle will apply to the judicial department. The judges are to be nominated by the President, and appointed by him, with the advice and consent of the Senate. This shows that the judges cannot exist without the President and Senate. I have already shown that the President and Senate cannot exist without the existence of the State Legislatures. Have I misstated any thing? Is not the evidence indisputable that the State Governments will be preserved, or that the General Government must tumble amidst their ruins? It is true, indeed, sir, although it presupposes the existence of the State Governments, yet this constitution does not suppose them to be the sole power to be respected."

"I hope these observations on the nature and formation of this system are seen in their full force; many of them were so seen by some gentlemen of the late convention. After all this, could it have been expected that assertions, such as have been hazarded on this floor, would have been made, 'that it was the business of their deliberations to destroy the State Governments; that they employed four months to accomplish this object; and that such was their intention?' That honorable gentleman may be better qualified to judge of their intentions than themselves. I know my own, and, as to those of other members, I believe that they have been very improperly and unwarrantably represented. Intended to destroy! Where did he obtain his information? Let the tree be judged by its fruit."

"I will ask now, is the inference fairly drawn that the General Government was intended to swallow up the State Governments? Or was it calculated to answer such end? Or do its framers deserve such censure from honorable gentlemen? We find, on examining this paragraph, that it contains nothing more than the maxims of self-preservation, so abundantly secured by this constitution to the individual States. Several other objections have been mentioned; I will not, at this time, enter into a discussion of them, though I may hereafter take notice of such as have any show of weight; but I thought it necessary to offer, at this time, the observations I have made, because I consider this as an important subject, and think the objection would be a strong one if it was well founded."

"When I made the observation, that some politicians would say the supreme power was lodged in our State constitutions, I did not suspect that the honorable gentleman from Westmoreland [Mr. FINDLY] was included in that description; but I find myself disappointed: for I imagined his opposition would arise from another consideration. His position is, that the supreme power resides in the States as Governments; and mine is, that it resides in the people, as the foundation of government; that the people have not, that the people meant not, and that the people ought not, to part with it to any Government whatsoever. In their hands it remains secure; they can delegate it in such proportions, to such bodies, on such terms, and under such limitations, as they think proper. I agree with the members in opposition, that there cannot be two sovereign powers on the same subject."

"I consider the people of the United States as forming one great community; and I consider the people of the different States as forming communities again on a lesser scale. From this great division of the people into distinct communities, it will be found necessary that different proportions of legislative powers should be given to the Governments, according to the nature, number, and magnitude of their objects."

Extract from the Federalist, p. 99.

Mr. Madison: "The State Governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government; whilst the latter is nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State Legislatures, the President of the United States cannot be elected at all; they must, in all cases, have a great share in his appointment; and will, perhaps, in most cases, of themselves determine it. The Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State Legislatures. Even the House of Representatives, though drawn immediately from the people, will be chosen very much under the influence of that class of men, whose influence over the people obtains for themselves an election into the State Legislatures. Thus each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will owe its existence, more or less, to the favor of the State Governments, and must consequently feel a dependence, which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing towards them."

Extract from a speech delivered by Mr. Madison, in reply to Mr. Henry, in the Virginia convention.

"But it is urged, that its consolidated nature, joined to the power of direct taxation, will give it a tendency to destroy all subordinate authority; that its increasing influence will speedily enable it to absorb the State Governments. I cannot think this will be the case. If the General Government were wholly independent of the Governments of the particular States, then, indeed, usurpation might be expected to the fullest extent: but, sir, on whom does this General Government depend? It derives its authority from these Governments, and from the same sources from which their authority is derived. The members of the Federal Government are taken from the same men from whom those of the State Legislatures are taken. If we consider the mode in which the federal representatives will be chosen, we shall be convinced that the general will never destroy the individual Governments."

F.

Extracts from the President's message of the 16th January.

"If these measures cannot be defeated and overcome by the power conferred by the constitution on the Federal Government, the constitution must be considered as incompetent to its defence; the supremacy of the laws is at an end; and the rights and liberties of the citizens can no longer receive protection from the Government of the Union."

themselves at will, without the consent of the other States, from their most solemn obligations, and hazard the liberties and happiness of the millions composing this Union, cannot be acknowledged."

"Nothing less than causes which would justify revolutionary remedy can absolve the people from this obligation; and for nothing less can the Government permit it to be done, without a violation of its own obligations, by which, under the compact, it is bound to the other States, and to every citizen of the United States."

"Upon the power of Congress, the veto of the Executive, and the authority of the Judiciary, which is to extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, are the obvious checks; and the sound action of public opinion, with the ultimate power of amendment, are the salutary and only limitations upon the powers of the whole."

"The law of a State cannot authorize the commission of a crime against the United States, or any other act which, according to the supreme law of the Union, would be otherwise unlawful. And it is equally clear that, if there be any case in which a State, as such, is affected by the law, beyond the scope of judicial power, the remedy consists in appeals to the people either to effect a change in the representation, or to procure relief by an amendment of the constitution. But the measures of the Government are to be recognised as valid, and, consequently, supreme, until these remedies shall have been effectually tried; and every attempt to subvert these measures, or to render the laws subordinate to State authority, and afterwards to resort to constitutional redress, is worse than evasive."

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20.

SHEATHING COPPER.

Mr. SMITH moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the act to amend the act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.

This act has reference to the duty on sheathing copper.

Mr. KNIGHT said he would inquire of the honorable Senator from Maryland, whether he intended this duty for revenue or for protection? He had stated that it was a mere revenue duty, but his argument was that several manufactories would be broken up without this protection. If it is for revenue only, we do not need it; but if for protection, I am in favor of it. I am in favor of discriminating duties, giving incidental protection to manufactures.

Mr. SMITH stated, that the English had taken measures to evade the payment of the duty, and the bill became necessary to counteract them.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, the bill was a bill for protection.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. POINDEXTER resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill, (as given above.)

The Senate then took a recess. Having reassembled at 5 o'clock, P. M.

Mr. GRUNDY rose. He said that, in the shortest time practicable, he would endeavor to discharge that duty which had been assigned to him by the Judiciary Committee, which was to close this debate on their part, and rescue, if he could, this bill, its authors, and that department of the Government by which this measure had been recommended, from that unmerited and unmeasured injustice which had been inflicted upon them in the course of this discussion.

I am, said Mr. G., no advocate for despotism, civil war, or blood; on the contrary, it is because I abhor and dread these things, and love the peace, tranquillity, and safety of my country, that I support the bill upon your table. I am an advocate for the empire of the laws. While they govern, I know that American liberty is safe; when they fail of their effect, or in their execution, then follow anarchy, civil strife, and bloodshed, with despotism in their train.

Gentlemen who have argued against and condemned the provisions of the bill, have evaded the true question involved in this discussion; but they shall not be permitted to escape from it. It is not whether the tariff laws are unjust and oppressive. If that were the subject in controversy, I would unite my voice with theirs, in their denunciations against them. Nor is the question whether civil war be not among the greatest calamities which can befall this, or any other nation. This, none of the friends of this bill would controvert. The true question before the Senate is, shall the State of South Carolina be permitted to put down the revenue laws of the Union, prevent their execution within her limits, and no effort be made by this Government to maintain the majesty of the laws, and to counteract the measures adopted by that State to defeat and evade them? This is the true question, and to it shall my argument be mainly directed. I shall not attempt to deliver any metaphysical dissertation on the science of government, but will present a plain, practical view of the subject; and I think I can safely promise to prove, that, unless this bill, or something equivalent to it, shall pass, this whole Government is unstrung; that all its vigor and energy are gone; and that a bare majority of the people of one State out of the twenty-four will have succeeded in accomplishing a more daring enterprise than was ever undertaken in ancient or modern times, under similar circumstances. Sir, there is a boldness in this undertaking which commands the admiration of those whose judgments condemn it. If it be the will of the Senate that success shall attend the efforts of that State in rendering the laws ineffectual, be it so. I shall acquit myself of all responsibility for the consequences, by endeavoring to prevent it. Whether this bill proposes extravagant legislation, or not, depends entirely upon the measures adopted and pursued by that State, and which are intended to be counteracted. If their measures be strong, those adopted here to meet them must be of the same character, or they will be unavailing.

Let us now see what South Carolina has done, that we may judge what is proper on our part. By her ordinance it is declared that the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832 are null, void, and of no effect; and all promises, contracts, and obligations, entered into to secure the payment of duties, utterly void. This embraces bonds given before, as well as those given after, the adoption of the ordinance. Bonds for duties heretofore given for the payment of moneys necessary to discharge the public debt, and other demands upon the Government, are all included. This is a direct infraction of that provision of the federal constitution which forbids any State to pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. The ordinance also forbids the enforcement of the tariff laws, either by the State or federal authorities, within the limits of South Carolina. It further directs the Legislature to pass all laws necessary to carry this ordinance into effect.

Had nothing more been done, no action on the part of this Government would have been required. The Judiciary of the State, and of the United States, would have been left at liberty to decide upon the effect of the acts of Congress, and of this fundamental law of South Carolina, as her Senators choose to denominate the ordinance. So soon as it was adopted, the Legislature of that State was in session, and the acts passed of which I will now speak, and against the effects of which this bill is intended to provide.

The first is the replevin act. This is a law of force; its certain effect is to produce collision by arms, between the Federal and State authorities, unless the officers of the United States shall wholly disregard their duty, and submit to the authorities of South Carolina. This act authorizes the owner or consignee, when the goods are in the hands of the collector, and before the duties are paid or secured, to sue out the writ of replevin, "and the whole proceedings upon it shall be as in other cases of replevin, according to the laws and usages of the State," &c.

Whoever penned this act was well skilled in all the learning of the ancient law upon this subject; in the execution of this writ, force can be employed; the officer can call out the posse comitatus; armed men can be called in to aid in its execution; doors may be broken open; fortresses and strong fortified places may be reduced and demolished to their very foundations. It is not pretended that the common laws and ancient statutes upon this subject have been changed by the State of South Carolina, or that they are not in force in that State. It is therefore material to a right understanding of the true character of this proceeding, by writ of replevin, that we ascertain, by writ, what kind of force can be employed in its execution. To show this, I will read an extract from the law of distress and replevin, by Lord Baron Gilbert, pages 78 and 79. It is as follows: "If the distress be drawn into a house, castle, or other stronghold, the sheriff or his bailiff, after demand made for the deliverance of the distress, may break open the house or castle to replevy them. This seems to be the common law; for, though a man's house is privileged by common law for himself, his family, and his own goods, so that the sheriff cannot break it open to attach any of them, at the suit of a private person, yet a man's house could not privilege or protect the goods of another person, unjustly taken, so as to prevent the officer to make replevin, because the privilege and security of a man's house could protect his own goods. This practice, however, of driving distresses into strongholds, was so frequent in the barons' wars, and the poorer sort suffered so much from the men of power, that the statute of West, 1, c. 17, expressly gives this power to the sheriff or his officer to break the house, to make delivery of the cattle, whether the replevin be by plaint or writ: this, as is said, must be after demand made, and notice given to the lord to suffer them to be replevied. And to deter the person distraining from refusing or neglecting to deliver the distress, the statute further directs that the castle or stronghold shall be razed and thrown down." Suppose a vessel arrives at Charleston with a cargo subject to duties, and the collector, in discharge of his duty, takes possession of the goods, to secure the duties; a writ of replevin is issued out, and placed in the hands of the sheriff; he demands the goods of the collector, who refuses to surrender them; a single blast of the bugle can bring the two thousand city guards who have been raised under another act passed by the Legislature of South Carolina, to carry the ordinance into effect; the custom-house is broken open, and the goods removed under this forcible proceeding, provided by the State of South Carolina; your collector has no means of preventing this, and the property is wrested from him, although the laws of the United States require him to retain the possession until the payment of the duties is secured. According to the views of those who oppose the passage of the bill, all this is peaceful, although force be used by the officers of the State; but the moment the friends of the bill say this proceeding is wrong, and this force thus improperly employed should be resisted in preservation of the laws, gentlemen exclaim, you are making war! If the State provides a measure of force to put down the laws, are we making war if we provide similar means to defend and sustain them?

If no force be used against the execution of the laws of the United States, none will or can be employed to enforce them under this bill. The force contemplated is strictly defensive, never to be used except to repel force actually engaged in opposition to the laws of the Union. Should the collector succeed in securing the goods, and preventing the sheriff from getting possession of them, a capias in withernam is directed to be issued, by which double the amount of the collector's property is taken; and the same forcible means are to be employed in the execution of this writ. Further, should the marshal or collector obtain possession of the goods in either case, under an order or process from the federal courts, they are to be recaptured by the use and application of the like force as is provided for the execution of the writs of replevin and capias in withernam.

In all these preliminary steps, force, armed force, is authorized by the State of South Carolina. The object of which is to secure the possession of the property in the State officer, in order that the State courts alone may take cognizance of the matters in controversy. In this state of things, the parties are to go into the State courts of South Carolina, to litigate their rights. The very act of resorting to a court of justice ordinarily conveys to the mind the idea that a fair, impartial, and unprejudiced hearing is to take place; that the cause is first to be heard, then decided; not decided, and then heard; that the law and facts of the case are to be fully examined, a judgment formed, and then pronounced. But when one of these cases comes on for trial, the judge has been sworn specially to decide the great point in the cause against one of the parties; every juror is sworn in like manner. These are revolutionary tribunals, not courts of justice; and the very men who are complaining of injustice and oppression are practising them with a higher hand than has ever been witnessed in any country which boasted of free and republican institutions. Men who have been ornaments to the bench of justice in South Carolina, men who have distinguished themselves in this and the other House of Congress, men who have conducted with skill and ability our foreign diplomatic intercourse, are disfranchised by this tyrannical ordinance; and such men as Cheves, Smith, Huger, Middleton, and Poinsett, are disqualified to serve their State even as common jurors. Sir, call you this liberty, and the enjoyment of equal rights? A case is decided against the officer of the United States, and he prays an appeal to the Federal Supreme Court. This, by the law of South Carolina, is declared to be a contempt of the honorable court of that State, and your officer is fined and imprisoned for asking for a constitutional and legal right; well, he gets out of prison after the expiration of the time for which he has been sentenced, and applies to the clerk of the State court for a copy of the record, to enable him to sue his writ of error; the law of South Carolina denounces fine and imprisonment against the clerk if he shall furnish a copy of the record. According to this course of proceeding, the officer of the United States is not only deprived of all the means of correcting the errors which have been committed by the State courts, but is denied the privilege of knowing himself, and exposing to the view of his country, the injustice and oppression which have been practised upon him. I certainly did not speak too strongly when I said, a few days since, that South Carolina had legislated the General Government out of that State.

The question now fairly presents itself: shall nothing be done to reinstate the laws, and give them effect in that State? Those who are willing that the whole revenue system shall cease, and cease in this way, may well object to the adoption of this or any other efficient measure upon this subject. I trust, however, there are but few who are willing to see this state of things, and therefore it is material that the remedy proposed by the committee, to meet and counteract this new and unprecedented legislation of a State, should be fairly examined and understood; for we—I mean the Judiciary Committee—will be satisfied with the smallest modicum of federal power which shall secure a certain execution of the laws. The bill proposes neither to declare nor make war upon South Carolina; its provisions are essentially pacific, intended and calculated to prevent, not to produce violence. The President of the United States has laid the whole subject before Congress, and asks us to devise a remedy by which the evils threatened by that State may be avoided, and suggests the propriety of authorizing him to remove the custom-houses to places of safety, in the event that it should be found that the laws would be obstructed by the employment of adverse force, which would render their execution impracticable. The committee were of opinion that this recommendation of the President was prudent, discreet, and well becoming the Chief Magistrate of this nation. This, surely, is not making war; this is not exercising any harshness towards the citizens of South Carolina; it is getting out of the way, it is stepping aside until the fury of the times shall pass by. If the custom-house remains in Charleston, Beaufort, or Georgetown, either the officers of the General Government cannot be protected, or violence will ensue. This is surrendering the whole of the main land to the authorities of South Carolina, and transacting the business of the General Government upon the islands or upon the ocean. Is this making war? So far from it, it is the most pacific course that could be presented; it is retreating from threatened violence; and this is done upon the recommendation of him who never retreated to secure his own personal safety.

Should the first section of the bill be adopted, no force can be used under it, unless the State officers shall attempt by force to take the goods from the collector at the place to which the custom-house may be removed; and if such attempt shall be made at Castle Pinckney, to which place it is understood the President removed the custom-house prior to the 1st February, under the authority of existing laws, or any other place to which the custom-houses may be removed under the provisions of the first section of this bill, is there a Senator here who would say the goods should be surrendered without resistance? I should have hoped and believed that none such could be found, had I not heard this discussion. I know that some men are of opinion that this provision is yielding too much to the hostile appearances and threats of South Carolina. This would be so, were she a foreign nation; but, in a controversy with a portion of the same political family, the stronger may well yield something to the weaker; there is true magnanimity in strength yielding to weakness, rather than proceed to violence; nor can this idea be carried too far, unless an absolute surrender of the rights of the stronger party shall be required. In the case now existing, I am willing to concede to South Carolina as much bravery and chivalry of spirit as her proudest sons can claim; and still it is madness, perfect madness, to think of making war with the United States. Her physical strength does not amount, numerically, to one twenty-fourth part of that of the United States; and that strength, comparatively small as it is, is nearly equally divided between parties at home; and, in addition to this, is rendered much weaker by the character and condition of a portion of the population.

I have shown the only case in which force can be applied under the first section of the bill. Let us now examine in what cases it can be used under the fifth section of the bill, which is the only remaining one which contemplates the employment of military force. The provision is, that whenever the President of the United States shall be officially informed, by a circuit or district judge, that the laws cannot be executed by reason of the employment of an armed or military force, or other means too powerful to be resisted by the marshal with the ordinary means in his power, the President shall then issue his proclamation; and, in case it shall be ineffectual, he may use force to execute the laws. It will be remarked, that the only case in which force is authorized by this section presupposes an opposition by an armed force, or of other means too powerful to be resisted by the civil powers of the United States. The authority conferred by this section is confined strictly to repelling force by force, in the execution of the laws. The idea of employing military force, as contemplated by this bill, is not new. The necessity of its occasional employment was felt by the framers of the constitution; it was known to them that the stability and even the existence of the Government might depend upon it. Power was, therefore, given by the constitution to Congress, to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; nor has Congress permitted the power thus conferred by the constitution to remain dormant. It has frequently exercised it, when circumstances have occurred which demanded it. The act of 1795, which is the standing law of the country, authorizes the President to employ the military force of the country as amply as he can do it under the provisions of this bill. Still it was proper that he should consult the representatives of the people and of the States, when a case novel in its appearance, new and imposing in some of its characteristic features, presented itself. It will be recollected that, in 1807, the famous embargo law passed, which operated with peculiar severity upon the New England States; it gave universal discontent in that quarter; it was pronounced unconstitutional and void in town meetings and legislative assemblies; resistance to it was threatened; and it was anticipated that the Eastern States, or some of them at least, would interpose their authority to prevent its execution. To meet and counteract these meditated infractions of the embargo laws, Mr. Jefferson, then at the head of the Government, recommended, and the Congress passed, an act entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto." This act was approved on the 9th January, 1809; the eleventh section is as follows:

"SECTION 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the United States or of the Territories thereof, as may be judged necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this and other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody, any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture; and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assembly of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same."

This act of Congress of which I have read a part, passed in what the Southern gentlemen are pleased to call the best days of the republic; and it was passed, too, by a unanimous Southern vote in both Houses of Congress, and was sanctioned by that great republican statesman, Mr. Jefferson, who has justly been styled the apostle of civil liberty. The Judiciary Committee have copied and inserted in their bill these military provisions which I have read, and they are now denounced as clothing the Executive with despotic powers. But, in 1809, the predecessors of these same gentlemen considered them as perfectly consistent with democratic principles, and indispensable to save the republic from ruin. For my part, I can see no difference, except that the act of 1809 was designed to operate upon the Eastern section of the Union, which then threatened to annul and set aside the embargo laws, and the bill upon your table is intended to operate upon South Carolina, which now threatens to annul and set aside the revenue laws of the country. The New England representation in Congress then opposed the enforcement of the embargo laws; South Carolina assisted to enforce them; Carolina now opposes the execution of the revenue laws, and I am happy to see that the Senators from New England are aiding us to enforce their execution. At that period, no voice from the South was heard denouncing the enforcement of the embargo laws as tyrannical and despotic; but now, when the same measure is dealt out to them which they dealt out to others under the same circumstances, they apply the epithets of Boston port bill, Botany Bay bill, war bill, and other appellations of a like kind. Gentlemen seem to forget that our citizens are a reading and intelligent people, and will not be misled by sounds; that they will look into this bill, and will examine and judge for themselves.

I will now proceed to another subject, which is closely connected with the bill under consideration; I mean the proclamation lately issued by the President of the United States. To that instrument great injustice has been done in this debate. The President sets out with the view to establish two great conclusions: first, that the State of South Carolina has no right to annul the revenue laws; second, that no State has a constitutional right to secede from the Union. Is he wrong in either? Except the South Carolina Senators, not one of the gentlemen who have uttered such denunciations against it have ventured to make an argument to prove that the President has erred in his conclusions, although they take great exception to the arguments and reasoning by which he arrives at them. If his friends concur in the object and purpose of the proclamation, I do not think it should be matter of serious complaint that he has not argued precisely in the same way that they might have done. Time will not permit me to go into a critical examination of the doctrines contained or advanced in that paper; but justice requires that I should make this remark, that if that instrument be construed as in all fairness it should be, and the expressions used be applied to the subject-matter upon which the President is speaking or writing, none of these ultra federal doctrines would be found in it of which gentlemen complain. The proclamation, however, is before the public, and justice has been and will be done to it by that tribunal, whatever may be said of it in this body.

I will, in a few words, present to the Senate my own views of the history and theory of the constitution of the United States. I consider it the work or production of the people of the States, acting as separate and distinct communities, and not the production of either the State Governments, or of the whole people of the United States, acting en masse, or as a nation. The latter idea, if adopted and acted upon, would tend to consolidate the Government, prostrate the States, and make this a Government of unlimited powers.

The correctness of the idea that the constitution shall be considered and treated as having been formed by the people in the different States, acting separately and distinctly, is proved by the following considerations.

In its formation, each State, upon every article in it, and upon every question which arose in the convention, had one vote. The voice of Delaware was as strong as that of Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, or Massachusetts; it was ratified by each State for itself, and the people of no State were bound by it until they had ratified it for themselves. When amendments of the constitution are proposed by Congress, they are to be adopted not by the number of people who may be in favor of them, but by the number of States. So, in calling a convention to amend it, it depends on the number of States that concur in making the call, and not on the number of people who demand it. When a new convention shall meet to amend the constitution, that body will vote by States, without regard to the difference of population in the respective States. It is, however, a matter of much more importance to settle what the constitution is, than how or by whom it was formed, or is to be amended. It is admitted to be binding on all the States and all the people, having been assented to and ratified by all. My opinion is, that it is not a league, nor is it a mere compact, according to the meaning which gentlemen have affixed to that term in their arguments; I consider it as a frame of government, and that the Government thus constructed is wholly independent of the State Governments. The States were originally sovereign and independent, in every respect. The articles of confederation were only binding upon them as sovereign States; no means of coercion existed in the old Congress, either against the States or their citizens. Congress had no power to enforce its enactments upon the States, nor could it operate directly upon the citizens of the States. A failure on the part of a State to comply with the requisitions made by Congress had no remedy except that which exists among sovereign States—a resort to force. It was discovered, from every day's experience, that this weak and inefficient confederacy would not answer the great objects desired and anxiously wished for by every enlightened patriot. Hence the necessity of a change, and the call of the convention of 1787. Did that wise body of men, brought together on account of the weakness and imbecility of their Government, and to provide a remedy for them, make an instrument still weaker or more inefficient? This cannot be believed, unless we find it in the instrument itself. No, sir; they formed a Government capable of self-preservation, and bestowed upon it powers sufficient to sustain itself and perform all its constitutional duties and functions, without relying on the States. The evil which was felt under the confederation was, that the State Governments had to be consulted, and the movements of the General Government depended upon the will and pleasure of the different States, which could at any time defeat the effect of the enactments of Congress, by refusing to comply with the requirements of that body. The reliance on the States, in practice, had entirely failed; and one great object, in the formation of the constitution, was to enable the General Government to pass by the State Governments, and act directly upon the citizens; and this single important circumstance changed that which was before a league or mere compact into a Government, a substantial and efficient Government. The convention, looking to the great interests of the country, bestowed on the new Government which they were forming a power over such subjects as in its judgment were of general concern, and for the transaction or management of which the States separately were incompetent. The true view of our political institutions is this: the sovereignty is in the people; and they, acting in separate communities, have created two Governments. To those who may be appointed to administer this Government, in its various departments, they have said: To you we confide the great and general subjects in which we, as a united people, are interested—war and peace; foreign intercourse with all nations; coinage of money, and regulating its value; commerce, foreign and domestic; imposition of duties on imports, &c. On these subjects you are to operate and act out our sovereignty; nor are the State Governments to touch or interfere with these subjects. To the State Governments the people have said, in like manner: Upon all other subjects, not prohibited by the State constitutions, you are to act as the sovereign power. Hence my conclusion is, that we owe a double allegiance—one to the General Government, and one to the State in which we respectively live. We owe obedience and allegiance to the General Government in all things committed to its charge by the constitution; to the State Governments, in all other things. No citizen will ever be embarrassed, if the two Governments will confine themselves within their constitutional limits. But suppose they so act as to render obedience to both impracticable; what then? If the law passed by the General Government be constitutional, that law of the State which enjoins disobedience to it is an encroachment on the federal power, is itself an act of usurpation, and, of course, not binding on the citizen. Take the case which may arise out of the existing controversy: can a citizen of South Carolina, with impunity, resist the existing tariff laws? This will, in my judgment, depend entirely upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of these laws. I admit that disobedience to an unconstitutional act is not criminal, nor is resistance to it treason; but if Congress possess the power, under the constitution, to pass these acts, the State of South Carolina has no power to release her citizens from their obedience to them; her whole proceedings, in judicial language, are coram non judice, and void, and can afford no protection to the citizens of that State for their disobedience and resistance to these acts of Congress. To my mind, it is strange that gentlemen should have imagined that a State had a right to interpose, in any form or manner, in a case of this kind; and that interposition be considered constitutional, and not revolutionary. The power of laying imposts is, by the constitution, confided exclusively to Congress, and the States are forbidden to exercise it. I would, therefore, inquire of gentlemen in what part of that instrument they find this authority which they claim for the States? If they say that it is among the reserved rights of the States, my answer is, that a right wholly surrendered cannot be considered as reserved; and that, when the State is forbidden to act upon any general subject, it could not have been intended that they should have the power of controlling those to whom the subject was intrusted. If gentlemen will place their argument upon the natural and unalienable right of every people to resist oppression, come from what quarter it may, I am ready to admit that that right exists, and was at the very foundation of the American revolution. American liberty and our republican institutions have their origin in it, and grew out of its exercise. In the latter case, the people resisting their Government do it at their peril; and so it must be in the case supposed as likely to occur; because the State, having no constitutional authority to act, cannot shield the citizen from the effects of his resistance to the laws; nor can the State absolve him from his allegiance to this Government. Although I cannot admit that the Federal Judiciary is the final arbiter between the General and State Governments, upon a question of disputed power, yet I have never doubted that such questions, when presented incidentally in the progress of a trial between parties properly before the court, might be decided by the court, and the decision would be binding upon the individuals concerned. It therefore seems to me that it is entirely competent for the Federal Judiciary to try and punish any individual who may resist the execution of the laws, provided that the court shall be of opinion that they are constitutional, and obligatory upon the citizens. I have never felt the force of the arguments which have been employed to prove their unconstitutionality. The power to lay imposts is conferred on Congress, without restriction or limitation. It may be, and has been, in my judgment, abused in this instance; but this by no means proves them unconstitutional. There is a manifest difference between the excessive action of Congress upon a subject which, by the constitution, is subjected to its legislation, and its action upon a subject not placed under its control by the constitution. In the first instance, the act is obligatory;

in the latter, it possesses no binding force; it being a usurpation of undelegated power. In regard to the tariff laws, Congress had the right to exercise its discretion and judgment. It has done so, and has decided very improperly, as I believe. Still I can see no remedy except through the medium of Congressional enactments. Upon this whole subject, which at present so much agitates the country, the conclusions to which my mind has arrived are—

1st. That Congress had the constitutional power to pass the tariff laws, but has exercised that power injudiciously and oppressively.

2d. That the State of South Carolina possesses no constitutional right or power to obstruct the execution of these laws.

3d. That the Federal Judiciary is competent to decide whether these laws are valid or not, upon the trial of any individual who may disobey or resist them; and that the ordinance and laws of South Carolina will afford the citizen thus tried no shield or protection whatever.

I was much gratified when I heard an allusion made to the debate on Foot's resolution, as it furnishes me an opportunity of correcting an error, which exists, not here, but elsewhere, in relation to my sentiments as delivered on that occasion. It will be recollected that the discussion which attracted so much public attention, at that time, arose between a Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] now in his seat, and a Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE,] not now a member of this body. The former contended, as I then understood him, that, in all questions of political power between the Federal and State Governments, the former was the ultimate judge of the extent of its own powers. In this opinion, I could not concur. I thought, and still think, that, in controversies for power between two parties, if one of them is to be the final arbiter, the other will, in time, be stripped of all its powers; and believing then, as I now do, that the States in convention constituted the proper, ultimate, constitutional tribunal, I made an argument against the doctrines advocated by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from South Carolina insisted that the Legislature of a State possessed the power to annul an act of Congress which it deemed unconstitutional. From him I also differed in sentiment; and entertaining the opinion that had been expressed by Mr. Jefferson, that a convention in the State was a safer body to act in a controversy with the General Government than a State Legislature; and understanding at the time that a convention, according to the South Carolina constitution, could not be called without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the Assembly, which could not, in all probability, be procured, I reprobated the idea of the Legislature acting on such subjects, and suggested the idea of a convention. This was done, not only because a convention would be a better deliberative body, but with a view to interpose obstacles in the way of the progress of nullification. And, sir, I have been so unfortunate, that my efforts to prevent nullification have brought upon me the charge of participating in it. Here, I know, I was not so understood; elsewhere, an effort has been made to make an impression that I was favorable to this doctrine.

When, in that debate, I used the expression, "that the acts of Congress must cease to operate in the State, and Congress must acquiesce by abandoning," &c., a fair and liberal interpretation would have been, not that the acts of the State in convention, declaring the laws void, would first annul them, but it would impose on Congress so strong a moral obligation, as to induce it to abandon the exercise of the power, or obtain a new grant of power. So, when I spoke of force, the meaning was that Congress should interpose its authority, and direct the Executive not to proceed in the execution of the laws until the controversy was settled.

SENATE.]

Revenue Collection Bill.

I will detain the Senate no longer upon a topic in which no Senator but myself has any interest or feeling. If a man is the best interpreter of his own meaning, I claim to be understood according to the explanation I have given. All liberal-minded men will so understand me. From the illiberal, I ask no indulgence. I must be indulged, however, in one additional remark. I was pleased to see the Union men of South Carolina, shortly after I delivered my speech on Foot's resolution, seize the idea that it was necessary to act by convention; and they pressed the nullifiers so strongly with it, that they held them in check for two years, and the latter at last only prevailed in the Legislature by a single vote for calling a convention. I am not vain enough to believe that any thing said by me produced the effect I have mentioned; but certain it is that they so acted, and thereby retarded and postponed this process of nullification for two years at least, and were well nigh defeating it altogether.

I wish to make a few remarks on the subject of secession, which is claimed for the States by some gentlemen as a constitutional right. If this right exists, I am ready to declare, that all the high and exalted expectations and hopes which I have entertained of the value and permanency of this Government and this Union are visionary and unsubstantial. From the political history of the country, my mind had come to the conclusion that one of the objects of the constitution was to deprive the States of this right. By the articles of the old confederation, the States had agreed and stipulated that the Union should be perpetual. The very title of the articles is, "Articles of confederation and perpetual union." The conclusion of them declares, "that the articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the States, respectively, and the Union shall be perpetual."

So far as a league or mere compact could bind and have effect, a perpetual Union was secured under the confederation. Still there was a deficiency; the will of the States had been substituted for a Government. Hence the necessity for a change; and therefore the convention constructed a Government, and clothed it with the powers necessary to attain the great objects in view, and, to that extent, deprived the States of their pre-existing powers and sovereignty. When the people in their State conventions ratified this constitution, they withdrew or subtracted so much sovereign power from the State Governments, and transferred to and vested it in the General Government. The people, under the constitution, exercise their sovereign power, through the agency of this Government, upon all subjects committed to it, in the same way, and to the same extent, that they exercise their sovereignty through the State Governments upon all other subjects. That it was not intended by the framers of the federal constitution that the States should retain their entire sovereignty, is manifest from the language of the letter, which was adopted unanimously by the convention, and transmitted, with the constitution, to the old Congress. The language is: "It is obviously impracticable, in the Federal Government of these States, to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest." From this it appears that the convention well knew that the instrument they had formed deprived the States of a portion of their sovereignty, and argument is employed to reconcile the States to the surrender.

In the same letter there is the following: "In all deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union, in which are involved our property, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence." Now, if secession be a constitutional right, what has been gained by the adoption of the constitution towards consolidating the Union? Nothing—yes, less than nothing. Under the confederation, had a State seceded, it would have been a breach of its plighted faith and solemn engagements, and would have been just cause of war; but, according to the doctrine now contended for, a State can, at her sovereign will and pleasure, as a matter of right, without giving offence, or cause of war, abandon and go out of the Union, and break up the whole Government. I have never supposed, for a moment, that this right existed; but, on the contrary, that one great object, in the formation of this Government, was to deprive the States of this right, and to have a General Government clothed with powers sufficient to prevent it, should such an attempt be made by any one or more States.

Gentlemen seem unwilling to take a full view of the altered state of things produced by the adoption of the constitution. Rights were acquired, as well as surrendered, upon the formation of this Government; the people of each State surrendered a portion of their sovereignty and pre-existing rights, and acquired the advantages appertaining to a union of all the people and all the States. The wisdom and physical strength of the whole country are united, for the purpose of defending the rights of any particular member of the Union which may be invaded. In all our external relations the States are a portion of a great nation and Government. Our respect abroad, and security at home, depend upon the rights acquired and secured by the federal constitution. Every State and citizen of the United States has an interest in the honor and glory achieved by the sons of Carolina in that war by which we obtained our liberty, and in that war which was waged to secure it; and the federal constitution confers on the other States a right to demand all the courage and chivalry of that State in any future emergency, in a conflict with a foreign Power. I need not dwell on the consequences of this doctrine of secession—the evils are too apparent and appalling to every mind. Wars between the States will immediately ensue; causes of irritation will spring up, which nothing but a superintending General Government can prevent. The States will contract alliances with different foreign Powers, and we shall be brought to fight battles, not for liberty and independence, as heretofore, but on account of the quarrels of other Powers on which we may respectively be dependent. We shall cease to be a great nation; and nothing will be seen but fragments of this once mighty empire, fit only to be gathered up, and used by the pirates of power. Sir, I do not vote for this measure because it has been asked for, and is to be used by a Chief Magistrate in whom I have confidence. I would act in the same way were the Government in the hands of others not of my choice. I support it because I believe it to be the duty of Congress to place the necessary means in the hands of him who is made responsible by the constitution for the execution of the laws. It has been said, that this is novel and unprecedented legislation. Not so; the laws to enforce the embargo were as strong, and contained similar provisions, except that clause in the first section of this bill which authorizes the General Government to retire from the land to the water, for the purpose of avoiding collision with the authorities of South Carolina. The Senator [Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina] has said that South Carolina adopted her constitution in the year 1790, after the formation of the federal constitution; and if any thing be contained in the State constitution inconsistent with the federal constitution, the last expression of the will of the people must prevail, and it will be obligatory upon the citizens of that State. I understand the true principle to be precisely the other way. The people of that State, and all others, have agreed, and so expressed themselves in the federal constitution, that it shall not be so. It is there declared, that "the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance of it, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

From this provision in the constitution it is apparent, that any act of a convention or Legislature of a State, which conflicts with the constitution or laws of the United States, passed in pursuance of the constitution, is utterly void, and of no effect. The same Senator has urged that sovereignty is indivisible; and, therefore, the entire allegiance of the citizens of South Carolina is due to that State. His error lies in the application of his principle: in this country, the sovereignty is in the people; and I am willing to grant that it is indivisible, but it does not follow that its exercise cannot be parcelled out between different agents or Governments. The other Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has stated, that the high expectations which had been formed by the Southern portion of the United States, previous to the present Chief Magistrate's coming into power, have been disappointed. It will do injustice to no one, to examine whether this allegation be well founded; and I will venture to say, if there be any portion of this Union whose political principles have been acted upon more than others, it is the South. One great subject of complaint from that quarter was the large apprehended expenditure of public money for internal improvements. This source of expenditure has been dried up by the President's veto upon the Maysville road bill, and other subjects of internal improvements of the like kind. The people of the Southern States are generally opposed to the rechartering of the Bank of the United States. The President, at the hazard of every thing that relates to himself, has placed himself in opposition to this institution, whose power could have crushed any other man in the nation. The Indian tribes in the southwest were a great inconvenience and annoyance to that portion of the Union: they have been nearly all removed to the west of the Mississippi, in consequence of treaties made by this administration. The great evil of which the South complained, was the oppressive and unjust tariff of 1828. The President has, upon all proper occasions, recommended its reduction to the wants of the Government; has used, and is at this time using, all his influence for that purpose. Further, he has, by closing up the avenues of expenditure, produced the necessity of a speedy reduction. Do these things furnish any evidence that the South has been disappointed, or has any just cause of complaint? On the contrary, do they not afford abundant proof that the Chief Magistrate has not been inattentive to the just claims of that section of the country? It is true, he has not confined his regards to them alone. Wherever the same reasons existed in any other section of the United States, he has acted in the same manner towards them. He has not only removed the Indians from the southwest, but likewise from the northwest. He has shown equal assiduity and attention to other interests. He has obtained more indemnities from foreign nations, for injuries committed upon the commerce of the citizens of the United States, than has ever been effected under any former administration. Whether this be owing to superior political skill, or superior good fortune, we need not inquire. One thing is certain; many citizens to the north and east have been greatly benefited by the results which have attended our foreign negotiations. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] admits, that that State has legislated the General Government out of its limits, and he now complains that we wish to apply force. The answer is very obvious; the laws of South Carolina authorize the use of force, to prevent the execution of the laws of the United States; therefore, Congress must authorize force to defend the laws, or submit to the dictation of that State. It is avowed on this floor, by her Senators, that, if this bill passes, South Carolina will employ military force to carry into effect her ordinance and laws. I have never doubted that South Carolina was settled in her purpose upon this subject. Her citizens are in an error—a gross error; but when men have made up their minds, and have resolved on their purpose, they do not go back to inquire into the propriety of the determination at which they have arrived; with them, the time for reasoning has passed by; they have decided on action, and will not now stop to calculate the consequences. Look at her military preparations; arms and all the munitions of war are purchased; volunteers, to the number of twelve thousand, are authorized by law; orders for the purchase of provisions have been issued; volunteers are daily tendering their services; the commanding general has procured a supply of sugar, for the purpose of trying the force and effect of their writ of replevin. These things cannot be mistaken. These are not blustering men—they are brave, and will fight; and my only wish is, that the Government shall be prepared with the necessary means to prevent a prostration of the laws; and surely gentlemen ought not to object to this, unless they have made up their minds that one State shall control the whole Union.

It has been intimated by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] who sits on my right, that the Chief Magistrate seems desirous to make war on the men, women, and children of South Carolina. Nothing is more unfounded. We have called for all the orders which have been issued to the military and naval officers stationed near Charleston. They have been laid before us. A spirit of peace and forbearance breathes through the whole of them; all offensive movements and conduct are strictly forbidden; all collision to be avoided, unless in the single case of an attempt, by an armed force, to seize the public property, or to take dutiable goods out of the possession of the collector before the duties are secured. The President could not say or do less, unless he wholly disregarded his high constitutional duty; the imperative language of which is, that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." There can be no misunderstanding upon this subject; no violence can occur unless commenced by the State of South Carolina; and should such madness prevail on her part, it ought to be, and will be, firmly met by the Executive Departments of this Government; and I should consider Congress as essentially failing in its duty, were it to withhold the necessary means. I regret extremely that time will not permit me to reply at large to what has been said by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER.] A few of his remarks, however, must be attended to. He says that the act of 1795 only authorizes the militia to be called out when the President shall be notified of the necessity of doing so, by the Governor of a State. This is the provision of the first section, which applies to cases of insurrection; but the second section of that act gives more power to the Executive of the United States, in cases of obstruction to the laws, than this bill confers. I will read it to the Senate:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of the militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress."

Under this provision, the President is not to be notified or called on by the Governor of a State; and in the case before us, it would be absurd to make such a provision, when the Executive of South Carolina is the military head and leader of the opposition to the laws. It is said, nothing of an offensive character has been done by the State of South Carolina. It is true they have not laid violent hands upon the collector, or the property in his possession; but they have promised, in the most solemn manner, that they will do so, and they are preparing their 12,000 men to effect their purpose. I am constrained to believe they are in earnest; it would be an insult to them to say that all they have done is mere boasting. I am, therefore, in favor of preparing to meet them defensively, in the strongest attitude they can assume. The argument of Mr. Alexander Hamilton, in the New York convention, is relied on to sustain the opposition to this bill. He argued against the old, and in favor of the new Government, because war under the confederation would ensue between the General and State Governments; and to avoid this, a Government, capable of passing by the State Legislatures, and acting directly upon the citizens, should be preferred. This was an enlightened view of the federal constitution. The two Governments were designed to act independently of each other. This was for the purpose of avoiding collision; but South Carolina, in the present instance, has not confined her action to the sphere assigned her by the constitution, but has stepped beyond her constitutional limits, and has, with a bold hand, seized upon the powers of the General Government. If civil war ensues, it grows out of her aggression, not from any thing done by this Government, or any department of it. The opinion of Mr. Wilson, in the Pennsylvania convention, has been referred to. I admit that his opinions are high authority; and I rely on them for the purpose of showing that the opinions I have heretofore expressed are correct.

He says, "that the supreme power resides in the people, as the fountain of Government; that the people have not, that the people meant not, that the people ought not, to part with it to any Government whatsoever. In their hands it remains secure; they can delegate it in such proportions, to such bodies, on such terms, and under such limitations, as they think proper. I agree that there cannot be two sovereign powers on the same subject."

"I consider the people of the United States as forming one great community, and I consider the people of the different States as forming communities again, on a lesser scale; from this great division of the people into distinct communities, it will be found necessary that different proportions of legislative powers should be given to the Governments, according to the nature, number, and magnitude of their objects."

"Unless the people are considered in these two views, we shall never be able to understand the principle on which this system was constructed. I view the States as made for the people as well as by them, and not the people as made for the States. The people, therefore, have a right, whilst enjoying the undenied powers of society, to form either a General Government or State Governments, in what manner they please, or to accommodate them to one another, and, by this means, preserve them all."

The principles here laid down present the Federal and State Governments, and the relations which each citizen bears to them respectively, in their true light. In reference to general subjects, committed by the constitution to the General Government, the people of the United States are one community or nation, and each citizen owes allegiance to the General Government to that extent; for all other purposes, the allegiance of each citizen is due to the State in which he lives.

In the Olmstead case, the State of Pennsylvania interposed its authority to protect the heirs of Rittenhouse from an execution, issued from the federal court; by order of the Governor, the militia were called out under the command of General Bright; and they, by force, prevented the marshal from executing the process. The commanding general, however, and others who assisted him, were afterwards indicted, convicted, and sentenced to undergo fine and imprisonment. In this decision the State of Pennsylvania acquiesced. From this I infer that the State authorities can furnish no protection to the citizen in his resistance to the laws of the Union. I am admonished by the late hour of the night, as well as by the exhaustion of my own strength, that it is time to bring my remarks to a close. I cannot, however, take my seat without saying a few words upon another subject, intimately connected with the one under discussion; I mean the tariff laws, which have given rise to that unpleasant condition in which our country is placed. Some object to our acting upon that subject, at the present session, on account of the threatening attitude assumed by South Carolina; with me, this objection weighs very little. Her errors, however great, (and great they certainly are,) will not justify me in doing wrong. This bill, if passed, it seems to me, should remove that difficulty from every mind; by it, we shall have vindicated the laws of the Union, and have met her legislation with effectual countervailing acts on the part of this Government. If this will not still satisfy gentlemen, and they insist on retaining the tariff laws in all their present oppressive forms, the blood which may be shed shall be upon other skirts, not mine.

When the blood of my countrymen is flowing, when widows and orphans are making, in this unnatural conflict, I desire to be able to raise up pure and undefiled hands before my God and my country, and say, if my counsels had prevailed, this had not been so. Sir, so solicitous am I to see the present difficulties fairly adjusted, that, upon my return to the bosom of my constituents, if I could only say "We have prevailed; justice has triumphed; the Union is safe; peace, good will, and brotherly love, reign throughout the land;" I would not exchange that luxury of feeling, that rich repast of the heart, which it would afford, for the victor's or conqueror's laurelled wreath.

After Mr. G. had concluded his remarks,

Mr. EWING obtained the floor, and proceeded to address the Senate in support of the bill. He said it was with great reluctance that he rose at this late hour of the night, and at so late a period of this protracted debate, to consume yet a little more of the time of the Senate; but he felt that he should not have discharged his whole duty to the State which he in part represented, if he gave a silent vote on this bill.

The subject, said Mr. E., is one of overwhelming interest. The measure proposed is, to us, an unusual one; and the posture of affairs calling for this measure is wholly without example in the annals of our country. My own situation, and that of many gentlemen with whom I act, is new and difficult. We feel ourselves compelled, by the exigency of the times, to strengthen the arm of our Executive Chief Magistrate, who, in our judgment, has used the power which he already possesses with no sparing hand; nay, the constant tendency of whose measures has been to draw to, and concentrate in himself, all the powers distributed by the constitution among the co-ordinate branches of the Government. Nothing but a strong sense of duty could have induced me to grant to this Chief Magistrate the power which he has asked of us, and which this bill, if it become a law, confers.

Gentlemen do not exactly agree in their opinion of the attitude assumed by the State of South Carolina; some consider her as in a state of open war with the Union; others soften and palliate her acts, into a mere effort of ingenuity between learned counsel which shall plead each other out of court. But I cannot take the declarations of gentlemen on this subject, while the official acts of the State authorities are before me. Her ordinances and her laws are subjects of construction, not of explanation:

and I, for one, must take them as I find them, not as gentlemen may suppose they were designed to be.

South Carolina, by an ordinance impressed with all the imposing forms and solemnities of a fundamental law, has thrown herself in direct conflict with a law of the Union—a law admitted on all hands to be, in its avowed purpose, not only constitutional, but essential to the very existence of the Government. This law, however, is declared to be, as respects one aim and purpose of its enactment, in violation of the spirit of the constitution; and this is the ground on which that State opposes and assumes to abrogate it. The constitutionality of the law I have heretofore considered, and will not now stop to discuss it. My opinion on that subject is not shaken by any reasons which have been recently urged on this floor.

On the assumption that this law is a violation of the spirit of the constitution, South Carolina, by her ordinance, proceeds to nullify and destroy it; she requires all her citizens, on their allegiance to obey the ordinance and to resist and oppose the execution of this and other laws of the Union; and she requires that her judges, who are already sworn to support the constitution of the United States, shall, under pain of forfeiting their judicial stations, swear obedience to the ordinance without regard to its conflict with that constitution; their jurors, before they can sit on the trial of any cause, must likewise take an oath to support the ordinance. And further: in no case decided in the courts of that State, in which shall be drawn in question the authority of that ordinance, or the laws which it was intended to annul, do they permit any appeal to the courts of the United States; and if such appeal be attempted or taken, the courts of the State are required to proceed and enforce their judgment, and deal with the party taking such appeal as for a contempt of court. And if the General Government enforce her laws, or if she adopt any conceivable mode to evade the alternative of unqualified submission or resort to force, South Carolina declares herself no longer a member of the Union, and will forthwith proceed to organize a separate Government. Such is the substance of this ordinance; and so far as it is not sufficiently specific in its details to execute itself, it is carried out by laws enacted to give it effect.

It will be seen at once, that all reference to the Judiciary of the State of South Carolina is merely colorable; there is no reference to them in their judicial character. The judges are not permitted to decide between the ordinance of South Carolina and the constitution of the United States; but they are sworn to abide by and observe the ordinance where it conflicts with the constitution; and, having denied and declared criminal an appeal to the courts of the United States, the ordinance depends for its execution on mere ministerial or executive power. And as it is the rights and property of the United States, and the persons of the officers and servants of the United States, that are to be assailed, and seized or expelled from the territory of South Carolina by ministerial power merely, without the intervention of any judicial tribunal—that is to say, any tribunal which is permitted to deliberate and judge—the ordinance amounts in effect to a declaration of war; subject, however, to this condition: the war shall not actually be waged if the United States will, within a given day, repeal the obnoxious law, or withdraw her custom-houses and her collectors of the revenue from the territories of South Carolina.

Now, it seems to me that no mode is left to resist or repel this threatened hostility, except to oppose, or prepare to oppose, force by force; for submission is out of the question, unless that State has the right to cast off the laws of the Union at pleasure. The ordinance is based upon the assumption that she has that right. It is on this ground that she has planted herself, and on which she endeavors to make good her lodgement; and if that ground be not tenable, by her own admission, all that she has done is lawless aggression. The doctrine put forth is, that South Carolina, within her own limits, is sovereign; "that, as a sovereign State, she has the inherent power to do all those acts which, by the laws of nations, any prince or potentate may of right do;" and that she is bound to the General Government by no other ties than those which connect nations which have formed with each other an alliance offensive and defensive.

This doctrine is asserted in its broadest terms in the address to the people of South Carolina, framed by the convention; and they declare that it is "the only foundation on which they can safely erect the right of a State to protect its citizens;" by which is clearly to be understood the right to protect them against the laws of the United States and the judgments of its courts.

The question which is deemed vital to the argument is this: whether the Government of the United States is a league of States—an alliance merely; or whether it is a National Government, of which the States are a part, and to which they are subordinate? It were superfluous to say that I sustain the latter alternative.

The convention of South Carolina admits that the sources from which the ordinary powers of the General Government are drawn, are partly federative and partly national; and that as it respects the individuals on whom it operates, it is, for limited purposes, entirely national. But these striking characteristics, they say, are wholly unimportant, for it is the creating, not the controlling power, which gives character to Governments.

They say, too, that the States once having possessed the sovereignty, could not surrender it wholly to the General Government, for sovereignty is inalienable; that they could not surrender it in part, and retain it in part, for sovereignty is indivisible.

And hence they conclude, that though our constitution may seem to imply the reverse, yet owing to these properties of sovereignty, inalienability, and indivisibility, the States are still left in the full possession of all the powers and attributes which they possessed before the formation of the constitution; notwithstanding the attempt made in the formation of that constitution by the States and the people to transfer that sovereignty, in whole or in part, to the new General Government. I think I have succeeded in comprehending the argument, and have endeavored to state it fairly. And, sir, I deny every one of those positions which they have laid down as axioms, and which they do not seem to have even thought of proving, but which, on every principle of sound reasoning, they were bound to prove, before deducing from them such important consequences.

First: I deny that what they call the foundations of the confederacy, or the mode in which the constitution was framed and ratified, whether by the people of the States as States, or by the people of all the States in mass, does at all affect the powers of the General Government, or that it narrows or extends the reserved rights of the States; and, as a part of the same proposition, I deny that the fact of the States existing antecedent to the present constitution of the Union, gives them any more right or control over its acts, its powers, or its being, than they would have had if the whole system, States and nation, had all sprung into existence by a single effort of the will of the whole people.

It is an axiom on which all republican institutions rest, that the whole people, when assembled for that purpose, have a right to create a Government; to change, or modify, or dissolve an existing Government, at their pleasure; and that when the whole people cannot assemble for that purpose, the same may be effected by a convention of their delegates, chosen in their primary assemblies, convened pursuant to some regular expression of the general will; or, in other words, convened by a law enacted in pursuance of the existing Government. This is the peaceable right of revolution, or change of Government, pursuant to the will of the whole people, who are participants in that Government. But the proposition is put past all cavil if the ruling power of a State propose a change of Government to the people, and the people, regularly convened by the authority of that ruling power, adopt that change.

Revenue Collection Bill.

It is the opinion of Rousseau, who has thought profoundly upon this subject, that the very assembling of the people in convention does, ipso facto, suspend the delegated powers of Government; and that the functions of the rulers cease while they remain in convention. I read from 14th chapter of his third book on the Social Compact:

"No sooner are the people legally assembled in a sovereign body, than the jurisdiction of Government ceases; the executive power of the State is suspended, and the person of the meanest citizen becomes as sacred and inviolable as the greatest magistrate." I refer with the more confidence to this writer, as many of the doctrines of the address seem to be drawn from his works, or at least to coincide with them in tone and spirit.

If it be true, then, that the people have a right to assemble in convention, and, with or without the consent of their rulers, resume to themselves the sovereign power, and form, or change, or modify, or dissolve, their Government; and, more especially, if Government be suspended, or, for the time being, dissolved, by the assembling of the people in convention; it is clear that the form or character of the former Government, thus changed or dissolved, cannot control the powers or limit the existence of the new Government which thus arises out of its ashes.

In pursuing the argument, I will lay no stress upon the fact, which is, nevertheless, entitled to much weight, that from the moment the power of Great Britain over these States was cast off, they became a Union, and formed, in fact, one nation; partaking, it is true, in many things, of the character of a league, but never strictly so, since the first moment of their existence. But, waiving this, I rest the argument on the first general position. After the project of the present constitution of the United States had been settled upon in convention, the Legislature of the State of South Carolina referred it to the people of that State, called together in convention, by a resolution of that Legislature; which convention did, in the name and in behalf of the people of that State, adopt and ratify that constitution. Thus, the people of that State, assembled in convention, did change and modify their Government so as to place the sovereignty precisely where it is placed by that constitution.

But the recent convention of South Carolina say, that the people had not the power to do this, because sovereignty is inalienable; that, notwithstanding this attempt to transfer the sovereignty, it cannot be transferred; South Carolina is sovereign still.

Here is another proposition which I deny in the sense in which it is used by this convention. Writers on the law of nature and nations do contest the question, whether sovereignty be or be not alienable; but the contest is wholly in reference to the right of the individual who possesses the sovereign power over a people, to transfer that power without their consent. This, it will be seen at once, is a totally different question from the one under discussion. The right of a monarch to transfer the sovereignty over his people, would imply some power in that monarch paramount to the power and rights of the whole people; that they were his, and not he theirs; that they derive any rights which they possess from him, and not he his powers and rights from them. In short, it would be an admission of the divine right of Kings. On the other hand, the right of the people to transfer the sovereignty, at pleasure, implies the highest degree of freedom and power in their aggregated mass; and it seems to me impossible that those who admit that all the powers of Government are derived from, and centre ultimately in, the people; that those powers are but trust powers, held for the people, in pursuance of their expressed will; it seems to me impossible that they can admit these positions, and deny that the people have a right to transfer at pleasure the whole sovereignty, and place it where, and make it what they please. There is nothing in the nature of things which forbids it; nothing in the opinion of writers on natural or national law; nothing in the practice of nations. On the contrary, all tend to prove and confirm the right.

Suppose the case of two ships' crews cast away, or voluntarily planting themselves on an uninhabited island in the Pacific; let them, in this situation, each form their own government, and vest the sovereign power, each in the leader which they may choose; make him the king or patriarch of their band. Now, it is perfectly evident that one of those kings or patriarchs could not transfer his power, or, rather, the sovereignty which was vested in him, to the other, so as to make him the monarch of the two bands, without the consent of those from whom he derived that power. It is equally clear, that, with their consent, and by the united and concurrent act of the ruler and the ruled, this transfer of sovereignty could be made, and that the two communities could thus be blended into one, by a new social compact. Something like this I conceive to have been the origin of all considerable nations; and whether it be by compact, uniting many small tribes into one, or so uniting them by conquest, is wholly immaterial as to the present question. In either case, the sovereign power of the less, which is merged in the greater, by conquest or compact, is transferred to the greater; or when several co-equal States or tribes unite by compact to form one State, the whole sovereignty in each of those States or tribes is transferred to, and vested in, the whole State thus formed by their common union; and it would seem to me absurd to say that this could not be done: it would be the same thing as to deny, in toto, the whole power of union among men for their common safety; the power to unite families in a government, for the purposes of common justice and common protection. It would be to deny the right of revolution under any and all circumstances, either by common consent or the application of force, and it would leave nations and men forever, in all ages, subject to the same political and territorial connexion and subjection in which, at any one point of time, they may have first been cast. If sovereignty be not transferable, what has been the effect of our revolution? We were once a colony of Great Britain; South Carolina was once subject to the same Crown; and, in the very paper in which her convention avers that sovereignty cannot be transferred, they aver also that, by the revolution, the sovereignty of Great Britain over South Carolina was transferred to the people of that State, and that the State became a free, sovereign, and independent Power. It is true that this was done by force; but that which is done by force may also be done by compact; and, indeed, in the view of nations, the force which severed us had not effected its end, until it resulted in a compact of severance, which, alone, the law of nations holds permanently binding. If sovereignty cannot be transferred, or if it be inalienable, how is it that the Territories of Louisiana and Florida are acknowledged as a part of our Union? We acquired them by compact merely, without resort to force. The sovereignty over the soil and the inhabitants, which vested in European Powers, was alienated to the United States; and, if the doctrine of South Carolina be correct, that sovereignty is inalienable, that compact was clearly void; the power which we exercise over those Territories, has been, and is, a usurped power; and their citizens owe allegiance not to the United States, but to France and Spain. It seems to me, then, that the doctrine that sovereignty is inalienable, in the sense in which it is maintained by South Carolina, cannot bear examination. It is not true and sound political doctrine; it bears against the rights of the people and the general principles of free government; and it is unsupported by reason, and contradicted by the received opinions and practice of the world. But, certain it is, in my judgment, that no rulers can transfer their citizens or subjects without their concurrence and consent, express or implied; and, to make the transfer of sovereignty perfect and unquestionable, it requires the assent of the ruling constitutional powers of the State, and the assent of the people, assembled in convention, pursuant to the forms directed by their Government; and, both these concurring, the transfer may be perfect.

In the transfer of sovereignty from the State of South Carolina to the new Government of the United States, there was a concurrence of all the powers necessary to make that transfer valid; all the pre-existing elements of Government; every functionary in which a portion of sovereignty might be supposed to rest united in it. The old confederation, by its Congress, the State of South Carolina, by her Legislature, and the people of the State, met in solemn convention, agreed to, and sanctioned it. To deny that they could do this, does, in fact, deny the right of self-government to a people; it does more, it holds both the people and their rulers, for the time being, bound down by a kind of metaphysical necessity, to remain forever in the state in which that necessity may be fastened upon them.

With respect to this act which formed a new Government out of the crude materials of the old confederation, I care not by what name it may be called. I do not object to the term compact; for, though it is not used in the constitution, it is, nevertheless, a highly appropriate word to express the act. It was, indeed, a new social compact, out of which arose a new Government. But the argument which some gentlemen have drawn thence is wholly fallacious. It does not follow, because it is a compact, that the parties to it, if you can find who or what they originally were, have a right to violate and annul it; and it is a contradiction in terms, to say that they can do so consistently with the compact itself, unless it contain a clause which provides for its abandonment or destruction, and that provision be pursued. It is a fallacy, too, to say, that, because it is a compact, it is subject to the same principles which govern the ordinary agreements between man and man. Such is not the case; it is a compact out of which Government arises; or, which is, in itself, the rule and charter of Government; it is that compact which makes a nation by the assent and concurrence of individuals; or a great nation by the assent and concurrence of smaller communities; and neither the individuals in the one case, nor the smaller communities in the other, can ever after retract that assent, without the concurrence of the sovereignty of that great nation, of which they have thus made themselves a part. In the case of an individual, no one can, for a moment, doubt; for it would be subversive of the very first principles of all government to permit it, unless, indeed, he remove beyond its territorial jurisdiction, then it becomes a matter reciprocal, and to be governed by circumstances. As it respects a State which has made itself a part of a greater community, precisely the same principle applies, with this additional ingredient, that it cannot transfer itself beyond the jurisdiction of the Government of which it forms an integral part. In order to simplify the argument, I have proceeded thus far on the hypothesis that the whole power of Government, instead of a portion of it only, had been transferred by the smaller communities to the larger; and thus, making one perfect consolidated nation. And; in this view of the subject, I have answered, and attempted to refute the doctrine of the convention of South Carolina, that "sovereignty is inalienable." They next affirm that "sovereignty is indivisible;" that part of it could not be transferred to the General Government, and part retained to the States. This, in my opinion, involves one of the most difficult problems in Government. In theory, it is easy to divide the various powers of a consolidated Government, and place the legislative, the executive, and the judicial power in different hands. In practice, there is danger that the balance may be left imperfect, and that one of those powers may, in time, absorb the rest. So it is easy in theory to divide the sovereignty in another mode, create a National Government, as in the case of our Union; vesting it with certain prescribed and limited powers, and, so far as they extend, making it paramount, and, at the same time, leaving in the hands of the several States, or great integral parts which compose it, a large portion of those powers which the National Government may not infringe upon or touch.

There is nothing in the theory of government which forbids that rights should be reserved to individuals, as in the declaration of rights; or to the States and the people, as in that clause of our constitution which provides that all powers, not expressly delegated, be reserved to them. There is, on the whole, nothing in the nature of things which forbids this division of power, or sovereignty, among the various great departments of a State, or of vesting it partly in a federal head, and partly in the various civil divisions which compose a federal Union. It resolves itself simply into the question, whether the powers of Government can be, in any manner, checked and controlled, or whether there must, in the nature of things, be an arbitrary, absolute, uncontrollable power, vesting somewhere in every form of government? In theory it is not necessarily so, it may be so in practice; but if it be so, our experiment of a union of free States, each possessing limited powers, and of a General Government, supreme within its appropriate sphere, but also limited in its powers, must fail, and, with it, the hopes of the friends of freedom throughout the world must also fail.

But this case of divided sovereignty, the placing of the paramount though limited power in one head, and a portion of the sovereignty, equally absolute, within its own appropriate sphere, in subordinate Governments, is not of new or recent impression. The division of sovereignty, in this sense, is familiar from the earliest date of the feudal system of Europe, and it is owing chiefly to this principle in that system, by means of which a brave and free nobility, possessing rights which they dared to maintain, and which their sovereign, in accordance with the very constitution of their polity, was obliged to respect, that Europe has not, like Asia, been swallowed up and sunk in despotism. I would, by no means, be understood to cite these as Governments either orderly or free; they were neither; but, confused, and irregular, and oppressive as they were, they contained in themselves this principle and germ of freedom, from which all the mixed and limited Governments of Europe have sprung, and to which, perhaps, our own institutions may remotely trace their origin. This division of sovereignty, which the convention of South Carolina declares to be "indivisible;" this limitation of absolute power in one portion of the body politic, by vesting powers equally absolute in another; these checks and balances which can never be tried against each other, to their utmost, without danger of destruction to one or both the conflicting powers, may, from a salutary fear of the effects of that collision, co-exist for ages in harmony, and secure, by their combined or reciprocal action, the highest degree of human freedom.

I say, therefore, that sovereignty is divisible in theory; and in practice we have seen, and still see it divided. I do not say that in our Government, if those parts in which portions of that sovereignty are vested, should come into direct and deadly collision, that their strength is precisely equal, and that neither would be compelled to succumb. Nor can we say it of the great departments among which the portions of the sovereignty vested in the General Government are distributed. But I do say, that this divided and distributed power does now exist in our Government, and that the curses of the world and of posterity will be due to those who shall first force them into deadly collision, and prove, by experiment, that either must fall before the superior power of the other.

If now I have succeeded in proving that sovereignty is alienable, and can be transferred; that it is divisible, and can be apportioned; that it can be placed where the power in which it at last reposes, the people, may choose to place it; and that it may be distributed among such depositories as they may select for its reception and exercise, I will have advanced so far in the argument as to prove that the framers of our constitution could, in the nature of things, make such a Government as they purport to have made; that there was really no physical or metaphysical impossibility in its execution.

The next inquiry is, what kind of Government did they, in fact, make? Is it a league of sovereign, independent nations? or is it one National Government, possessed of paramount, but limited powers; made up of States, each also sovereign in all things not embraced within the powers granted by the constitution to the National Government? On this part of the subject, the opinion of those who framed the ordinance of South Carolina, and of gentlemen who defend it here, aid us in coming to a conclusion. They say that, in looking into the constitution, they find "that the most important sovereign powers are vested in the central Government;" some of those powers are: the exclusive right of war and peace; negotiations with foreign Powers; the regulation of commerce; the right to impose taxes; to coin money, and regulate the value thereof; to levy troops and maintain them, and to issue civil and criminal process directly against the citizens of States; and adjudicate on the lives and property of those citizens; and the legislative power flowing from, and operating directly upon, the people of the States.

Now, it seems to me, that no man could mistake a central Government possessing these powers, as merely the effect or result of a league between States wholly independent of each other. Those attributes expressly vested in the National Government, are, in the opinion of political writers, the highest and most distinctly characteristic marks of sovereignty. They are powers which no State, being sovereign, could permit any other State or league of States to exercise within its territories, or over its citizens, without relinquishing a portion, and a high and controlling portion, of that sovereignty.

I have already adverted to the partition of powers under the feudal Governments, to show that there were examples of divided sovereignty; as, from the sovereign himself, the first lord paramount, down in the descending scale through the baron to the vassal, from which, perhaps, the first hint for the distribution of powers between our General Government and republican States was derived. I will now read a passage or two from a writer of high credit, (Mr. Hallam,) which will show more clearly than I can do by argument, what constitutes a collection of States held together by league, and what a National Government. In his Middle Ages, and in the chapter on the feudal system, page 239, he says:

"To understand in what degree the peers and barons of France, during the prevalence of the feudal system, were independent of the crown, we must look at their leading privileges. These may be reckoned: 1, The right of coining money; 2, That of waging private war; 3, The exemption of all public tributes, except feudal aids; 4,

The freedom from legislative control; and 5, The exclusive exercise of original judicature within their own dominions. Privileges so enormous, and so contrary to all principles of sovereignty, might lead us, in strictness, to account France rather a collection of States partially allied to each other, than a single monarchy."

From this, it will be seen, that it was the total absence of all the important powers vested by our constitution in the General Government, that led that writer to doubt whether France was, under the feudal system, one nation, or merely a league of States. But, surely, that doubt cannot exist under our Government, if the powers conferred by the constitution were, in fact, intended to be conveyed in the full extent in which they are there set down and granted. I will not consume the time of the Senate by going at large into this question, which has been already fully illustrated by those who have preceded me in this discussion; but I cannot forbear referring to one matter of history which strongly bears upon the claims of South Carolina to construe away, by historical reference, the plain meaning of the constitution.

Charles Pinckney, one of the delegates from South Carolina to the convention which formed the constitution, after he had performed his duty there, and while the constitution was under consideration before the Legislature of his State, on the 16th of January, 1788, in an address to the House of Representatives, gave his views in the most full and lucid manner, of the nature and bearing of that instrument, and the character of the Government which it formed. He says that the object of the promoters of the convention was to establish "a firm National Government;" and that the convention "wisely considered that, though the confederation might possess the great outlines of a General Government, yet, that it was, in fact, nothing more than a federal union, or, strictly speaking, a league, founded in paternal and persuasive principles, with nothing permanent or coercive in its construction, where the members might or might not comply with their federal engagements as they thought proper;" and adds, "It is sufficient to remark, that the convention saw and felt the necessity of establishing a Government upon different principles, which, instead of requiring the intervention of thirteen different Legislatures, between the demand and the compliance, should operate upon the people in the first instance." This is a part of the exposition of the general purpose of the constitution at the time it was presented to the State and people of South Carolina for their adoption. A distinct purpose to abandon the mere federative league, which had theretofore held these States together, and to erect in its stead a "firm National Government." The recent convention of South Carolina say that the constitution does seem to create such a Government, but appeals to history to disprove that such was its purpose. But here is history, at home, in their own State, a part of their own acts in the adoption of that constitution, which proves, if any proof were wanting, to aid the words of that instrument, that a National Government was its very object and purpose. In the same speech, Mr. Pinckney refers to the power which that constitution vests in the Supreme Court to decide in the last resort, and uses this very just and emphatic language: "That in republics, much more, in time of peace, would always depend upon the energy and integrity of the judicial, than on any other part of the Government; that to ensure these, extensive authorities were necessary; particularly so, were they in a tribunal constituted as this is, whose duty it would be, not only to decide all questions which should arise within the Union, but to control and keep the State judicials within their proper limits, whenever they shall attempt to interfere with its power." It would seem, therefore, to have been the intention of the framers of the constitution, as it is the clear construction of the instrument, that the judicial system of the United States should pervade every State of the Union; that that court should be the paramount judicial tribunal, and that it should revise the decisions of the State tribunals in all things in which they infringed on its rights; and it further appears that this purpose was known to, and sanctioned by, the people of the State of South Carolina.

Dangers, it is true, were apprehended by the framers of the constitution, of disunion on the one hand, and consolidation on the other; and that danger arose from the necessity of placing the ultimate decision of questions of controverted power in some department of one or other of the Governments, which might claim it, either in the State or in the General Government. But this danger does not, in fact, exist to any great extent, placed as the power is in the General Government; for every man who is a representative of the people here, in any form, must look at home to the people whom he represents to sustain him. Those people, in all parts of the Union, while they are citizens of the United States, are also citizens of a State which possesses their closest attachments; and it is not probable that they will ever sustain the man who abandons the just rights of his and their State, for the purpose of centering power in the General Government, of which power he may be the temporary possessor.

Mr. Pinckney, speaking on that subject, says, "Let us theorize as much as we will, it will be impossible so far to divest the federal representatives of their State views and policy, as to induce them to act on truly national principles. Men do not easily wean themselves of those preferences and attachments which country and connexions invariably create." And he adverts to the danger that "State views and State policy will influence their deliberations." The effect, then, of placing the power of ultimate decision in the States would have been, to give them, in the first place, their voice in the councils of the Union; and after that had been heard, to give each the power of destroying what all had united to create. In another place, he says, "The State Governments will too naturally slide into an opposition against the General one, and be easily induced to consider themselves as rivals; they will, after a time, resist the collection of a revenue; and if the General Government is obliged to concede, in the smallest degree, on this point, they will, of course, neglect their duties and despise its authority. A great degree of weight and energy is necessary to enforce it." Considering the time, and place, and circumstances, under which this was delivered, it is a prediction which has been singularly verified—verified by the acts of the State to whose Legislature the prediction was addressed. Can it be said, then, that South Carolina had not all the effects of this constitution, in a form as strong as it has ever received in practice, or as it has been contended for in theory, fully before her Legislature and people at the time she consented to its adoption? And who can deny that the appeal to history strengthens rather than weakens the obvious construction of that instrument?

If danger arises from vesting the power of deciding in the last resort in a department of the General Government, where the constitution has placed it, how much more dangerous would be the investiture of that power in each of the States? If we place it there, it brings us back, at once, to those scenes of disorder and violence which existed in the feudal ages, when every baron had a veto on the laws of his sovereign, and every vassal on those of his baron; a negative, worse in its effects than the liberum veto in the ill-regulated Government of Poland; a power, the abuse of which led to foreign interference, to bribery, to bloodshed in the halls of their Diet; and, finally, to subjugation and vassalage. But here the power claimed on behalf of South Carolina is more enduring and more dangerous; it is not merely to prevent the passage of a law by her veto, but to annul a law solemnly enacted, whenever she may conceive it infringes on her rights or affects her interests. Her doctrine would result in this: that in case of war with a foreign enemy, any State could, by its own act, change the relations of the whole country, or make for itself a separate peace, withdraw from the Union, form an alliance with the enemy; and this, too, without the individuals who did the deed incurring the guilt of treason or any legal crime. For it is contended that if an individual bear arms against the Union, in obedience to a law of the State of which he is a citizen, that law is his shield, and he is, therefore, guiltless.

In support of this position, it has been contended that no man can be a citizen of the United States except as a citizen, or by reason of being a citizen of some one of the States. Now, this is most clearly an error; the cases against it are numerous. An individual born in a Territory, in the District of Columbia; one who is born abroad, his parents being absent in the service of the United States, are all of them citizens of the United States, in all respects, as far as it regards protection and allegiance, as fully and perfectly as if they were citizens of one of the States also. It is true, they are all denied the exercise of certain civil rights; as, for instance, the exercise of the elective franchise, so far as relates to the election of the officers of the General Government; but that does not touch the question now under consideration. That question is, whether the reciprocal rights of protection and allegiance are necessarily derived through the States, and, therefore, exist only by virtue of their power and through their sufferance. And it clearly does not; for, besides the cases I have already referred to, another is decisive. Congress, and Congress alone, has a right to pass a general law for the naturalization of aliens. It can, therefore, make citizens of foreigners, by its own will, without the assent of the States concurring in the act. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. TYLER] said he would like to see such a thing as a citizen of the Government of the United States. I, also, would like to see a citizen of the ordinance of nullification; for the one idea is just as absurd as the other. Citizenship has relation to the State or nation, not to the Government; but the allegiance which the citizen owes is due to the Government. In a republic the citizen is one of the people who make up the nation, and he owes obedience and duty to the will of that people, constitutionally expressed; and he owes allegiance to their duly constituted Government.

The statesmen of South Carolina seem to be of opinion that a law of that State, commanding her citizens to do an act which were treason against the United States, if done without her mandate, will, by virtue of that mandate, cease to be a crime and become a duty. She is, therefore, presented as a shield, to save those who are to violate their allegiance to the United States, in obeying her laws. But if the United States be the paramount power, as the constitution certainly has made it, this can avail them nothing; or, at most, it would only mitigate the enormity of the offence. The state of double allegiance which seems to strike some gentlemen as absurd or impossible, is easily understood in theory, and is very common in fact. Could any thing be more easy than to conceive such a state of government and law, as that a citizen of South Carolina should owe allegiance to that State, saving his paramount allegiance to the United States? Such was often the case, as is well known, in some of the feudal Governments; and, indeed, in all of them, at some point of time. It is asked, if, according to the doctrines for which we contend, treason can be committed against a State? For myself, I see no reason why it could not. But crimes, in their definition and description, are the creatures of law; and certainly any State may define, by law, an offence which may be properly denominated treason, and punish ed as such. The term possesses no definite meaning independent of statutory enactment; in its general sense, it signifies treachery, where faith and duty were due. If a servant slay his master, a son his father, or an ecclesiastical person his superior, it is, in legal parlance, treason; because, in all those cases, faith and duty are due them. But if the act were done pursuant to the mandate of the paramount power, however revolting it might be to humanity, it would cease to be a legal crime. In all these cases, the allegiance to the individual or the inferior power yields to the paramount allegiance due to the superior; thus would the allegiance which a citizen owes to his State yield to that paramount allegiance which he owes to the Union. I, therefore, see nothing in this objection to puzzle, much less to convince me.

This, then, is the attitude which South Carolina has assumed towards the Union of which she is a part. She now asserts powers which she once yielded in the most solemn form to the Government of that Union. She claims the right to retract, or rather to assert those powers, under the wild pretext that the grant was impossible, and, therefore, nugatory. She assumes that the allegiance of her citizens to her is paramount to their allegiance to that Government which she and her own people, in their primary assembly, joined in creating, and pronounced supreme; and whose constitution her own legislators are sworn to support, before they can exercise their appropriate functions. And she has nullified a law of the United States; expelled its courts from her limits; and, through a mere color of judicial process, but in fact by an immediate application of ministerial power, directed the property of the United States, in possession of its officers, to be seized and wrested from their hands. She attaches a penalty to all who resist the application of this power; and those who attempt to support the laws of the Union, to serve the process of its courts, or even to invoke their aid, are branded as criminals, and subjected to prosecution.

If, sir, the laws of the Union be now insufficient to oppose a decisive and effectual check to this violence and aggression; if the Executive arm be not now strong enough to defend and protect the Union, its laws and its rights; unwilling as I am to intrust power in the hands of our present Chief Magistrate, yet, as the case is one of overruling necessity, I have made up my mind to do it. I will invest him, if need be, with all the power of the nation, and charge him, by the sacred trust reposed in him by the constitution, to stretch forth his arm, thus strengthened and sustained, and defend and preserve the Union. With this view, I support, and shall vote for the passage of the bill.

After speaking for about half an hour, Mr. E. yielded the floor to give an opportunity for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RUGGLES then moved that the Senate now adjourn. Negative—Yeas 10, nays 23.

Mr. CALHOUN then said, that as the debate was closed on the part of the opponents of the bill, and as there was no disposition on their part to delay the passage of the bill, he hoped that the gentlemen on the other side would consent to postpone the final question until the morning, as the Senate was now thin, and a bill of such importance ought to pass in a full Senate. Several gentlemen, he said, had retired in consequence of indisposition.

Mr. WILKINS rendered a tribute to the liberality of the Senator from South Carolina, who had postponed his intention of addressing the Senate, and had thus facilitated the termination of the debate. But as the Senate had been notified that the bill would be urged through this evening, and as it was therefore to be presumed that every Senator was prepared to vote, and as the public mind was desirous that this question should be disposed of, he could not consent to delay. There was also another subject into which he was desirous of going as speedily as possible.

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the Senate now adjourn, but afterwards withdrew the motion.

Mr. EWING then resumed his remarks, (given entire above,) and continued until a quarter past nine, when he again gave way to

Mr. HOLMES, who moved that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. WILKINS asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, stood—Yeas 13, nays 23.

Mr. EWING then concluded his remarks at twenty minutes before ten o'clock.

On the call of Mr. WEBSTER, the yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TYLER then moved that the Senate do now adjourn. He stated that he had been induced to make this motion because he saw that several Senators who were opposed to the bill were absent from their seats; and he thought that the bill might receive its final action early in the morning.

Mr. WILKINS stated that the gentlemen whose seats were empty had but just withdrawn from the Senate. It was but a few moments before that they were all in their seats, and he presumed that they would return immediately.

The motion to adjourn was decided in the negative.—Yeas 5, nays 27.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Chambers, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Silsbee, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggonman, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—32.

NAY.—Mr. Tyler—1.

So the bill was passed, and ordered to be sent to the House for concurrence.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

VOTES OF ABSENTEES.

Mr. BIBB requested permission to record his name on the list of members who voted last night on the question of the passage of the bill to provide further for the collection of the duties on imports. He stated that he had been unable to attend the evening sessions on account of indisposition.

The CHAIR stated that the rule on this subject was positive, but the leave could be given by the unanimous assent of the Senate.

Mr. KING stated that he also had been absent when the vote was taken on the final passage of the bill. He had, however, recorded his vote against the engrossment of the bill, and he was indifferent on the subject of any change in the rule on this occasion.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that he had not been in his place to record his vote at large against the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had been anxious last evening to postpone the vote on the passage of the bill, in order that it might be taken this morning in a full Senate. He had stated to the Senate that four or five Senators opposed to the measure were too unwell to be in their seats in the evening. With the object in view which he had stated, he had moved that the Senate adjourn, but the majority remained inexorable. The only course which remained for him and his friends was, to vote in a minority which would not contain the strength of the opposition to the bill, or to leave the Senate; and they determined on the latter as the more correct course, and as the best calculated to convey an accurate expression of the feeling of the Senate. He regretted that the Senate had not indulged the opponents of the bill with a final vote in broad day-light, when both the unwell and the well would have been able to attend. He felt indifference as to whether his vote was recorded or not.

Mr. FOOT expressed his hope that the unanimous assent of the Senate would be given to allow gentlemen to record their names on a question of such importance. Whenever an application of this nature had been made, it had been customary to grant it.

Mr. BUCKNER said that he hoped the permission would not be given. He was not present at the passage of the bill, nor did he wish to record his name either against or in favor of its passage. He suggested that there was another course which gentlemen could pursue if they were disposed, and that was for one of the majority to move the reconsideration of the vote of last evening.

Mr. HOLMES hoped that the gentleman from Missouri would not object to the allowance of this application. If he was careless of his own vote being recorded, he should recollect that his objection would operate as a check on the other Senators who were opposed to the bill. If, however, the privilege was extended to those who were absent last night, he hoped that it would also be extended to those who were now absent, and that these would have the whole of the day to record their names.

Mr. CALHOUN repeated the expression of his indifference as to the result of the application, leaving the question in the hands of the majority.

Mr. TYLER said that he felt a little pride in this matter. He stood single in his negative to the bill; and he was not desirous to lose this proud position, and to share the honor he now enjoyed alone with any others.

The application was then withdrawn.

THE RECESS.

Mr. KANE moved that the Senate now rescind the order passed some weeks since, directing a daily recess from 3 to 5 o'clock.

Mr. MOORE moved to lay the motion on the table. Negatived—Yeas 19, nays 20.

Mr. CLAY then remarked that he could not be present at these evening sessions; for he had found it impossible to breathe the impure air of the Senate Chamber after dinner. He had been twice compelled to absent himself from the Senate in the evening; and last night he was prevented from giving the vote which he would have given with pleasure, in favor of the bill which had then been passed. But he desired that an experiment should be made to-day, by which it might be tested whether there was any probability of a final action on the tariff during this session. He would, therefore, move to postpone the further consideration of this motion until to-morrow. Perhaps by that time—perhaps by three o'clock to-day—it would be seen whether there was any prospect of acting finally on this subject at the present session. He concluded by making his motion to postpone.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a hope that this motion would not prevail. Attendance at these evening sessions he considered, speaking in the mildest terms, as a great inconvenience to members. The badness of the atmosphere was productive of serious injury to health. He would himself much prefer sitting here till five or six o'clock, or even later, to a recess, and an evening session.

Mr. KANE urged the propriety of rescinding the rule now. He would be willing to restore the arrangement at any future time when it might be deemed necessary.

Mr. WILKINS said he would be as happy as any Senator to get rid of those recesses and evening sessions, whenever it could be done with reference to the convenience of the Senate and the despatch of public business. He would, on this occasion, willingly put his vote in the hands of the Senator from Kentucky, because he thought it was due to the gentleman, who had introduced this measure of conciliation, to give him all the industry which could be contributed to the consummation of his efforts.

Mr. CLAY acknowledged the liberality of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which was in conformity with his general conduct and character. He himself would prefer a continuous session to evening sessions. We might try the experiment to-day of a continuous session, and see what was the chance of getting any bill through. He then withdrew his motion to postpone.

The motion of Mr. KANE was then agreed to, and the rule was rescinded.

THE TARIFF.

The hour of 12 having arrived,

Mr. CLAY moved to take up the special order, being the bill "to modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports;" which being agreed to, the bill was then taken up in Committee of the Whole, as amended by the select committee to whom it was referred, as follows:

A bill to modify the act of the fourteenth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and all other acts imposing duties on imports.

(Strike out the parts within brackets, and insert those parts quoted.)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, in all cases where duties are imposed on foreign imports by the act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," or by any other act, shall exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one-tenth part of such excess shall be deducted; from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, another tenth part thereof shall be deducted; and from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, one-half of the residue of such excess shall be deducted; and from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the other half thereof shall be deducted.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the fourteenth of July aforesaid as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and fulled cloths, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Kendal cottons, of which wool is the only material, the value whereof does not exceed thirty-five cents a square yard, at five per centum ad valorem, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed. And the said articles shall be subject to the same duty of fifty per centum as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool; which duty shall be liable to the same deductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, until the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected. [And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money, and laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government; and, for that purpose, shall be equal upon all articles, according to their value, which are not, by this act, declared to be entitled to entry subsequent to the said thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, free of duty; and, until otherwise directed by law, from and after the said thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, such duties shall be at the rate of twenty per cent. ad valorem; and from and after that day, all credits now allowed by law, in the payment of duties, shall be, and hereby are, abolished: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the passage of any law, in the event of war with any foreign Power, for imposing such duties as may be deemed, by Congress, necessary to the prosecution of such war.] "And from and after the day last aforesaid, all duties upon imports shall be collected in ready money; and all credits now allowed by law, in the payment of duties, shall be, and hereby are, abolished; and such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government."

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the articles now exempted by the existing laws from the payment of duties, the following articles, imported from and after the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and until the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, shall also be admitted to entry, free from duty, to wit: bleached and unbleached linens, "table linen, linen napkins, and linen cambrics," manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, "except sewing silk," and worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the said thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the following articles shall be admitted to entry, free from duty, to wit: [unmanufactured cotton,] indigo, quicksilver, "sulphur, crude saltpetre, steel, grindstones, refined borax, emory," opium, tin in plates and sheets, gum Arabic, gum Senegal, lac dye, madder, madder root, nuts and berries used in dyeing, saffron, tumeric, woad or pastel, aloes, ambergris, Burgundy pitch, cochineal, camomile flowers, coriander seed, catsup, chalk, coculus indicus, horn plates for lanterns, ox horns, other horns and tips, India rubber, unmanufactured ivory, juniper berries, musk, nuts of all kinds, oil of juniper, unmanufactured rattans and reeds, tortoise shell, tin foil, shellac, vegetables used principally in dyeing and composing dyes, weld, and all articles employed chiefly for dyeing, "except alum, copperas, bichromate of potash, prussiate of potash, chromate of potash, and nitrate of lead, aqua fortis and tartaric acids," [and all other dyeing drugs and materials for composing dyes.] "And all imports on which the first section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per centum ad valorem before the said thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, from and after that day may be admitted to entry subject to such duty, not exceeding twenty per centum ad valorem, as shall be provided for by law."

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, or of any other act as is inconsistent with this act, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior or subsequent to the said thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, of any act or acts, from time to time, that may be necessary to detect, prevent, or punish evasions of the duties on imports imposed by law; "nor to prevent the passage of any act prior to the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue, altering the rate of duties on articles which, by the aforesaid act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, are subject to a less rate of duty than twenty per centum ad valorem, in such manner as not to exceed that rate, and so as to adjust the revenue to either of the said contingencies."

Mr. CLAY then rose to say, that he presumed it would be thought most expedient by the Senate to consider the amendments made by the Select Committee in the first place, and dispose of them prior to taking up the bill generally. The first amendment that came up for immediate consideration was intended to make it more acceptable. After adopting the maximum of twenty per cent., above which the duties are not, ultimately, to be raised, the amendment proposes to raise whatever revenue (not exceeding the maximum) may be then necessary on an economical system of government. The next principle of the amendment is, that the restriction which limited the duties from falling below the general average of twenty per cent. is struck out. He hoped to this amendment there would be no objection on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FORSYTH thought that this amendment was extremely objectionable. As he understood the object of the amendment, it would limit the power of Congress, after the year 1842, from making any discrimination of duties. Where could the gentleman find this power to limit future Congresses? It was said, the intention was to unite the different existing interests; but in doing this, was it necessary to abandon general principles? The present House of Representatives may feel themselves bound, in honor, to adopt the measure; but how many of the members who are now in that House may be there in two years hence? how many in four years? It appeared to him as intended to render practicable what was impracticable. Yet, though opposed to the principle, and though even incorporated in it, he would vote for it notwithstanding, as he considered it, at the least, useless, inasmuch as it could not limit future action.

Mr. CLAY was sorry that the measure should meet with any objection from the Senator from Georgia. It was intended as a compromise; as an adjustment between conflicting interests; to preserve harmony and peace among all. If the gentleman would turn his attention to the amendment, he would see that its object was to render the very principle to which the gentleman was opposed less objectionable. The bill, as originally reported, required Congress to subject all to the same standard of duties; this restriction was struck out by the amendment, and left Congress at discretion below twenty per cent.

Mr. FORSYTH thought the amendment was liable to the same objection. At the same time he would state, that, wishing to see peace and harmony preserved, though opposed to the principle, he would not vote against it; but he hoped to see it struck out. A future Congress would not be bound by it.

Mr. DICKERSON was desirous, in order the better to form his opinion on the subject of the amendment, to hear the views of all the members of the committee. The amendment contained a new principle, that "such duties shall be raised as an economical administration of the Government may require." He wished to be informed, if, under this proposition, it was not intended, indirectly, to do away, hereafter, with the principle of an incidental and discriminating protection? If, by adopting this, the object was that the principle of protection should not be taken into consideration in raising the future revenue, he would say that he would strongly oppose it.

Mr. CLAY said it always afforded him pleasure to give all the information in his power. But in this state, the objection of the gentleman was not well founded. On the question of the amendment, he (Mr. C.) only considered it a question of comparison whether the amendment should be preferred to the original text; by voting for the amendment, as he took it, no gentleman pledged himself to its principle; it was only that he preferred it to the original text. But, sir, said Mr. C., there is no concealment in the bill, as gentlemen will see by turning to the next clause. After nine and a half years, the principle of protection is limited to twenty per cent.; but below that amount, the principle is expressly preserved.

Mr. CLAYTON, after some remarks, which, from being spoken in a low tone of voice, were not distinctly audible in the gallery, but in which he was understood to say that the main question could not be fully embraced till the additional amendment about to be submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] relative to the home valuation, came up, proceeded to say, it would then be seen it was not intended to surrender the principle of protection. For his own part, he would never surrender it; he hoped in God no future Congress would be found to do so; for he held that this Government could not exist under those circumstances.

Mr. SMITH said he would vote for the amendment, though he was opposed to the principles of the bill.

Mr. FORSYTH said he should conform to the wish to adopt the amendments for the present, and reserve his remarks for a future occasion.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that he was willing to make a compromise, if it could be done; but he would show the limits to which he was willing to go. He saw no special occasion to do so now, when these amendments were under consideration, which he believed the committee had all concurred in.

Mr. WEBSTER said that, in his opinion, the principle in the amendment and in the bill was equally objectionable; in the one, and in the other, it was proposed to limit the action of Congress. Considering that those amendments were now but in committee, and that they would come up again, he would not now make any motion to strike out; but at a future period it was his intention to ask for the ayes and noes on those several propositions.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would not vote for the principle in either case. It was said that it was not the object to limit Congress in respect to the power of discrimination; but there was a limit to this discrimination to which he would not agree. With the general average of twenty per cent., in his opinion, there could be no protection; it might as well be fixed at five per cent.

Mr. CLAYTON made some remarks in reply, to show that, though the bill went to limit the duties, after nine and a half years, to twenty per cent., the principle of protection was not surrendered. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had drawn up, he said, a series of resolutions—and ably drawn up, in his opinion—in which the principle was admitted that it was practicable to devise a system, in which the protective policy would be preserved, and yet reduce the tariff to the wants of the Government; but it was held that time must be given for this, and it could only be perfected with much time and labor. If such were the fact, he (Mr. C.) saw nothing in the immediate amendment that gave up the principle. He had already said that this he would never surrender; and if he so understood the amendment, he would never agree to it.

Mr. WILKINS said that the amendment struck him as useful, so far as the restriction on Congress to discriminate below twenty per cent. was taken away. It was wise to leave Congress unfettered. But he held that the subsequent words, "such duties as an economical administration of the Government may require," did not mean any thing, and were useless: it was nothing but a general amendment, which every Congress was bound to follow; and he should therefore move to strike out the words.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he did not mean, at that time, to give his opinion on that or any other of the amendments. He only wished to remind the gentleman that they were then in committee; and that in adopting the amendments now there was no pledge given. After passing through the Committee of the Whole, the same opportunity would then exist to amend the bill.

Mr. WILKINS expressed his intention to avail himself of the proper opportunity, and then withdrew his motion.

The CHAIR was proceeding to take the sense of the Senate on the amendments separately, when it was suggested by Mr. CHAMBERS to take the question on them in the aggregate.

Mr. CLAY said if such were the wish of the Senate, to take the vote on them in the aggregate, he would briefly state the object of the various amendments separately. Mr. C. then briefly analyzed each, stating its drift and meaning.

The question was then put, when the amendments were adopted.

Mr. DICKERSON gave notice that, at a proper period, he would move to strike out so much of that section wherein duties were imposed upon alum, brimstone, and some other articles, and to insert the clause of the bill of 1832, in which the several articles free of duty are enumerated.

Mr. CLAY said he had an amendment which he wished to offer before he submitted the leading one, of which he had already given notice. The one which he now wished to offer regarded the time when the bill was to come into operation. As the bill was now before the Senate, the 30th of September next was fixed on. He had had some communications on the subject from New York, stating the inconvenience that would arise from fixing the commencement at the 1st of October, and also from Richmond. These communications stated that August and September were the months when most merchants made their purchases, and the effect of the bill must be to prevent sales taking place till the goods would come in under the new duties. They proposed the 31st of December or 1st of January next, as better for both the importers and the buyers. He had modified the bill to suit the change; the commencement of it was put off one quarter; and, to meet this, its termination was brought a quarter in advance. He hoped that this change would meet with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. C. then moved his amendment to this effect, which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY now rose to propose the amendment of which he had previously given notice. The object was, that after the period prescribed by the bill, all duties should thereafter be assessed on a valuation made at the port in which the goods are first imported, and under "such regulations as may be prescribed by law." Mr. C. said it would be seen by this amendment, that in place of having a foreign valuation, it was intended to have a home one. It was believed by the friends of the protective system, that such a regulation was necessary. It was believed by many of the friends of the system, that after the period of nine and a half years, the most of our manufactures will be sufficiently grown to be able to support themselves under a duty of twenty per cent., if properly laid; but that under a system of foreign valuation, such would not be the case. They say that it would be more detrimental to their interests than the lowest scale of duties that could be imposed; and you propose to fix a standard of duties. They are willing to take you at your word, provided you regulate this in a way to do them justice.

Mr. C. said that, to effect a system of home valuation, was deemed to be impracticable; but he wished it to be recollected that, in this proposition, there was only an acknowledgment of the principle, and the regulation of it was left to other Congresses. He hoped that the friends and the opponents of the system would not differ on this proposition, which was merely a speculative point open for future legislation.

Mr. SMITH opposed the amendment, on the ground that it would be an increase of duties; that it had been tried before; that it would be impracticable, unequal, unjust, and productive of confusion, inasmuch as imported goods were constantly varying in value, and were well known to be, at all times, cheaper in New York than in the commercial cities south of it. This would have the effect of drawing all the trade of the United States to New York.

Mr. CLAY said he did not think it expedient, in deciding this question, to go forward five or six years, and make that an obstacle to the passage of a great national measure, which is not to go into operation until after that period. The honorable Senator from Maryland said that the measure would be impracticable. Well, sir, if so, it will not be adopted. We do not adopt it now, said Mr. C.; we only adopt the principle, leaving it to future legislation to adjust the details. Besides, it would be the restoration of an ancient principle, known since the foundation of the Government. It was but at the last session that the discriminating duty on goods coming from this side and beyond the Cape of Good Hope, ten per cent. on one, and twenty per cent. on the other, was repealed. On what principle was it, said he, that this discrimination ever prevailed? On the principle of the home value. Were it not for the fraudulent invoices which every gentleman in this country was familiar with, he would not urge the amendment; but it was to detect and prevent these frauds that he looked upon the insertion of the clause as essentially necessary. The experience of the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. C. said, might detect a thousand difficulties in the bill itself. To all which he had but one answer; if any provisions of the bill should be found impracticable or unequal, why, they would not be adopted. But he would ask of gentlemen, if, from a mere difference in theory, while the country was anxiously looking for some measure of compromise and conciliation, whether they were willing to separate and go home to their constituents, and leave the country in its present distracted and unquiet condition?

Mr. SMITH replied that he had not said that the measure was impracticable. He only intended to say that it would be inconvenient and unjust. Neither did he say that it would be adopted by a future Congress; but he said, if the principle was adopted now, it would be an entering wedge that might lead to the adoption of the measure. We all recollect, said Mr. S., that appropriations were made for surveys for internal improvements; and that these operated as entering wedges, and led to appropriations for roads and canals. The adoption of the principle contended for by the Senator from Kentucky, would not, in his, (Mr. S.'s) opinion, prevent frauds in the invoices. That very principle was the foundation of all the frauds on the revenue of France and Spain, where the duties were assessed according to the value of the goods in the ports where entered. He again said that the effect of the amendment would be to draw the principal commerce of the country to the great city of New York, where goods were cheaper.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he supposed that this amendment was to take effect eight or nine years hence; if so, he viewed it as a matter of perfect inutility. He understood, from what had fallen from the Senator from Kentucky, that this was a vital question, and on it depended the success of this measure of conciliation and compromise, which was said to settle the distracted condition of the country. In one respect, it was said to be a vital question; and the next was, it was useful; and a strange contradiction followed, that the fate of this measure, to unite the jarrings of brother with brother, depended on the adoption of a principle which might or might not be adopted. He considered the amendment wrong in principle, because it would be both unequal and unjust in its operation, and because it would raise the revenue; as the duties would be assessed, not only on the value of the goods at the place whence imported, but on their value at the place of importation. He would, however, vote for the bill, even if the amendment were incorporated in it, provided he had the assurances from the proper quarter that it would effect the conciliation and compromise it was intended for. But, Mr. F. asked, why should we adopt the amendment? Can we be asked to bind our successors at the next Congress? Can we bind a Congress eight or nine years hence? Nobody pretends we can. Can we, even by the adoption of this measure, bind the next Congress not to remodel the tariff themselves? No one believed that it could be done. We can only say, we act for ourselves, and leave to our successors the same undoubted right. For his part, though he should vote for the bill, he considered nothing in it of the slightest value, with the exception of the first section. He confessed he did not like the bill, but should vote for it as a measure of conciliation, calculated to remove the danger of that conflict, the consequences of which no man can foresee. He believed that the passage of the bill would be injurious in its consequences to the section of country he represented; for the next Congress, he believed, would pass a bill better for their interests and more satisfactory to them. Mr. F. ended by expressing a sincere hope that no member of the Senate would permit a principle of perfect inutility to interfere with a measure which promised such valuable results.

Mr. CLAY observed that he had heard, with much pleasure, the sentiments of the gentleman from Georgia, and especially the expression of his determination to vote for the bill. He had brought forward this measure with the hope, that in the course of its discussion, it would ultimately assume such a shape as to reconcile all parties to its adoption, and tend to end the agitation of this unsettled question. If there be any member of this Congress, (Mr. C. said,) who says that he will take this bill now for as much as it is worth, and that he will, at the next Congress, again open the question, for the purpose of getting a better bill, of bringing down the tariff to a lower standard, without considering it as a final measure of compromise and conciliation, calculated also to give stability to a man of business, the bill, in his eyes, would lose all its value, and he should be constrained to vote against it.

It was for the sake of conciliation, of nine years of peace, to give tranquillity to a disturbed and agitated country, that he had, even at this late period of the session, introduced this measure, which, his respect for the other branch of the Legislature, now sitting in that building, and who had a measure looking to the same end before them, had prevented him from bringing forward at an earlier period. But when he had seen the session wearing away, without the prospect of any action in that other body, he felt himself compelled to come forward, though contrary to his wishes, and the advice of some of his best friends, with whom he had acted in the most perilous times. The honorable member from Georgia asks if it is possible for us to separate without acting on this important measure, merely because of a difference respecting what he considers an immaterial principle? But, sir, let it be remembered, that that consideration belongs to the other side as well as to ours; and that the responsibility of defeating a measure promising so much good, will as well rest with those who oppose it, because of an immaterial objection. Mr. C. did not, more than the gentleman from Georgia, consider this measure as binding on a future Congress; but when it was called for by the whole country, he could not think that any Congress, having in view the same objects, would violate the implied pledge given at so important a crisis. He knew enough of the respect which every Congress would entertain for the opinions of the whole body of the people, to believe that the principle now sought to be established, of harmony,

The Tariff.

peace, and good will, would be violated on light or trivial occasions.

Mr. HOLMES spoke in favor of the amendment, declaring that it was neither unequal, unconstitutional, nor calculated to raise the duties. His idea was, that high protection lessened the price of the article to the consumer, and that low duties increased the price.

Mr. CALHOUN said, he regretted, exceedingly, that the Senator from Kentucky had felt it his duty to move the amendment. According to his present impressions, the objections to it were insurmountable; and, unless these were removed, he should be compelled to vote against the whole bill, should the amendment be adopted. The measure proposed was, in his opinion, unconstitutional. The constitution expressly provided that no preference should be given, by any regulation of commerce, to the ports of one State over those of another; and this would be the effect of adopting the amendment. Thus, great injustice and inequality must necessarily result from it; for, the price of goods being cheaper in the northern than in the southern cities, a home valuation would give to the former a preference in the payment of duties. Again, the price of goods being higher at New Orleans and Charleston than at New York, the freight and insurance also being higher, together with the increased expenses of a sickly climate, would give such advantages in the amount of duties to the northern city, as to draw to it much of the trade of the southern ones. In his view of the subject, this was not all. He was not merchant enough to say what would be the extent of duties under this system of home valuation; but, as he understood it, they must, of consequence, be progressive. For instance, an article is brought into New York, value there 100 dollars. Twenty per cent. on that would raise the value of the article to one hundred and twenty dollars, on which value a duty of twenty per cent. would be assessed at the next importation, and so on. It would, therefore, be impossible to say to what extent the duties would run up. He regretted the more that the Senator from Kentucky had felt it his duty to offer this amendment, as he was willing to leave the matter to the decision of a future Congress, though he did not see how they could get over the insuperable constitutional objections he had glanced at. Mr. C. appealed to the Senator from Kentucky, whether, with these views, he would press his amendment, when he had eight or nine years in advance before it could take effect. He understood the argument of the Senator from Kentucky to be an admission that the amendment was not now absolutely necessary. With respect to the apprehension of frauds on the revenue, Mr. C. said that every future Congress would have the strongest disposition to guard against them. The very reduction of duties, he said, would have that effect; it would strike at the root of the evil. Mr. C. said he agreed with the Senator from Kentucky, that this bill will be the final effort at conciliation and compromise; and he, for one, was not disposed, if it passed, to violate it by future legislation.

Mr. CLAYTON said that he could not vote for this bill without this amendment, nor would he admit any idea of an abandonment of the protective system; while he was willing to pass this measure, as one of concession from the stronger to the weaker party, he never could agree that twenty per cent. was adequate protection to our domestic manufactures. He had been anxious to do something to relieve South Carolina from her present perilous position; though he had never been driven by the taunts of southern gentlemen to do that, which he now did, for the sake of conciliation. I vote for this bill, said Mr. C., only on the ground that it may save South Carolina from herself.

Here Mr. C. yielded the floor to

Mr. CALHOUN, who said, he hoped the gentleman would not touch that question. He entreated him to believe that South Carolina had no fears for herself. The noble and disinterested attitude she had assumed was intended for the whole nation, while it was also calculated to relieve herself, as well as them, from oppressive legislation. It was not for them to consider the condition of South Carolina only, in passing on a measure of this importance.

Mr. CLAYTON resumed. Sir, said he, I must be permitted to explain, in my own way, the reasons which will govern me in the vote I am about to give. As I said before, I never have permitted the fears of losing the protective system, as expressed by the Senator from Georgia, when he taunted us with the majority that they would have in the next Congress, when they would get a better bill, to influence my opinion upon this occasion. That we have been driven by our fears into this act of concession, I will not admit. Sir, I tell gentlemen that they may never get such another offer as the present; for, though they may think otherwise, I do not believe that the people of this country will ever be brought to consent to the abandonment of the protective system. I agree with the Senator from South Carolina, that in this bill there is no abandonment of principle on either side; and I again say, that twenty per cent. is not an adequate protection, and that the time will come when gentlemen will find it to their own interest to take up this tariff and make the protection sufficient. Every civilized nation on earth has found it indispensable to her interest to protect her own industry by commercial regulations. England, the most civilized of all, has found it her interest to adopt the very principle of the amendment. France, and even Turkey, have done the same.

Sir, said Mr. C., I support this proposition for the same reasons as contained in the argument of my friend from Maine. Does any man believe that fifty per cent. is an adequate protection on woollens? No, sir; the protection is brought down to twenty per cent.; and when gentlemen come to me and say that this is a compromise, I answer, with my friend from Maine, that I will not vote for it, unless you will give me the fair twenty per cent.; and this cannot be done without adopting the principle of a home valuation. I do not vote for this bill because I think it better than the tariff of 1832, nor because I fear nullification or secession; but from a motive of concession, yielding my own opinions. But if southern gentlemen will not accept this measure in the spirit for which it was tendered, I have no reason to vote for it. I voted, said Mr. C., against the bill of '32, for the very reason that southern gentlemen declared that it was no concession; and I may vote against this for the same reasons. I thought it bad policy to pass the bill of '32. I thought it a bad bargain, and I think so now. I have no fear of nullification or secession; I am not to be intimidated by threats of southern gentlemen, that they will get a better bill at the next session. "Rebellion made young Harry Percy's spurs grow cold." I will vote for this measure as one of conciliation and compromise; but if the clause of the Senator from Kentucky is not inserted, I shall be compelled to vote against it. The protective system never can be abandoned; and I, for one, will not now, or at any time, admit the idea.

Mr. SMITH said he did not believe that frauds occurred by invoice, to the extent which the gentleman supposed. He knew that the greater portion of the merchants of this country did not commit fraud, though foreign agents might do it. If the bill should pass, he thought appraisers just as likely to commit frauds as merchants. Mr. S. concluded with a minute numerical estimate of the difference between home and foreign value.

Mr. DALLAS was opposed to the proposition from the committee, and agreed with Mr. CALHOUN. He would state briefly his objection to the proposition of the committee. Although he was from a State strongly disposed to maintain the protective policy, he labored under an impression, that if any thing could be done to conciliate the Southern States, it was his duty to go for a measure for that purpose; but he should not go beyond it. He could do nothing in this way, as representing his particular district of the country, but only for the general good. He could not agree to incorporate in the bill any principle which he thought erroneous or improper. He would sanction nothing in the bill as an abandonment of the principle of protection. Mr. D. then made a few remarks on home and foreign valuation, to show the ground of his objections to the amendment of Mr. CLAY, though it did not prevent his strong desire to compromise and conciliation.

The Tariff.

Mr. CLAY was delighted to hear the Senator express a disposition so favorable; he thought, with such a disposition, the measure could not fail, however great the practical difficulties. He thought it was premature to agitate now the details of a legislation which might take place nine years hence. The Senator from South Carolina had objected to the amendment on constitutional grounds. He thought he could satisfy him, and every Senator, that there was no objection from the constitution.

He asked if it was probable that a valuation in Liverpool could escape a constitutional objection, if a home valuation were unconstitutional? There was a distinction in the foreign value, and in the thing valued. An invoice might be made of articles at one price in one port of England, and in another port at another price. The price, too, must vary with the time. But all this could not affect the rule. There was a distinction which gentlemen did not observe, between the value and the rule of valuation; one of these might vary, while the other continued always the same. The rule was uniform with regard to direct taxation; yet the value of houses and lands of the same quality are very different in different places. One mode of home valuation was, to give the Government, or its officers, the right to make the valuation after the one which the importer had given. It would prevent fraud, and the rule would not violate the constitution. It was an error that it was unconstitutional; the constitution said nothing about it. It was absurd that all values must be established in foreign countries; no other country on earth should assume the right of judging. Objections had been made to leaving the business of valuation in the hands of a few executive officers; but the objections were at least equally great to leaving it in the hands of foreigners. He thought there was nothing in the constitutional objection, and hoped the measure would not be embarrassed by such objections.

Mr. FORSYTH was opposed to the Senate deciding a question for their successors. He was opposed to putting any thing into the bill which was bad in theory; but he thought no pledges could be given with regard to the future action of Congress.

Mr. SMITH made a further comparison between home and foreign valuation.

Mr. KANE objected to the home valuation, as necessarily at variance with the clause in the constitution, which requires that no preference should be made of one port over another.

Mr. SILSBEE entered largely into the details of the subject, and objected to the adoption of a system now, which would go into operation eight years hence.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he listened with great care to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, and other gentlemen, who had advocated the same side, in hopes of having his objection to the mode of valuation proposed in the amendment removed; but he must say, that the difficulties he first expressed still remained. Passing over what seemed to him to be a constitutional objection, he would direct his observation to what appeared to him to be its unequal operation. If by the home valuation be meant the foreign price, with the addition of freight, insurance, and other expenses at the port of destination, it is manifest that as these are unequal between the several ports in the Union—for instance, between the ports of New York and New Orleans—the duty must also be unequal in the same degree, if laid on value thus estimated. But if, by the home valuation be meant the prices current at the place of importation, then, in addition to the inequality already stated, there would have to be added the additional inequality resulting from the different rates of profits, and other circumstances, which must necessarily render prices very unequal in the several ports of this widely extended country. There would, in the same view, be another and a stronger objection, which he alluded to in his former remarks, which remained unanswered—that the duties themselves constitute part of the elements of the current prices of the imported articles; and that, to impose a duty on a valuation ascertained by the current prices, would be to impose, in reality, a duty upon a duty, and must necessarily produce that increased progression in duties, which he had already attempted to illustrate.

He knew it had been stated, in reply, that a system which would produce such absurd results could not be contemplated; that Congress, under the power of regulating, reserved in the amendment, would adopt some mode that would obviate these objections; and, if none such could be devised, that the provisions of the amendment would be simply useless. His difficulty was not removed by the answer to the objection. He was at a loss to understand what mode could be devised free from objection; and, as he wished to be candid and explicit, he felt the difficulty, as an honest man, to assent to a general measure, which, in all the modifications under which he had viewed it, was objectionable. He again repeated, that he regretted the amendment had been offered, as he felt a solicitude that the present controversy should be honorably and fairly terminated. It was not his wish that there should be a feeling of victory on either side. But, in thus expressing his solicitude for an adjustment, he was not governed by motives derived from the attitude which South Carolina occupied, and which the Senator from Delaware stated to influence him. He wished that Senator, as well as all others, to understand that that gallant and patriotic State was far from considering her situation as one requiring sympathy, and was equally far from desiring that any adjustment of this question should take place with the view of relieving her, or with any other motive than a regard to the general interests of the country. So far from requiring commiseration, she regarded her position with very opposite light, as one of high responsibility, and exposing her to no inconsiderable danger; but a position voluntarily and firmly assumed, with a full view of consequences, and which she was determined to maintain till the oppression under which she and the other Southern States were suffering was removed.

In wishing, then, to see a termination to the present state of things, he turned not his eyes to South Carolina, but to the general interests of the country. He did not believe it was possible to maintain our institutions and our liberty, under the continuance of the controversy which had for so long a time distracted us, and brought into conflict the two great sections of the country. He was in the last stage of madness who did not see, if not terminated, that this admirable system of ours, reared by the wisdom and virtue of our ancestors—virtue, he feared, which had fled forever—would fall under its shocks. It was to arrest this catastrophe, if possible, by restoring peace and harmony to the Union, that governed him in desiring to see an adjustment of the question.

Mr. CLAYTON said, this point had been discussed in the committee; and it was because this amendment was not adopted that he had withheld his assent from the bill.

The Tariff.

[SENATE.]

They had now but seven business days of this session remaining; and it would require the greatest unanimity, both in that body and in the other House, to pass any bill on this subject. Were gentlemen coming from the opposite extremes of the Union, and representing opposite interests, to agree to combine together, there would hardly be time to pass this bill into a law; yet if he saw that it could be done, he would gladly go on with the consideration of the bill, and with the determination to do all that could be done. The honorable member from South Carolina had found insuperable obstacles where he (Mr. C.) had found none. On their part, if they agreed to this bill, it would only be for the sake of conciliation; if South Carolina would not accept the measure in that light, then their motive for arrangement was at an end. He (Mr. C.) apprehended, however, that good might result from bringing the proposition forward at that time. It would be placed before the view of the people, who would have time to reflect and make up their minds upon it against the meeting of the next Congress. He did not hold any man as pledged by their action at this time. If the arrangement was found to be a proper one, the next Congress might adopt it. But, for the reasons he had already stated, he had little hope that any bill would be passed at this session; and, to go on debating it, day after day, would only have the effect of defeating the many private bills and other business which were waiting the action of Congress. He would therefore propose to lay the bill for the present on the table; if it were found, at a future period, before the expiration of the session, that there was a prospect of overcoming the difficulties which now presented themselves, and of acting upon it, the bill might be again taken up. If no other gentleman wished to make any observations on the amendment, he would move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BIBB requested the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion, whilst he (Mr. B.) offered an amendment to the amendment, having for its object to get rid of that interminable series of duties of which gentlemen had spoken.

Mr. CLAYTON withdrew his motion.

Mr. BIBB proceeded to say, that his design was to obviate the objection of the great increase that would arise from a system of home valuation. He hoped that something satisfactory would be done this session yet. He should vote for every respectable proposition calculated to settle the difficulty. He hoped there would be corresponding concessions on both sides; he wished much for the harmony of the country. It was well known that he (Mr. B.) was opposed to any tariff system other than one for revenue, and such incidental protection as that might afford. His hope was to strike out a middle course; otherwise, he would concur in the motion that had been made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] Mr. B. then submitted his amendment, to insert the words "before payment of," &c.

Mr. CLAY was opposed to the amendment, and he hoped his worthy colleague would withdraw it. If one amendment were offered and debated, another, and another would follow; and thus, the remaining time would be wasted. To fix any precise system would be extremely difficult at present. He only wished the principle to be adopted.

Mr. BIBB acceded to the wish of the Senator from Kentucky, and withdrew his amendment accordingly.

Mr. POINDEXTER expressed a hope that the measure would not be defeated by a difference on speculative points. If the principle was favorable to the South, as well as a general compromise between both parties, why not adopt it? It was for after legislation to arrange the details. The present measure should not thus be set aside; its beneficial effects would be felt throughout the Union.

Mr. TYLER was opposed to the principle of this home valuation. The duties would be taken into consideration in making the valuations; and thus, after going down hill for nine and a half years, we would as suddenly rise up again to prohibition. He complained that there were not merchants enough on this floor from the South; and, in this respect, the Northern States had the advantage. But satisfy me, said Mr. T., that the views of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] are not correct, and I shall vote for the proposition.

Mr. MOORE said he would move an amendment, which he hoped would meet the views of the gentlemen on the other side; it was to this effect:

Provided, That no valuation be adopted that will operate unequally in different ports of the United States.

Mr. BLACK made a few remarks in favor of this amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN also wished that the amendment would prevail, though he felt it would be ineffectual to counteract the inequality of the system. But he would raise no cavilling objections; he wished to act in perfect good faith; and he only wished to see what could be done.

Mr. HOLMES asserted, that every valuation that could be made would be the same in different ports. He instanced the port of New Orleans, and any of the northern ports, to show that the valuation might be twenty per cent. higher in the former place.

Mr. MOORE said he had this much to answer to the gentleman from Maine, when he expressed the wish that he had time to prove his position. The gentleman had already had ten years to prove the doctrine that high duties made low prices. The same doctrine was advanced on the passage of the first tariff, and yet scarcely a man in the country now believed it. He had, Mr. M. said, but two motives in offering the amendment to the amendment of the Senator. The first was, to get rid of the constitutional objections to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky; and the second was, to do justice to those he had the honor to represent. The honorable gentleman said that Mobile and New Orleans would not pay higher duties, because the goods imported there would be of more value; and this was the very reason, Mr. M. contended, why the duties would be higher. Did not every one see that if the same article was valued in New York at one hundred dollars, and in Mobile at one hundred and thirty-five dollars, the duty of twenty per cent. would be higher at the latter place? He had nothing but the spirit of compromise in view, and hoped gentlemen would meet him in the same spirit. He would now propose, with the permission of the Senator from Maine, to vary his motion, and offer a substitute in exact conformity with the language of the constitution. This proposition being admitted by general consent, Mr. Moore modified his amendment accordingly.

Mr. FORSYTH supported the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, and hoped it would meet the approbation of the Senate. It would get rid of all difficulty about words. No one, he presumed, wished to violate the constitution; and if the measure of the Senator from Kentucky was consistent with the constitution, it would prevail; if not, it would not be adopted.

After some further remarks from Messrs. SMITH, CALHOUN, CLAY, and MILLER,

Mr. HOLMES moved an adjournment.

Mr. MOORE hoped the question on the amendments, at least, would be taken that evening.

Mr. HOLMES and other gentlemen having expressed their objections,

Mr. MOORE asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, and they were accordingly ordered, when the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—Yeas 22, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate having resumed the bill to modify the act of 14th July, 1832, and all other laws imposing duties on imports, the question being on Mr. CLAY's amendment, providing that the proposed rate of duty payable after 1842 should be computed upon the value of merchandise at the port of importation,

Mr. HILL said, he regretted very much that the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] after having gratuitously extended the olive branch, after having been complimented by gentlemen who represented the "aggrieved South," and who could there allay the storm that had been raised by ambitious politicians for mercenary purposes, as a "pacificator" and "mediator," should snatch the cup from the lips of the friends of the Union by interposing an amendment. What is the object of this amendment? So far from affecting the present rate of duties, it does not touch an article for nearly ten years! Nor is it at all binding on any future Congress, let the principle be declared as it will. I could not, were I in any other place, believe gentlemen to be in earnest when they were contending for the points of difference between the bill as it stands, and the bill as it will stand when amended. It can be of no consequence here to discuss the point, whether the public interests will be better consulted by a "home valuation" ten years hence, or the valuation as now made. I consider the present valuation as virtually a home valuation: if not so, where is the use of appraisers in the several ports as now provided by law? If by the amendment the price of freight is to be added at the several ports; if the prices are to fluctuate from week to week, and from month to month, as goods are plenty or scarce, the amendment ought to be rejected, and no future Congress will regard our mandate for enforcing the adoption of its principles. If it intends the raising of the duties five, ten, or twenty per cent., the people will never suffer any Congress to adopt it.

Sir, I must confess that I do not like the principles of the bill with or without the amendment. I know the reduction is not as rapid as the public sentiment in my State calls for. The people of New Hampshire, for their own sakes, want a large reduction of the taxes on all articles which they consume, when those taxes are no longer needed for the support of the public expenses; they do not want to wait eight or ten years before that reduction shall take place so as to be felt. They will consider the reduction made in this bill as too slow; they will think the time too much extended; and they will not allow their Senators or Representatives to pledge the public faith that the reduction shall not be more rapid. The laboring farmers and mechanics of New England will not be pleased to learn that the duties on coarse woollens are to be raised, as they are by this bill, from five per cent. to fifty per cent. Nevertheless, for the sake of peace, for the gratification of their brethren of the South, they will even consent to make this sacrifice.

I was not more impressed than delighted to hear the Senator from South Carolina declare that he was satisfied with the reduction contained in this bill. We, in the North, having in view the peace of the country, will, for the present, be content to take any reduction that shall satisfy the South. We shall even be willing to do all in our power to make the system permanent, so the Senators from the South shall pledge their influence to put an end to the tremendous contest which threatens the dismemberment of this Government.

The amendment, I repeat, Mr. President, is too trifling to protract the passage of the bill for one moment. I am opposed to the amendment; but I will not, even should that be adopted, so the South shall be satisfied, for a moment hesitate to give the bill my support. If there be an intention in earnest to settle this question in this body in those several quarters where such intention has been declared, two days will not have gone over our heads before the bill shall pass this body. I will cheerfully support the bill, although, in doing this, I will not consent permanently to pledge myself to support the free trade principle. I will never consent permanently to give up that incidental protection which, without injury to the great whole, may be extended to useful interests that shall require the fostering aid of the Government.

Mr. SMITH (of Md.) said, the motion to amend by the word "uniform" was unnecessary. That was provided for by the constitution. "All duties must be uniform." An addition to the cost of goods of forty, fifty, or sixty per cent. would be uniform, but would not prevent fraud, nor the certainty of great inequality in the valuation in the several ports. The value of goods at New Orleans particularly, and at almost every other port, will be higher than at New York. I have not said that such mode was unconstitutional, nor have I said that it was impracticable; few things are so. But I have said, and do now say, that the mode is open to fraud, and more so than the present. At present the merchant enters his goods, and swears to the truth of his invoice. One package in every five or ten is sent to the public warehouse, and there carefully examined by two appraisers on oath. If they find fraud, or suspect fraud, then all the goods belonging to such merchants are sent to the appraisers; and if frauds be discovered, the goods are forfeited. No American merchant has ever been convicted of such fraud. Foreigners have even been severely punished by loss of their property. The laws are good and sufficiently safe as they now stand on our statutes. I wish no stronger; we know the one, we are ignorant how the other will work. Such a mode of valuation is unknown to any nation except Spain, where the valuation is arbitrary; and the goods are valued agreeably to the amount of the bribe given. This is perfectly understood and practised. It is in the nature of such mode of valuation to be arbitrary. No rule can be established that will make such mode uniform throughout the Union, and some of the small ports will value low to bring business to their towns. A scene of connivance and injustice will take place that no law can prevent.

The merchant will be put to great inconvenience by the mode proposed. All his goods must be sent to the public warehouses, and there opened piece by piece; by which process they will sustain essential injury. The goods will be detained from the owners for a week or a month, or still more, unless you have one or two hundred appraisers in New York, and proportionately in other ports; thus increasing patronage; and with such a host, can we expect either uniformity or equality in the valuation? All will not be honest, and the Spanish mode will be adopted. One set of appraisers, who value low, will have a priority. In fact, if this mode should ever be adopted, it will cause great discontent, and must soon be changed. As all understand the cause to be to flatter the manufacturers with a plan which they think will be beneficial to them, but which, we all know, can never be realized, it is deception on its face, as is almost the whole of the bill now under our consideration.

Mr. President, whilst I am up, I will, with your permission, take a view of the bill, as it appears to me. Indeed, sir, it is not easy to be understood. We have not had time to consider it as we ought. Our minds have all been occupied on another great subject. When first read, I thought it was a biennial deduction of one-tenth of the whole duties levied by the act of 1832; but I find that it only deducts the excess between twenty per cent., the lowest point, and the highest duty in force by that act. Hurried as I have been, I last night made a synopsis of a few of the articles. I had not time to make more. The first I shall notice is woollens. Agreeably to the bill, the duties on that article are to remain subject to its present duty of fifty per cent. until the last of December; and to those paying that duty are to be added all those under a cost of thirty-five cents the square yard, which, under the act of 1832, were to pay only a duty of five per cent.—thus levying an excess of forty-five per cent. on the laboring class—in fact, on the poor, and on the masters of the laborers of the South; for with that description are the slaves clothed. I presume that two-thirds of the whole amount raised from that kind of goods will fall on the owners of slaves; nor is the amount a trifle. Agreeably to a report on our table, the value of those goods imported in 1831 amounted to one million and fifty thousand dollars. The additional duty imposed by this bill would amount to nearly half a million. It will greatly exceed that sum in the importation of 1833. I know it will, and we all know that it will. For the low duty will have increased importation longer than usual of that description of woollens. I now, Mr. President, proceed to my synopsis. During the whole of the present year, 1833, the duty on woollens will remain at fifty per cent., being the duty imposed by the act of 1832; of course, no lessening whatever of the revenue. After December next, the duty will be forty-seven per cent. until the 20th of September, 1835, when it will be forty-four per cent., and will continue at that rate until the 20th of September, 1837: from which day, until the same day in 1839, it will be forty-one per cent., and continue at that rate until the same day in 1839, when it will fall to thirty-eight per cent.; and remain at that until the same day in 1841, when it will fall to twenty-nine per cent.; and remain at twenty-nine per cent. until the same day in 1842, when it will be reduced to its ultimate rate of twenty per cent., and there remain stationary.

The Tariff.

[SENATE.]

It will be seen, Mr. President, that during the whole of the present year, the enormous duty of fifty per cent. on woollens will remain; that it drops every two years, until the 20th of September, 1841, being eight years, down to thirty-eight per cent. That duty is too high, and more than necessary to a fair protection. The people are then to be saddled with those enormous duties for eight years. What for, sir? I ask—for revenue? Oh, no, don't say so; we all know that it is for protection—avowed by the chairman; he has been fair and open, and has so declared, that it is for protection, and that alone; and yet South Carolina and all the South vote for the bill, completely relinquishing the principle against which South Carolina stands ready to go to the death against the Government, and has actually prepared for war. The reason assigned is conciliation. That is, we are to be whipped into the passage of a bill which few, if any, approve, to gratify South Carolina. And will she be conciliated by this bill? We have no reason to believe so from any of her publications. Her ultimatum is far, very far different. She will not be satisfied unless she has begun to think that she has gone too far, and is quite willing to retrace her steps. If she shall be satisfied by the bill, it will only show that she is easily reconciled, and makes no sacrifice of any thing but principle—and that costs no money.

I remember well, that a friend of mine from North Carolina had no great objection to the act of 1832, except to the high duty on woollens; but stated in his place that he would vote against the bill, because the principle of protection was retained in it; and, sir, the present Govern-nor of South Carolina said that he would vote for no bill in which the principle of protection was to be found. Now, sir, this bill contains that principle from the beginning to the end; and the chairman [Mr. CLAY] has fairly and honestly told the gentlemen from the South that they must so understand it. I, Mr. President, have no objection to discriminating duties that shall incidentally give protection to our manufactures, and which are necessary to our revenue. I am, in principle, a friend to the manufacturers. I voted against the act of 1824 and 1828, because I thought that excessive protection would cause a reaction, and so I said. I opposed the duty of fifty per cent. on woollens in the act of 1832, because it was excessive. Had the duty in the bill of thirty-five per cent. been retained, the tariff would have been a good one, and there would have been little of complaint. We would now have nothing more to do than to have proportionately reduced it, so as to lessen the revenue to the wants of the Government. In a speech I made on the tariff of 1832, I warned the tariff men not to persist in the course they were pursuing. I then hinted at that which has happened, without effect; the tariff men would not bend to circumstances. We now see some of them crouching to the whip that has been raised over them; and the apology to themselves is, that at a future day they may be able to regain that which they have lost; and with that they expect to gull the manufacturers. The Southrons flatter themselves that this is only an entering wedge, and that the next Congress will take up the subject, and reduce the duty on woollens to thirty, twenty-five, or some think even to twenty per cent. I believe that the manufacturers want a tariff that they might calculate on as being permanent, and that all would be satisfied with thirty per cent., and many of them with twenty-five per cent; either of which would have my concurrence. If I had been on the committee, I would have proposed to reduce the duty on woollens five per cent. per annum for four years, and have stopped at thirty per cent.; or for five years, which would have brought the duty down to twenty-five per cent.; either of which the manufacturers would have considered permanent, and they would have been content; especially if the duty on wool had been reduced, so that they might have had the raw material as low as in England.

Mr. President, I will now notice a few other articles. Lead is a prominent article—one indispensable in time of war; this bill destroys most completely the miners of that article. Assuming that lead costs four cents per pound in England, the present duty being three cents per pound, would be equal to seventy-five per cent.; the excess above twenty per cent. would then be fifty-five per cent.; and the reduction would be, after 1833, two cents seven-eighths mills; after 1835, two cents five-sixths mills; after 1837, two cents three-fourths mills; after 1839, two cents one-half mills; after 1841, one cent four-sixths mills; and after 1842, to eight-tenths, or the twelfth part of a cent per pound.

ON SUGAR.—Assuming the price abroad to be three cents per pound, the duty being three cents per pound, would be equal to one hundred per cent. The excess would then be one hundred per cent., and the reduction thus: After 1833, two cents seven-sixths mills; after 1835, two cents two-fifths mills; after 1837, two cents two-eighths mills; after 1839, two cents four mills; after 1841, one cent three-sevenths mills; and after 1842, six-tenths mills, or one-sixteenth of a cent. The duty levied on sugar by the act of 1832 is two and one-half cents. In 1835, it will by this bill be about the same, and after that it lessens to two cents, and goes down in 1842 to little more than half a cent. The parties have pledged themselves that this bill shall be permanent; if so, what will become of the sugar plantations? and yet the Senators from Louisiana vote for this bill, which will bring ruin on the sugar planter, under the vain hope held out to them by the Senator [Mr. CLAY] that a reaction will happen; not reflecting that they by their vote allow that the planters can sustain themselves against Cuba with a protection of little more than half a cent per pound. No reaction can help them.

ON HEMP.—Assuming that hemp costs in Russia one hundred and fifty dollars per ton, the duty being forty dollars per ton, would be equal to twenty-six and two-thirds per cent.; the excess of which over twenty would be six and two-thirds per cent., or ten dollars; and the reduction thus, taking one-tenth the excess: After 1833, thirty-nine dollars; after 1835, thirty-eight dollars; after 1837, thirty-seven dollars; after 1839, thirty-six dollars; after 1841, thirty-three dollars; and after 1842, thirty dollars: a full and fair protection, of which Kentucky ought not to complain.

Mr. President, these are all the items which I have particularly considered; yet there are a number of manufactures equally exposed to ruin. Coal from the mines will suffer severely. The duty on it will be reduced to about two cents from six the bushel. The ironmasters will be ruined; for the duty on rolled iron will be only six dollars the ton, and on hammered twelve dollars. All our distilleries will suffer; for the duty on rum, brandy, and gin will not exceed ten cents the gallon; and yet the high priest of the American system has abandoned all those great objects to inevitable ruin; and what for? I leave to every man who thinks, what may be the true consideration. I omitted gunpowder, which, with all the material for war, will pay little duty.

Remember, Mr. President, that the Senators from Kentucky and South Carolina [Mr. CLAY and Mr. CALHOUN] have declared this bill (if it should become a law) to be permanent, and that no honorable man who shall vote for it can ever attempt a change; yet, sir, the pressure against it will be such at the next session that Congress will be compelled to revise it; and as the storm may then have passed over Congress, a new Congress, with better feelings, will be able to act with more deliberation, and may pass a law that will be generally approved. Nearly all agree that this bill is a bad bill. A similar opinion prevailed on the passage of the tariff of 1828, and yet it passed, and caused all our present danger and difficulties. All admit that the act of 1828, as it stands on our statutes, is constitutional. But the Senator [Mr. CALHOUN] has said that it is unconstitutional, because of the motive under which it passed; and he said that that motive was protection to the manufacturers. How, sir, I ask, are we to know the motives of men? I thought then, and think now, that the approaching election for President tended greatly to the enactments of the acts of 1824 and 1828; many of my friends thought so at the time. I have somewhere read of the minister of a King or Emperor in Asia, who was anxious to be considered a man of truth, and always boasted of his veracity. He hypocritically prayed to God that he might always speak the truth. A Genii appeared and told him that his prayer had been heard, touched him with his spear, and said, hereafter you will speak truth on all occasions. The next day he waited on his Majesty and said, Sire, I intended to have assassinated you yesterday, but was prevented by the nod of the officer behind you, who is to kill you to-morrow. The result I will not mention. Now, Mr. President, if the same Genii was to touch with his spear each of the Senators who voted for the act of 1828, and an interrogator was appointed, he would ask, what induced you to give that vote? Why, sir, I acted on sound principles. I believe that it is the duty of every good Government to promote the manufactures of the nation; all historians eulogize the Kings who have done so, and censure those Kings who have neglected them. I refer you to the history of Alfred. It is known that the staple of England was wool, which was sent to Flanders to be exchanged for cloths. The civil wars, by the invasions of that nation, kept them long dependent on the Flemings for the cloths they wore. At length a good King governed; and he invited Flemish manufacturers to England, and gave them great privileges. They taught the youth of England, the manufacture succeeded, and now England supplies all the world with woollen cloth. The interrogator asked another the same questions. His answer might have been, that he thought the passing of the law would secure the votes of the manufacturers in favor of his friend who wanted to be the President. Another answer might have been, a large duty was imposed on an article which my constituents raised; and I voted for it, although I disliked all the residue of the bill. Sir, the motives, no doubt, were different that induced the voting for that bill, and were, as we all know, not confined to the protective system. Many voted on political grounds, as many will on this bill, and as they did on the enforcing bill. We cannot declare a bill unconstitutional, because of the motives that may govern the voters. It is idle to assign such a cause for the part that is now acting in South Carolina. I know, Mr. President, that no argument will have any effect on the passage of this bill. The high contracting parties have agreed. But I owed it to myself to make these remarks.

Mr. FOOT said, this was a measure of compromise, and he hoped it would be considered and disposed of as such.

Mr. HOLMES expressed a hope that the conflicting interests of the country would be reconciled. He said that if that bill should be passed, under any modification, and the votes of the South should be found against the bill, he would himself move a reconsideration of the vote, with a view to lay the bill on the table, or to postpone it. He would not sacrifice any interests of the North and the East, unless such sacrifice was to be received in a proper spirit by the South.

Mr. WRIGHT said, besides the original amendment, there was also a modification of it pending, offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MOORE.] He thought there could be no objection to adopt the modification, as the amendment itself would still be open for rejection. There had been a constitutional objection raised against the principle of the amendment. He thought it was not liable to any constitutional objection. By the provision in the constitution that all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States, he understood it to mean, that when a duty is imposed in one port, the same is to be imposed in another, no matter how adopted; that the laws regulating it are to be the same; that the laws regulating charges, insurances, exchanges, &c. that shall enter into the one, shall enter into the other. This was all that he understood by the provision that all imposts shall be uniform. But we are told, said Mr. W., that the amendment would be unconstitutional, because those various charges will not be the same in every port. But the provision of the constitution, under any circumstances, could not meet these contingencies; exchange may this week be higher in New Orleans, in the next week higher in New York. Insurances must also fluctuate at different seasons of the year; at one period freight may be higher from Liverpool to New York, or any other port, than at another; because it may not be the season for return cargoes. These were contingencies that could never be obviated, and must always exist. On the constitutional question, it was also objected, "that no preferences shall be given to one port over another;" and gentlemen tell us that freight will be higher in New Orleans than in New York; that, consequently, the valuation of duties must be higher. But would this be the result of any law Congress might enact? I answer, assuredly not. Even pass a law making duties free, the same contingencies must arise. As regarded the measure itself, he would express his anxiety that Congress should pass some law this session, that will operate as a compromise between conflicting interests; and he would say that this was his sincere desire. He had already mentioned his views of the constitutional objections raised to the amendment; but he would add, that other difficulties presented themselves to his mind. He would ask what would be the practical effect of adopting a system of home valuation? What could be the standard of judging along our extended coast?

He must say that no standard could be fixed that must not vary materially. Mr. W. referred to the difficulty at this day, of fixing any standard in the single city of New York, from the various interests that arose under the auction system and others; and held, when this difficulty arose in one city, the more extended it was, the more must those difficulties increase. Another difficulty, in which he concurred, was presented by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] that it would cause a general competition to bring the valuation lower in one place than another; and the result would be, that the valuation would be lower than the real intrinsic worth. From the fluctuations of trade, it would be impossible to fix any thing like a correct home valuation; thus would the foreign be preferable. Mr. W. further held, that this competition to reduce the valuation would produce an excess of importation; that, consequently, the price of home manufactures must fall in proportion; and that the effect would be injurious to the manufacturers themselves. He was opposed to the principle of pledging their successors; he would say for himself that he should not consider it as binding, and that it appeared to him to be a clause of only a pugatory character.

Mr. HOLMES replied to the objections which had been urged against the amendment by the Senator from New York. He suggested various difficulties and hardships which would result from the foreign valuation, and which far outweighed those which had been advanced against the home valuation. He stated that there was no other commercial nation in the world which adopted the rule on which we have acted in this respect.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he held the home valuation to be, to any extent, impracticable; and that it was unprecedented, and unknown in any legislation. Both the home and foreign valuation ought to be excluded as far as possible, and specific duties should be resorted to. This keeping out of view specific duties, and turning us back to the principle of a valuation, was, in his view, the great vice of this bill. In England five out of six, or nine out of ten articles, pay specific duties, and the valuation is on the remnant. Among the articles which pay ad valorem duties in England are silk goods, which are imported either from India, whence they are brought to one port only; or from Europe, in which case there is a specific and an ad valorem duty; and the officer has the option to take either the one or the other. He suggested that the Senate, before they adopted the ad valorem principle, should look to the effects on the importation of the country.

He took a view of the iron trade, to show that evil would result to that branch from a substitution of the ad valorem for the specific system of duties. He admitted himself to be unable to comprehend the elements of a home valuation, and mentioned cases where it would be impossible to find an accurate standard of valuation of this character. The plan was impracticable and illusory.

Mr. W. then made some remarks on the views taken by the Senators from Delaware and Maine in support of the amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON said, in answer to a remark of Mr. WEBSTER, that, in fixing a home valuation, it was not his meaning to make a proposition to a future Congress, but a law. When the duty will be twenty per cent., it is to be assessed at the port where it is delivered. He held a home valuation to be not only practicable, but highly important; without which, he would not vote for the bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells us, however, that he thinks it wholly impracticable; he even goes so far as to say that it is unprecedented, unknown in history. I ask him, what nation in Europe has not adopted it?

[Mr. WEBSTER said, he meant that the practice of laying a general ad valorem valuation was unprecedented.]

It is urged, continued Mr. C., both by the Senators from Massachusetts and New York, that there can be no uniformity on home valuation. We are told that importations will be mostly made to that place where the price is lowest, in order to avoid the higher duties. Sir, will not importers take their goods where they can get the highest price, and, of course, where the duties will be highest on a home valuation? To complete the system now is not possible; but I will suggest to the gentlemen so much as to show that there is nothing impracticable in the attempt to make the assessment uniform. We may suppose some such plan as that practised in Turkey. There the duties are taken in kind. If that plan should be adopted, there can be no doubt of its uniformity. I do not urge the Government to take this plan; but I adduce it as a proof that there may be uniformity.

Sir, will goods go where the price is the lowest? They will go, on the contrary, where the most can be got for them, and, consequently, where Government will derive most from their sale. I am willing to trust the whole subject of reducing to a standard of value to a future Congress; but I shall not vote for the bill without the principle of a home valuation; it is most important to this country; and I consider it important, not only on my own judgment, but the judgment of others on whom I can depend; it is all important to introduce the principle into the legislation of this country.

I said I would go for this bill only for the sake of concession. The Senator from South Carolina can tell whether it is likely to be received as such, and to attain the object proposed; if not, I have a plain course to pursue; I am opposed to the bill. Unless I can obtain for the manufacturers the assurance that the principle of the bill will not be disturbed, and that it will be received in the light of a concession, I shall oppose it.

Mr. CLAY said, he did not rise to throw himself into the discussion which had been so much prolonged, but to ask every Senator, in candor—and he believed they all acted in that feeling—whether it was right to go forward to the year 1842, and take up and discuss a thousand difficulties that may or may not then arise. Say, sir, the House is in a conflagration; will it be said, don't put out the fire, because the like may occur ten years hence? We want peace: no, you shall not have it for ten years hence; another war may arise. We want to terminate all differences: no, you shall not, for ten years hence we may be involved in new ones. The worthy Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] said he was opposed to the present measure, but that the tariff bill of 1832 was a good one.

[Mr. SMITH made a remark on the want of permanency of the measure.]

Mr. C. presumed that no human policy could be so considered. If the tariff bill of 1832 were a good one, the present one could not be bad. It had also been said that no other country had adopted a general ad valorem system. This might be true; but does the present do so? Not for ten years hence. It leaves the minimums precisely as in the bill of last year, and the specific duties are left till the year 1842. He had little doubt on his mind but against that period, lead, spirits, and Virginia coal would be subjected to specific duties. But is it necessary for us now to legislate for what may be then requisite? The object of the present measure was to conciliate conflicting interests, and to preserve the manufacturer till that period. He was persuaded that lead, and the other articles he had mentioned, could not exist at a duty under twenty per cent.; but no one could tell what might be necessary ten years after this. He was inclined to think, that, at that time, specific duties would, in certain cases, be found necessary. In the original draught of his bill he had left cotton free after the year 1842; and, in doing this, his object was to get the South to adopt a system that would be beneficial to all. Gentlemen had argued that it was impracticable to come to an ad valorem duty; but we did not do so, and why not leave that to the wisdom of the Congress of that day? He did not rise to prolong the discussion, but to implore the Senate to decide on the question before them at once. Too much time had already been wasted. The question was simple—let us go into it. It is merely, shall we adopt the modification of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MOON], to make the valuation uniform? Let us vote on that, and then we shall come to the vote on the other. For himself, he should vote against the gentleman's proposition; for he thought it of no use. If his own amendment, though, were adopted, it would leave the principle open to future legislation.

The question was then taken on Mr. MOON's amendment, when it was negatived; eleven voted in its favor, the majority not counted.

Mr. DICKERSON gave a brief history of the duties since the commencement of the Government, and the effects of valuations; and alluded particularly to additions of ten and twenty per cent., which had been formerly added to the foreign value, but had lately been repealed. He desired a valuation much greater than what it now is, as it now induces the people to believe that they have more protection than they receive. He did not so much object to the regulation of home valuation, though he thought it incorrect; yet he preferred the addition of ten and twenty per cent., because the substitute was more unequal. It would not hurt the manufacturers, but it would embarrass the importers. The Senator from Kentucky had represented the home valuation of the bill as no more than a principle; others, as a mere proposition to a future Congress. He was unwilling to part with the substantial interest of his constituents, either for a proposition or a principle.

Mr. D. then moved to strike out the word "law," at the end of the first section, and insert the words, "the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States."

Mr. CLAY was opposed to the amendment. He doubted their constitutional power to refer such a duty to the President and his Secretary. The object of his own original amendment was, to leave it to a future Congress, to act, in detail, on the principle of the amendment. It would be necessary to have many appraisers to carry out the principle of Mr. D.'s amendment, and, after all, it would, in its operation, be the same as his own. The gentleman undertakes to make out the details now; or worse, to refer it to the President and his Secretary. Mr. C. would be glad to go into details now; but there would not be time.

Mr. BUCKNER said he was opposed to the amendment of Mr. DICKERSON, for the reasons assigned by the Senator from Kentucky. He was not willing to leave the adjustment of this matter to any branch of the Government other than the National Legislature. The whole object of this bill, as he understood it, was to calm the unquiet and agitated state of the country; but if this amendment, said he, take effect, we shall leave the question as unsettled as when we commenced it. He objected to the amendment, because it was throwing a responsibility on the Executive and his Secretary, and, in consequence, giving a patronage which he, for one, was not disposed to sanction by his vote. While up, he must, he said, be permitted to make one or two remarks respecting the range the debate had taken. The proposition to amend of the gentleman from Kentucky had drawn forth a lengthened discussion, at which he confessed he was surprised. A discussion entirely useless, and worse than useless, and, if not producing irritation, at least consuming the precious time of action, had ensued on a proposition amounting to nothing more than a mere expression of opinion. The Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from Delaware, Mr. B. said, both seemed to understand the proposition differently; and, according to their construction, each in his own way, the adoption of the system of a home valuation would, in his (Mr. B.'s) opinion, operate as a fraud on both parties. If the Senator from Delaware was right, Mr. B. said, there would be no reduction of duties, for that gentleman urged the amendment to counteract the reduction contemplated by the bill. This being so, Mr. B. asked if the complaining South would receive any thing, should the amendment be adopted? Would the South receive it as a concession? If the object of a home reduction was to make up the amount of the valuation proposed, Mr. B. asked if there could be any benefits resulting from this intended measure of compromise and conciliation? If, on the other hand, the amendment is not to be considered as a positive law, what is its value? Is it a mere idle, unprofitable expression of our opinions, which after generations may or may not take, that has given rise to so lengthy a discussion? This kind of legislation ought not to be attempted, by which one party or the other must necessarily be deceived. Whilst the Southern gentlemen receive this bill as a compromise, the Northern gentlemen support it, because of a clause which will counteract the reduction contemplated. Mr. B. asked what would be the effect of putting in the amendment? If this home valuation should be adopted by a future Congress, and operated so as to produce no material reduction, the South would be disappointed; and, if not adopted, the manufacturers will be disappointed and discontented. The amendment appeared to Mr. B. to be entirely protective and unnecessary, and he was surprised that it had elicited so much discussion. When the time came for a future Congress to act on this subject, it would then, and then only, be proper to consider whether or not any system of valuations would be unequal or otherwise. Mr. B. said, if he were called upon then to make the principle of the amendment at once the law of the land, he would not hesitate to vote against it. If he were called upon to give a mere idle opinion on an abstract proposition, as advice to after generations, he would give his opinion that the proposition was wrong in principle. But as the bill itself was intended as a measure of compromise and conciliation, to give peace, harmony, and tranquillity to an unquiet country, he should vote for it, whether it contained this useless proposition or not. He would not, he said, reject the great benefits to be derived from the bill, because gentlemen differing from himself and others contended for a mere abstract theory. He was astonished that gentlemen from the South, who favored a reduction, should hesitate in supporting a measure looking to that end, because it contained an argument which, in legal parlance, should be stricken from the record as irrelevant.

Mr. B., in conclusion, said, he was not in the habit of disguising his opinions. He never should regret his early impressions, which were so strongly in favor of fostering and protecting our domestic industry, and of rendering us, in every sense of the term, free and independent of foreign nations. But he was not prepared to say whether, in adjusting the last tariff, we had not strained the matter a little too far, or whether some injustice had not been done by it. He was, therefore, willing to enter into a re-examination of the subject, and, as far as his judgment went, to do what was right and proper for the best interests of the country. While he was actuated by a strong desire to conciliate the conflicting interests which agitated the country, and influenced by the purest patriotism, he was willing to accord the same motives to others who differed with him; and he was therefore prepared to enter on the decision of the question in a spirit of concession, compromise, harmony, peace, and good will.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he would make but a single remark on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. It was held that the inequality and the impracticability of adopting a home valuation was such, that any wisdom in Congress could not meet it; and yet it was proposed, by this new amendment, to confide that which the concentrated wisdom of the country found impracticable to one or two of the executive officers. He believed that the question was one of great difficulty, but he did not believe it impossible. He would not undertake to say but that, in time, the difficulties that now presented themselves could be obviated. Mr. S. said there was an example of this kind in his own section of the country. A controversy there arose, which had nearly reached insurrection, relative to the new disposition of the lands on the subject of their new boundaries. The difference was thought irremediable for years; but when the parties met to whom its settlement belonged, it was discussed; matured in time; and, finally, a law was fixed that put an end to every difficulty. He did not attach such great importance to this question, at present, as other Senators seemed to do: he looked upon it merely as forming a part of the compromise. He was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, but in favor of the original one.

Mr. DICKERSON replied to the objections that were urged: he was against the recognition of the principle as it stood in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAYTON did not consider the amendment as at all an abandonment of the principle of protection; he viewed it, too, not in the light of a proposition, but a law. He would not give the power of regulating the valuation to the President and his Secretary; for if they should be opposed to protection, it was giving them too much power over the principle. His object was, not to raise the duties above twenty per cent., but to have an actual and not a nominal duty at that amount.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that on many articles five per cent. is as much protection as twenty per cent. They could oppose foreign competition as well under the one as the other. Either must produce ruin to the manufacturers.

Mr. HOLMES should support the bill only because it proposed a truce for eight years, and provided the basis for a treaty to be carried into effect at the expiration of ten years. As one of the elements of the treaty, he was anxious that the original amendment should prevail. The proposition to amend was altogether useless.

The question was taken on Mr. DICKERSON's motion, which was lost without a division.

The question was stated on Mr. CLAY's amendment.

Mr. WILKINS said, if it had been his intention to have voted against the amendment, he should have remained silent; but, after the explicit declaration of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] of the reason of his vote, and believing himself that the amendment would have a different construction from that given it by the gentleman, he (Mr. W.) would as expressly state, that he would vote on the question with the impression that it would not hereafter be expounded by the declaration of any Senator on this floor, but by the plain meaning of the words in the text.

Mr. BENTON objected to the home valuation, as tending to a violation of the constitution of the United States, and cited the following clause: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and ex-cises; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." All uniformity of duties and imposts, he contended, would be destroyed by this amendment. No human judgment could fix the value of the same goods at the same rate, in all the various ports of the United States. If the same individual valued the goods in every port, and every cargo in every port, he would commit innumerable errors and mistakes in the valuation; and, according to the diversity of these errors and mistakes, would be the diversity in the amount of duties and imposts laid and collected in the different ports. But it would not be the judgment of one individual that would make all these valuations, but the judgments of hundreds would be required. New York alone would require scores; other ports a number proportionate to their business; and no port could be trusted with less than two, however insignificant its importations might be. Admitting every appraiser to be skilful, diligent, and honest, it would be impossible but that the grossest variations, in assessing the values of the same goods, must take place in the different ports of the United States, and even in the same ports on different days and different cargoes. But it would be impossible that all the appraisers should be skilful, and especially that they should be skilled in the value of all the infinite variety of commodities which the genius of the artist fabricates in the four quarters of the globe, and which the enterprise of the merchant brings into the United States. So far from this universal, and almost miraculous skill, in all the appraisers, it would turn out, in practice, that many of them would be mere ignoramuses, worked into office by the power and influence of friends, and totally destitute of the knowledge which the place required. Even those who were skilful in one class of commodities might be ignorant of another; the man who was a judge of cotton goods might know nothing of woollens; he that was acquainted with brandies might know nothing of wines; the nice critic in fancy goods might be wholly ignorant of hardware; and so on throughout the whole list of the importations. With or without skill, it would be impossible that every appraiser, in so large a number, should be diligent and faithful. Some may be too indolent and indifferent to take upon themselves the laborious examinations which are indispensable to the formation of correct judgment; some may lack principle, and take a douceur from the importer to value his goods low, and depress the duty; or take the same douceur from the manufacturers, to value them high, and enhance the duties. Some may take one rule, and some another, for fixing valuations; some may consult invoices; some may go to auctioneers; some to men in business; others to men out of business; and some may consult nobody, but rely upon the view of their own eyes, the touch of their own fingers, and the taste of their own tongues, for the quality and value of every thing that comes in their way. Such must be the appraisers; and in such hands an infinite diversity of values must be placed upon the same goods in different ports, and a corresponding diversity must accrue in the amount of duties and imposts levied and collected upon them.

Mr. B. objected to the home valuation, because it would destroy the effect, and turn into a mere illusion the ultimate reduction to twenty per cent., which the bill proposed, and which was the only inducement with anti-tariff members for bearing with the heavy duties which are to be kept up for the first seven years which the bill had to run. He did not believe the reduction would ever come down to twenty per cent.; but if it should, the home valuation attached immediately, and converted that twenty into about thirty! The difference of the home and the foreign value would be about one-third in the northern ports, and one-half in the southern ports; consequently, the basis of calculation would be enlarged one-third, or one-half; but the difference, in fact, would be still greater. It is openly, publicly, repeatedly, and ostentatiously proclaimed on this floor, by the friends of the bill, that twenty per cent. upon the home valuation is more than thirty per cent. on the value! Assume it at thirty, and what will be the result? On one hundred millions of importations, the Government will receive thirty millions of revenue instead of twenty; on every hundred dollars' worth of goods, the consumer will pay thirty dollars tax instead of twenty! Both, as a reduction of revenue to the Government, and as a reduction of tax to the consumer, the valuation contradicts the ultimate point and main object of the bill, and renders it wholly deceptive and illusory.

SENATE.]

The Tariff.

Mr. B. objected to the home valuation, because it would be injurious, and almost fatal to the southern ports. He confined his remarks to New Orleans. The standard of valuation would be fifteen or twenty per cent. higher in New Orleans than in New York, and other northern ports. All importers will go to the northeastern cities, to evade high duties at New Orleans; and that great emporium of the West will be doomed to sink into a mere exporting city, while all the money which it pays for exports must be carried off and expended elsewhere for imports. Without an import trade no city can flourish, or even furnish a good market for exports. It will be drained of its effective cash, and deprived of its legitimate gains, and must languish far in the rear of what it would be if enriched with the profits of an import trade. As an exporter, it will buy; as an importer, it will sell. All buying and no selling must impoverish cities as well as individuals. New Orleans is now a great exporting city; she exports more domestic productions than any city in the Union; her imports have been increasing for some years; and, with fair play, would soon become next to New York, and furnish the whole valley of the Mississippi with its immense supplies of foreign goods; but, under the influence of a home valuation, it must lose a greater part of the import trade which it now possesses. In that loss its wealth must decline; its capacity to purchase produce for exportation must decline; and as the western produce must go there at all events, every western farmer will suffer a decline in the value of his own productions in proportion to the decline of the ability of New Orleans to purchase it. It was as a western citizen that he pleaded the cause of New Orleans, and objected to this measure of home valuation, which was to have the most baleful effects upon her prosperity.

Mr. B. further objected to the home valuation on account of the great additional expense it would create; the amount of patronage it would confer; the rivalry it would beget between importing cities; and the injury it would occasion to merchants from the detention and handling of their goods; and concluded with saying, that the home valuation was the most obnoxious feature ever introduced into the tariff acts; that it was itself equivalent to a separate tariff of ten per cent.; that it had always been resisted, and successfully resisted, by the anti-tariff interest in the highest and most palmy days of the American system, and ought not now to be introduced when that system is admitted to be nodding to its fall; when its death is actually fixed for the 30th day of June, 1842, and when the restoration of harmonious feelings is proclaimed to be the whole object of this bill.

Mr. ROBBINS then offered an amendment, which, in substance, provided, that unless this regulation (i. e. a home valuation) shall not be established by Congress, on or before the year 1842, the bill should cease to have effect, and be superseded by the tariff of 1832.

This amendment was also rejected without a division.

The question being then about to be taken on Mr. CLAY's amendment,

Mr. CALHOUN remarked, that the question being now about to be put on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, it became necessary for him to determine whether he should vote for or against it. He must be permitted again to express his regret that the Senator had thought proper to move it. His objection still remained strong against it; but as it seemed to be admitted, on all hands, that the fate of the bill depended on the fate of the amendment, feeling as he did a solicitude to see the question terminated, he had made up his mind, not, however, without much hesitation, not to interpose his vote against the adoption of the amendment; but, in voting for it, he wished it to be distinctly understood, he did it upon two conditions: first, that no valuation would be adopted that should come in conflict with the provision in the constitution which declares that duties, excises, and imposts shall be uniform; and in the next place, that none would be adopted which would make the duties themselves a part of the element of a home valuation. He felt himself justified in concluding that none such would be adopted; as it had been declared by the supporters of the amendment that no such regulation was contemplated; and, in fact, he could not imagine that any such could be contemplated, whatever interpretation might be attempted hereafter to be given to the expression of the home market. The first could scarcely be contemplated, as it would be in violation of the constitution itself; nor the latter, as it would, by necessary consequence, restore the very duties which it was the object of this bill to reduce, and would involve the glaring absurdity of imposing duties on duties, taxes on taxes. He wished the reporters for the public press to notice particularly what he said, as he intended his declaration to be part of the proceedings.

Believing, then, for the reasons which he had stated, that it was not contemplated that any regulation of the home valuation should come in conflict with the provisions of the constitution which he had cited, nor involve the absurdity of laying taxes upon taxes, he had made up his mind to vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH said, any declaration of the views and motives under which any individual Senator might now vote could have no influence in 1842; they would be forgotten long before that time had arrived. The law must rest upon the interpretation of its words alone.

Mr. CALHOUN said he could not help that; he should endeavor to do his duty.

Mr. CLAYTON said there was certainly no ambiguity whatever in the phraseology of the amendment. In advocating it, he had desired to deceive no man; he sincerely hoped no one would suffer himself to be deceived by it.

The amendment of Mr. CLAY, fixing the principle of home valuation as a part of the bill, was then adopted by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wilkins.—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickenson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wright.—16.

Mr. TYLER expressed a strong desire that some gentlemen would move to expunge that part of the bill which proposed to increase the duties upon plains, kerseys, and Kendal cottons from five per cent. to fifty per cent. He was not inclined to make the motion without learning the sentiments of other gentlemen upon it; but it was a subject in which the planters of Virginia had a deep interest.

Mr. SMITH moved an amendment, to effect the wishes of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TYLER.]

Mr. CLAY remarked, that if Mr. SMITH's amendment

FEB. 23, 1833.]

The Tariff.

[SENATE.]

was adopted, the duty would not be twenty-five per cent., as in 1832, but five per cent., as it was established at the last session of Congress. He had received a letter to-day, relative to a large establishment, stating that its operations had been suspended in consequence of this reduction. The reduction was made at the last session, to reconcile the South to the tariff; Southern members then appeared to think it of little consequence to the South. He hoped gentlemen would not persist in urging it now.

[Mr. SMITH denounced Mr. CLAY's statement of the reduction, and Mr. C. then read a portion of the act.]

Mr. FORSYTH would vote for Mr. SMITH's amendment. The bill had been made by the advocates of protection, as the best, in their view, which could be made, for the purpose of reconciliation; but it was doubtful whether it was the best, and he should not vote for it till he could see that it was. It had been called a concession, to reduce the duty on Kendal cottons to five per cent.; why is it now to be taken away? [Mr. CLAY said, for the purpose of giving more.] Mr. F. was opposed to the bill in its present form, and should not only vote to strike out the second section, but he would move to strike out all the sections which did not correspond with his views. The bill was a bitter pill; but, for the sake of peace, he would take it; but not if he could help it.

Mr. CLAYTON had regarded the reduction to five per cent. as a concession, though the Senator from South Carolina had viewed it otherwise.

Mr. FOOT said, he had expected the bill would be accepted as it came from the committee. He had hoped that a particular section of the country would not be singled out to suffer by the compromise. He had seen a former compromise operate auspiciously; he hoped this would do so. He would be sorry now to alter his position with regard to the bill; but he could not consent to sacrifice so greatly the interests of his constituents.

Here a message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the honorable JAMES LENT, a member of that House from the State of New York; and that his funeral would take place at eleven o'clock to-morrow; whereupon,

Mr. DUDLEY moved that the bill be laid on the table; which motion having been agreed to,

On motion of Mr. DUDLEY,
Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate, at eleven o'clock, attend the funeral of the honorable JAMES LENT.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,
The Senate then adjourned, to meet at one o'clock, P. M. to-morrow.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY, 23.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to modify the tariff laws; the question being on the motion of Mr. SMITH, to change the second section so as to permit the duties on plains, kerseys, and Kendal cottons, costing under thirty-five cents per square yard, to be imported at five per cent., as fixed by the act of 1832, instead of increasing the duties on those manufactures to fifty per cent., as was proposed by the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT supported the amendment. The great and leading objects for which this measure had been supported was to diminish the burdens of the South, and reduce the revenue. How either of these was to be accomplished by increasing the duty upon an article of great importance to that section, from five to fifty per cent., which would add at least half a million to the revenue, he had not been able to perceive. On the other hand, it appeared to be precisely contrary to the avowed object of the friends of the bill, of whom he professed to be one. When the duty on these woollens had been reduced, the last session, to five per cent., as an act of conciliation to the South, the whole duty was taken from the wool, which entered into that description of manufacture, by way of counterpoise. To raise this duty to fifty per cent., without reinstating the corresponding duty on the raw material, he regarded as altogether impolitic.

Mr. FOOT said, this was an important feature of the bill, in which his constituents had a great interest. Gentlemen from the South had agreed to it; and they were abundantly capable of guarding their own interests.

Mr. CLAY said the whole bill was based upon the principle of compromise. The provision proposed to be struck out was an essential part of this compromise, which, if struck out, would destroy the effect of the whole. Mr. C. went into the importance of this manufacture, and read a letter from Boston on the subject.

Mr. FORSYTH was sorry to hear from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that he regarded this increase of the burdens of the South as an essential feature of this scheme of compromise. The Senate, in adopting the principle of home valuation, had changed the original plan, in his opinion, much for the worse; he now hoped they would change this part of the bill for the better. He regarded it as highly important to the whole South, with the exception of a small part of South Carolina.

Mr. BUCKNER advocated the interests of the West, which he said had been entirely overlooked in this compromise between the North and South. After explaining those interests at large, Mr. B. declared his intention of supporting the amendment.

Mr. BELL opposed the amendment. The passage of the bill depended upon it. If it was adopted, he should feel compelled to vote against the bill. As to the interests of the West, he believed that lead and iron were more highly protected, at least until 1841, than woollens. As to what would take place hereafter, no one could now foresee. No pledge could now be given to bind the future legislation of Congress. It was altogether futile to consider any measure in that light. We must presume that future legislation will be what it ought to be, in view of the great interests of the country.

Mr. HOLMES was also opposed to the amendment. He supported the bill only on the ground of its being satisfactory to the South. If, on its final passage, it should fail to receive the votes of Senators from that quarter, he gave notice that he should move the reconsideration of the vote, and himself vote against it.

Mr. WRIGHT had heard nothing in support of this provision of the bill, which proposed to increase the duties from five to fifty per cent., which had convinced him that it was conciliatory to the South, or effectual as a means of reducing the revenue. Upon the principles on which the bill had been placed, it certainly would be improved by striking out this provision.

Mr. CLAY replied. He would avow that he had other objects which he regarded as no less important than conciliation and reduction. These were the stability and effectual protection of manufactures. A bill had been passed by the Senate, and sent to the House, for enforcing the collection of the revenue. The object of that bill met his entire approbation; and had he been present when the final vote was taken on its passage, he would have voted in its favor. But he was anxious that the bill which had passed the Senate should go forth to the country accompanied by this measure of specification. The dangerous consequences which had been predicted would then be obviated. He, therefore, implored gentlemen, who had avowed their determination to support this measure, not to throw obstacles in the way of its consummation.

Mr. CHAMBERS said it was impossible for him to vote for the bill, as a measure originating in the Senate, while it contained this provision for increasing the duties. By the constitution, the Senate could originate no such measure. If this feature were struck out, he should most cheerfully support the bill.

Mr. BENTON requested that Mr. CALHOUN, who had temporarily left his seat, might be sent for.

Mr. MOORE inquired if the gentleman wished to impeach Mr. CALHOUN?

Mr. BENTON did not. He only wanted the benefit of his testimony.

Mr. CALHOUN having taken his seat,

Mr. BENTON stated, that some years past he had introduced a bill which provided for a reduction of duties to a large extent, but increased the rate of duty upon some particular articles. It had then been decided by the presiding officer of the Senate, that, being a bill to raise revenue, it could not constitutionally originate in the Senate. He asked for the benefit of the testimony of the gentleman who then presided over the deliberations of the Senate, to bear him out in the correctness of this statement.

Mr. CALHOUN said, the constitution unquestionably provided that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. Whether the constitutional question was decided in the case referred to, or the bill went off upon a question of order, he did not distinctly recollect, though other Senators might. His impression was, that no decision was made on the constitutional question.

Mr. FOOT recollected the case, and was confident that only a question of order was raised; and the constitutional question was not decided by the Chair.

Mr. BENTON then explained the provisions of the bill to which he referred, and compared them with the present. He regarded them as standing on the same ground. The question of order, if it was to be so called, was decided against that bill, upon the constitutional objection that it was not competent to introduce such a measure into the Senate.

Mr. FOOT said the bill referred to proposed the commencement of a revenue system, which had not before existed, and clearly came within the constitutional objection. This bill is not intended to raise, but to reduce the revenue. The objection did not apply to this measure.

Mr. SMITH said, gentlemen seemed inclined to make the constitution support whatever might agree with their fancies.

Mr. DICKERSON said, whether the rate of duty was raised or lowered, the law was equally one for raising revenue within the constitution. The distinction was an absurdity.

Mr. CHAMBERS regarded the constitutional objection as insurmountable. With great regret he should be compelled to vote against the bill if this provision remained in it. The bill should have come from the House of Representatives.

Mr. FORSYTH had stated this objection to the introduction of the bill; but, having been overruled, and the bill having originated in the Senate notwithstanding the constitution, he could perceive no prohibition against its passage.

Mr. CHAMBERS had supposed the objection against the introduction of the bill to have been waived, for the purpose of discussing its provisions. He regarded the present as the proper time for taking the objection.

Mr. SILSBEE could not vote for the bill in the face of the constitution, which expressly prohibited its originating in the Senate.

Mr. BUCKNER could not agree with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] that the introduction of the bill had done away the objection. For this reason, if no other, he should vote against it.

Mr. SMITH could not see how the constitutional question could be settled. If the Senate passed the bill, and the House concurred in it, there was an end of the objection. The origin of the bill could never be inquired into hereafter.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN regarded the constitutional difficulty as altogether insuperable. Having taken a solemn oath to support the constitution, he could not, however agreeable to his wishes, give his assent to a measure originating in the Senate, in violation of its express provisions.

Mr. BIBB considered it clear that a bill to reduce the revenue might originate in the Senate. Such a bill could not be called a bill to raise revenue; and this distinction had already been sanctioned by the Senate.

Mr. DICKERSON said a single word would destroy that distinction in the present case. If this bill passed, under what law would revenue be raised after 1842, excepting the present, which provided for duties of twenty per cent. after that period?

Mr. WILKINS moved an adjournment, which was lost—Yeas 14, nays 31.

Mr. SMITH then modified his proposition to amend, by moving to strike out the whole of the second section of the bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act of the 14th of July aforesaid, as fixes the rate of duty on all milled and fullled cloth, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Kendal cottons, of which wool is the only material, the value whereof does not exceed thirty-five cents a square yard, at five per cent. ad valorem, shall be, and the same is, hereby repealed. And the said articles shall be subject to the same duty of fifty per cent., as is provided by the said second section for other manufactures of wool; which duty shall be liable to the same deductions as are prescribed by the first section of this act.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to this section, and, therefore, in favor of striking it out. He said it was contrary to the whole tenor and policy of the bill, and presented the strange contradiction of multiplying duties tenfold, upon an article of prime necessity, used exclusively by the laboring part of the community, while reducing duties, or abolishing them in toto, upon every article used by the rich and luxurious. Silks were to be free; cambrics and fine linens were to be free; muslins, and castimers, and broad cloths were to be reduced; but the coarse woollens, worn by the laborers of every color and every occupation, of every sex and of every age, bond or free—these coarse woollens, necessary to shelter them from cold and damp, are to be put up tenfold in point of tax, and the cost of procuring them doubled to the wearer. He showed the annual amount of the tax to be imposed by this section. It applied to the woollen goods costing less than thirty-five cents the square yard; the annual importation of that description of goods was shown in the custom-house returns to be one million and fifty thousand dollars' worth. The tax on that amount would be fifty thousand dollars by the bill of 1832; it will be five hundred thousand dollars if this section is retained; with the chance of coming down, by small periodical reductions, to two hundred thousand dollars in 1842. Thus, a tax on a necessary of life—on an article exclusively used by the poor and the laborer—is to be raised tenfold off hand, for the chance of coming down to fourfold in nine years. But it never will come down to fourfold. Whether the act goes into full effect, and works through its destined term of nine years, and attains its promised glory in 1842; or whether it is broken up before the period of gestation is half out, the result, in either event, will be the same to these coarse woollens. If the act is broken, the duties, in their descending course, will be stopped at thirty-five or thirty-eight per cent.; if the act is carried out, then the home valuation, provided for in this bill, will attach upon these woollens as the standard of their value. The American value, and not the foreign cost, will be the basis of computation for the twenty per cent. The difference, when all is fair, is about thirty-five per cent. in the value; so that an importation of coarse woollens, costing one million in Europe, and now to pay five per cent. on that cost, will be valued, if all is fair, at one million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and the twenty per cent. will be calculated on that sum, and will give two hundred and seventy thousand dollars, instead of two hundred thousand dollars, for the quantum of the tax. It will be near sixfold, instead of fourfold, and that if all is fair; but if there are gross errors or gross frauds in the valuation, as every human being knows there must be, the real tax may be far above sixfold. On this very floor, and in this very debate, we hear it computed, by way of recommending this bill to the manufacturers, that the twenty per cent. on the statute book will exceed thirty in the custom-house.

The Tariff.

Mr. B. took a view of the circumstances which had attended the duties on these coarse woollens since he had been in Congress. Every act had discriminated in favor of these goods, because they were used by the poor and the laborer. The act of 1824 fixed the duties upon them at a rate one-third less than on other woollens; the act of 1828 fixed it at upwards of one-half less; the act of 1832 fixed it nine-tenths less. All these discriminations in favor of coarse woollens were made upon the avowed principle of favoring the laborers, bond and free, the slave which works the field for his master, the mariner, the miner, the steamboat hand, the worker in stone and wood, and every out-door occupation. It was intended by the framers of all these acts, and especially by the supporters of the act of 1832, that this class of our population, so meritorious from their daily labor, so much overlooked in the operations of the Government, because of their little weight in the political scale, should at least receive one boon from Congress—they should receive their working clothes free of tax. This was the intention of successive Congresses: it was the performance of this Congress in its act of the last session; and now, in six short months since this boon was granted, before the act has gone into effect, the very week before the act was to go into effect, the boon, so lately granted, is to be snatched away, and the day laborer taxed higher than ever; taxed fifty per cent. upon his working clothes! while gentlemen and ladies are to have silks and cambrics, and fine linen, free of any tax at all!

Mr. B. animadverted on the reason which was alleged for this extraordinary augmentation of duties in a bill which was to reduce duties. The reason was candidly expressed on this floor. There were a few small manufactories of these woollens in Connecticut; and unless these manufactories be protected by an increase of duties, certain members avow their determination to vote against the whole bill! This is the secret—no! not a secret, for it is proclaimed. Two or three little factories in Connecticut must be protected; and that by imposing an annual tax upon the wearers of these coarse woollens of four or five times the value of the fee-simple estate of the factories. Better far, as a point of economy and justice, to purchase them and burn them. The whole American system is to be given up in the year 1842; and why impose an annual tax of near five hundred thousand dollars, upon the laboring community, to prolong, for a few years, a few small branches of that system, when the whole bill has the axe to the root, and nods to its fall? But, said Mr. B., these manufactories of coarse woollens, to be protected by this bill, are not even American manufactories; they are rather Asiatic establishments in America; for they get their wool from Asia, and not from America. The importation of this wool is one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds weight; it comes chiefly from Smyrna, and costs less than eight cents a pound. It was made free of duty at the last session of Congress, as an equivalent to these very manufactories for the reduction of the duty on coarse woollens to five per cent. The two measures went together, and were, each, a consideration for the other. Before that time, and by the act of 1828, this coarse wool was heavily dutied for the benefit of the home wool growers. It was subjected to a double duty, one of four cents on the pound, and the other of fifty per cent. on the value. As a measure of compromise, this double duty was abolished at the last session. The wool for these factories was admitted duty free, and, as an equivalent to the community, the woollens made out of the corresponding kind of wool were admitted at a nominal duty. It was a bargain, entered into in open Congress, and sealed with all the forms of law. Now, in six months after the bargain was made, it is to be broken. The manufacturers are to have the duty on woollens run up to fifty per cent. for protection, and are still to receive the foreign wool free of duty. In plain English, they are to retain the pay which was given them for reducing the duties on these coarse woollens, and they are to have the duties restored.

Mr. B. considered this increase of duties on this particular article as the most offensive part of the bill. It not only restored the old duty, but made it higher than it ever was before; higher than it was in the acts of 1824-'28; higher than it ever had been on the American statute book; and this purely and simply for protection, as it is avowed and proclaimed on this floor.

Mr. CLAYTON thought the House would not regard it in the light referred to. This was not a bill to raise revenue; that was not the object of the section now proposed to be stricken out; all that was intended by that section was to increase competition among manufacturers by affording them adequate protection. The Senate had repeatedly decided that bills for reducing duties might originate here. At any rate, this question would more properly arise upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the constitutional question must be regarded as important; but it was one which could not be settled by the Senate. It was purely a question of privilege, and the decision of it belonged alone to the House. The Senate, by the constitution, could not originate bills for raising revenue. It was of no consequence whether the rate of duty were increased or decreased; if it was a money bill, it belonged to the House to originate it. In the House there was a Committee of Ways and Means organized expressly for such objects. There was no such committee of the Senate. The constitutional provision was taken from the practice of the British Parliament, whose usages were well known to the framers of the constitution, with the modification that the Senate might alter and amend money bills, which was denied by the House of Commons to that of Lords. This subject belonged exclusively to the House of Representatives. The attempt to evade the question by contending that the present bill was intended for protection and not revenue afforded no relief, for it was protection by means of revenue. It was not the less a money bill from its object being protection. After 1842 this bill would raise the revenue, or it would not be raised by existing laws. He was altogether opposed to the provisions of this bill; but this objection was one which it belonged to the House to make.

Mr. CLAY said, the question had been decided again and again that the Senate might originate a bill of such a character. The main object in the bill was not revenue, but protection. He hoped on this occasion the Senate would exercise the power it had heretofore done in favor of this bill, which was regarded on all sides as a measure of conciliation and compromise. He regretted that any objection should have arisen from any quarter to the benificent action of the Senate upon this distracting subject. He flattered himself that the passage of this bill would again bring the citizens of the various sections of the country together like a band of brothers. Would the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] send his bill forth alone without this measure of conciliation? He hoped not. He feared such a course would not calm the agitations which now convulse the nation and threaten the integrity of the Union.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved an adjournment.

Mr. CLAY having ineffectually appealed to the mover to withdraw the motion, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, the motion was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Chambers, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Kane, Knight, Prentiss, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Webster, Wilkins—16.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wright—28.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had spoken of the bill which had been reported from the Judiciary Committee as his bill. It was no more his bill than it was that gentleman's. The Senator from Kentucky had expressed himself to be as much in favor of that bill as he had himself. The only difference between them in this particular was, that he happened to have been a member of the committee from which the bill had been reported. He had no objection to conciliation, which had been so much spoken of. He objected to this measure, not because it was a measure of conciliation, but because it was one the country would never consent to see carried out. Upon proper principles, he would go as far in favor of conciliation as any man. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] says the object of the bill is protection, and therefore it is not a bill to raise revenue. Can such considerations be gone into in determining the constitutionality of a measure? This is the very doctrine of the South Carolina ordinance. The bill before us illustrates its absurdity. The gentleman from Kentucky supports it from one motive; others from another motive. One, because it secures protection; another, because it destroys protection. One half of its friends vote for it with the sole view to protection; the other half because it only raises revenue. It is impossible to settle grave constitutional questions upon principles which can never be known but to the Searcher of hearts.

Mr. CLAY said he had, after much reflection, brought forward this bill as a proposition which would give peace to the country. The Senator from Massachusetts opposed this proposition of peace and harmony, and wished to send forth the measure of force alone.

[Mr. WEBSTER said, in an audible tone, the gentleman has no authority for making that assertion.]

Mr. C. said he would not submit to interruption. He avowed that his object in framing the bill was to secure that protection to manufacturers which every one foresaw must otherwise be soon swept away. The reduction of protection was so gradual, that before it was essentially impaired, a new arrangement would probably be made. He had been anxious to abolish the duties on raw cotton, upon the ground that a few cargoes from abroad would bring the South here to ask for protection, which would be cheerfully accorded by their consenting to a correspondent protection upon some other article. In proposing and advocating this measure, he stood upon ground from which he defied all assailants. It was the same ground of protection upon which he had heretofore stood. He considered the motives under which a law had passed as a fit subject for consideration. No law could be correctly interpreted without having regard to them. This bill might be constitutionally passed by the Senate, because it was not a bill for revenue; it was not brought forward with that motive. His purpose was protection, and protection alone. He deeply regretted the course the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had chosen to adopt, who had opposed every thing and proposed nothing.

Mr. WEBSTER would inquire whether it was quite true that he had opposed every thing and proposed nothing? As the only mode in which he could place before the Senate his views of the basis upon which measures of conciliation could be safely established, he had, some time past, offered a series of resolutions. The Senator from Kentucky might regard them as nothing; he could only say that they expressed his views on this important subject in his own feeble way. He would have been most happy to have gone fully into the subject in the discharge of his duty, with as strong a desire for conciliation as any gentleman, had it so pleased the Senate. He could not give his countenance to the present measure, which he deemed fraught with ruin to some of the most important interests in the country.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the second section of the bill, which was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, King, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Webster, White, Wright—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, Wilkins—29.

Mr. KANE then moved to amend the bill by adding a ninth section, which provided that nothing contained in this act should be construed to extend to the present duties on lead in pigs, bars, or sheets, leaden shot, red or white lead, dry, or ground in oil, sugar of lead, &c. &c.

Mr. SMITH moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "bar iron and castings of iron, gunpowder, cannon, mortars, howitzers, cannon balls, shells for guns and howitzers," &c. Mr. S. said this proposition was to carry out the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to the protection of munitions of war.

After a few words from Mr. CLAY in opposition to the last proposition, and in favor of it from Mr. SMITH and Mr. DICKERSON, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Kane, Robinson, Smith, Tipton, Webster, Wilkins, Wright—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague, Tomlinson, Troup, White—25.

So Mr. SMITH's motion was negatived.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. KANE, and it was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Kane, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Wilkins, Wright—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robbins, Seymour, Sprague, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, Webster, White—27.

So the motion to amend was rejected.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to strike out the third and sixth sections of the bill, which attempt to bind all future Congresses until the year 1842.

The question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Kane, Knight, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Webster—13.

[SENATE.]

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins, Wright.—28.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BENTON then moved to amend the bill by adding a new section, the object of which was to make a reduction of the drawbacks allowed on the exportation of articles manufactured in the United States from foreign materials subject to duty, in the same proportion as the reduction made in the duties by this bill.

Mr. B. said that this motion did not extend to the general system of drawbacks, but only to those special cases in which the exporter was authorized to draw from the treasury the amount of money which he had paid into it on the importation of the materials which he had manufactured. The amount of drawback to be allowed in every case had been adjusted to the amount of duty paid; and as all these duties were to be periodically reduced by the bill, it would follow, as a natural consequence, that the drawback should undergo equal reductions at the same time. Mr. B. would illustrate his motion by stating a single case—the case of refined sugar. The drawback payable on this sugar was five cents a pound. These five cents rested upon a duty of three cents, now payable on the importation of foreign brown sugar. It was ascertained that it required nearly two pounds of brown sugar to make a pound of refined sugar, and five cents was held to be the amount of duty paid on the quantity of brown sugar which made the pound of refined sugar. It was simply a reimbursement of what he had paid. By this bill the duty of foreign brown sugar will be reduced immediately to two and a half cents a pound, and afterwards will be periodically reduced until the year 1842, when it will be but six-tenths of a cent, very little more than one-sixth of the duty when five cents the pound were allowed for a drawback. Now, if the drawback is not reduced in proportion to the reduction of the duty on the raw sugar, two very injurious consequences will result to the public: first, that a large sum of money will be annually taken out of the treasury in gratuitous bounties to sugar refiners; and next, that the consumers of refined sugar will have to pay more for American refined sugar than foreigners will; for the refiners, getting a bounty of five cents a pound on all that is exported, will export all, unless the American consumer will pay the bounty also. Mr. B. could not undertake to say how much money would be drawn from the treasury, as a mere bounty, if this amendment did not prevail. It must, however, be great. The drawback was now frequently a hundred thousand dollars a year, and great frauds were committed to obtain it. Frauds to the amount of forty thousand dollars a year had been detected, and this while the inducement was small and inconsiderable; but, as fast as that inducement swells from year to year, the temptation to commit frauds must increase; and the amount drawn by fraud, added to that drawn by the letter of the law, must be enormous. Mr. B. did not think it necessary to illustrate his motion by further examples, but said there were other cases which would be as strong as that of refined sugar; and justice to the public required all to be checked at once, by adopting the amendment he had offered.

After a few words from Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. SMITH, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. FOOT, and Mr. MILLER, the question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Calhoun, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Johnston, Kane, King, Rives, Robinson, Seymour, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright.—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Grundy, Hendricks, Holmes, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Tipton, Troup, Tyler.—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to add, at the close of the second section, by which duties upon certain coarse woollens were increased from five to fifty per cent., a provision that upon all wool costing at the place of exportation less than eight cents per pound, the same duties shall be imposed as under the tariff of 1828. Mr. W. said, in consequence of the reduction of the duty upon these manufactures by the tariff of 1832, the duty had been entirely taken from the raw material; as it was now proposed to place the duty on the manufacture higher than was provided by the act of 1828, the duty on the material ought to be reinstated.

The question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Dudley, Hendricks, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Webster, Wright.—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Buckner, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Grundy, Holmes, Johnston, King, Knight, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Smith, Tomlinson, Troup, Tyler, White, Wilkins.—32.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. SILSBEE moved to strike out the words “coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope,” in reference to the discrimination made in the places from which silks are imported.

The motion was negatived without a division.

The bill was then reported as amended.

All the amendments were concurred in, excepting that which provides that after 1842 such duties shall be levied “as an economical expenditure may require.”

Upon the propriety of this provision a prolonged discussion arose, in which it was contended by Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. DALLAS, Mr. DICKERSON, and Mr. BUCKNER, that these words, although not so intended, might be construed by Southern gentlemen, in the year 1842, as an abandonment of the protective principle, and a design, on the part of those who had introduced this bill, to make revenue alone the standard of all future duties on imports.

Mr. CLAYTON and Mr. CLAY regarded the language as authorizing no such construction, and denied that any one would be justified in inferring that there was to be an abandonment of the system of protection. It was insisted by Mr. CLAYTON that the Government could not be kept together if the principle of protection were to be discarded in our policy, and declared that he would pause before he surrendered that principle, even to save the Union.

Mr. FORSYTH regarded the clause as an absurdity, on which an argument either for or against protection might be erected; but as it was the only absurdity which was agreeable to him, among the many absurdities contained in the bill, he would vote for it.

Mr. DALLAS moved to strike out the words, which was negatived, yeas 14, nays 22; and the clause was agreed to.

The question then being on ordering the bill to a third reading,

Mr. WEBSTER said he wished to express his views upon some of the principles contained in the bill. He had no desire to give occasion for unnecessary delay. If it was the pleasure of gentlemen to order the bill now to be engrossed without a division, he should not object, and would express his opinions upon the third reading of the bill; otherwise, he would now proceed.

The question was then accordingly put on the third reading of the bill, and carried, without a division being called.

The Senate, then, at nine o'clock, adjourned.

The Tariff.

[FEB. 25, 1838.]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

THE TARIFF.

The bill to modify the act of the 14th day of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports, being read a third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. WEBSTER rose to express his sentiments in opposition to the bill. He paid, in the commencement, a tribute to the purity, zeal, and ability of the Senator from Kentucky, for whom he had so long entertained a high respect, and to elevate whom to a situation where his talents might be still more beneficial to his country he had zealously labored. He also complimented the talents and services of the Senator from South Carolina, with whom he had so often acted, and for whom he had always felt a sincere regard. He briefly reviewed his own course, when the former bills on the subject of the tariff were under consideration, and the conviction which was forced on the East, and other portions of the country, that the protective system was to be the settled policy of the Government. New England had resisted, in the first instance, the establishment of a high protective policy; but when that was determined on, the Eastern States turned all their natural advantages, and their capital of wealth and industry, into the new channel thus marked out for them. The bill of 1826 was to carry out the promises made by the bill of 1824. He disliked the bill of 1828, yet he had voted for it on account of that feature in it which gave the woollens the protection which the Government had pledged itself to give by the law of 1824. That bill decided the policy of the country, unless it was to be kept in a state of perpetual fluctuation and uncertainty.

After passing the law of last session, a law containing some features of concession and compromise, when the country was not prepared for any change, the present bill, professing to be a bill of peace, of arrangement, and of compromise, is brought forward by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, who professes to have renounced none of his former opinions as to the constitutionality and expediency of protection. The bill is also supported by a gentleman whose opinions are directly the reverse of those entertained by the Senator from Kentucky. When it was supported by such opposite feelings, it was important to look into the provisions of the bill. He stated the various considerations which ought to weigh with those who, as friends of the protective system, voted for this bill.

He did not object to the prospective and biennial reductions made by the bill up to 1841, but he objected to the clauses which did, in effect, prohibit the repealing action of any subsequent Congress upon this bill, until 1842. He also objected to the proviso in the fifth section, which was a restriction on the power of Congress. He put it to the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] who had introduced the clause, to say if he did not intend that it should show that Congress was to be considered as bound by the bill, as far as this Congress could bind the future legislation of the country.

The protected articles may, by this bill, be reduced below twenty per cent. ad valorem, but cannot be raised above twenty per cent.

He opposed the bill because it imposed a restriction on the future legislation of Congress. He also opposed it because it seemed to yield the constitutional power of protection. Various arguments were advanced by him to show that the Southern politicians would, if this bill were passed, tell every one of their constituents that they had gained some concession to the opinions of the South. He said that he approved the sagacious silence of the Southern gentlemen. They would not suffer themselves to be provoked by friend or enemy to speak before the time should come when they ought to speak. They were masters of the game, and they knew it. He con-mended their policy, but he wished them to see that he understood it. In giving up specific duties, and substituting ad valorem, the bill had abandoned the policy of all wise Governments, and the policy of our own Government, and the policy always advocated by the Senator from Kentucky. He viewed the bill as a surrender of all the interests of the smaller capitalists, and a concession in favor of overgrown monopolists. He pointed out the effects of this surrender on our own condition, and the handle which it would give to satirists, and foreign writers, and the poets laureate of all the monarchies of Europe, to turn our institutions and our pretensions into ridicule. If this principle were carried into our navigation, he stated that it would be immediately counterbalanced by Great Britain. By limiting our countervailing power, and leaving the countervailing power of Europe free, we put in her hands weapons to destroy us, and cast our weapons of defence at her feet. Under a colonial system, our manufacturers would not be more completely shackled than they will be by this bill.

He referred to the four expedients by which the Senator from Kentucky had said that our protective system could be preserved: 1st, Prohibition; 2dly, The free list; 3dly, Incidental protection; all of which would be found inadequate; and the 4th, Discrimination, or specific duties, was the only one which would avail. Discriminating and specific duties were the last resource, and if that were to be given up, there could be no longer any hope for the protective system, in war or in peace. He insisted, that not being owners of the property, but merely agents or administrators, we had no right to fetter a future Congress. He regarded this bill as the last will and testament of this Congress, which would be set aside by the people, but not on the ground of want of sanity in those principally engaged in making it, for he never saw gentlemen more fully in possession of that sagacity; nor on account of any undue influence, although he could not help thinking that panic had something to do with it, and that if the South Carolina ordinance and replevin law had not appeared, this bill would never have appeared in the Senate.

In reference to the practical effect of the bill, he stated that he saw obstacles to the carrying this bill into effect, which appeared to him to be insurmountable. He thought that it would be difficult to ascertain the legal value of cotton. He took a view of the different values attached to cotton, and of the professional constructions to which the clause concerning cotton would be subjected. In relation to iron, also, he thought that the difficulties in ascertaining the value would be such as to render the provision concerning that article inoperative. The duties on iron having hitherto been specific, no principle of valuation had been laid down. He considered that there was no legislative provision by which the value of iron could be assessed. The same remarks were applicable to sugar; and he stated a case to show the difficulty which exists in reaching a proper and fixed value as a basis for duty. He supposed the answer would be, that if difficulties arise, the Secretary must get through them as well as he can; and if he cannot, he must come to Congress.

As a measure of finance, he had no idea that the bill would be an efficient measure. He had not heard the assertion that the bill would at all reduce the revenue. He denied that the reduction of duties on boots, and shoes, and clothing would reduce the revenue. The bill would, in these branches, reduce thousands of mechanics to ruin, and by this operation would increase the revenue. In this point, the bill aims a deadly blow on the poor, the young, the enterprising—on the labor and the ingenuity of the country. By the introduction of foreign alcohol, at a reduced rate of duty, the revenue would be increased; but he thought gentlemen should pause before they sanctioned this change. The entire breaking up of the printing establishments for printing calicoes would be one of the consequences of the passage of the bill; and in proof he read some extracts from a memorial of the Lowell manufacturers. These institutions might survive the three first reductions, but the fourth would be fatal to them. On the spinning and weaving, the effect, if not so disastrous, would scarcely be less objectionable. The large capitalists in that branch would be able to make money by breaking down all young and enterprising establishments. In reference to woollens, with a duty of twenty per cent. on woollens, and twenty per cent. on wool, it is impossible that they can stand. The depreciation of property would be the first consequence, and the depreciation of credit the next; and, by the surrender of their interests, long before this beneficent home valuation can come to their relief, their eyes will be sealed in death. As to iron, English or Welch iron costs twenty-six dollars a ton, and the supply is inexhaustible. Iron in Russia and Sweden costs forty dollars a ton. English iron has been taxed thirty dollars, and Baltic iron eighteen dollars a ton. The change from specific to ad valorem duty will work an injurious change. He believed that this surrender once made, we could never return to the present state of things, without such a struggle as would shake the country much more than any thing has yet shaken it.

He might be wrong. There might be no pledge, no constitutional objection; but, if so, why this bill? The people will not expect the passage of this bill. There was no expectation at the commencement of this short session that such a bill would be passed. The Senate had not had time to know the pleasure of their masters. No opportunity had been offered for obtaining a knowledge either of the course of public opinion, or the effect of this measure on the public interests. It was said the next Congress would pass this bill if it were not passed now. He did not fear the next Congress; but if that body should choose to undo what was now done, it would have the power so to do.

If it was true, as the Senator from Kentucky believed, that the intention of South Carolina was merely to enter into a law-suit with the United States, then there was no necessity for this sacrifice of great interests. He believed that if this bill should become a law, there will be an action on the part of the people at the next session to overthrow it. It will not be all requiem and lullaby when this bill shall be passed. On the contrary, he believed there would be discord and discontent. He had already expressed his views as to reduction in his resolutions. He believed there ought to be a reduction to the point of necessary revenue; and that, as soon as that point could be ascertained, any Congress would be able to make a tariff which would suit the country. The estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the point of revenue, vary materially from those of others; but if the true point could be ascertained, he thought Congress might at once proceed to an adjustment of the tariff with a prospect of success.

As he had commenced with doing justice to the motives of the gentlemen on the other side, he asked that equal justice might be done to him in the opposition which he was compelled to make to a measure which had been ushered in with so much profession of peace and harmony. He would do as much to satisfy South Carolina as any man. He would take this tariff, and cut it down to the bone; but he did not wish to rush into untried systems. He believed that his constituents would excuse him for surrendering their interests, but they would not forgive him for a violation of the constitution.

Mr. CLAY rose, in reply to Mr. WEBSTER, and said: Being anxious, Mr. President, that this bill should pass, and pass this day, I will abridge as much as I can the observations which I am called upon to make. I have long, with pleasure and pride, co-operated in the public service with the Senator from Massachusetts; and I have found him faithful, enlightened, and patriotic. I have not a particle of doubt as to the pure and elevated motives which actuate him. Under these circumstances, it gives me deep and lasting regret to find myself compelled to differ from him as to a measure involving vital interests, and perhaps the safety of the Union. On the other hand, I derive great consolation from finding myself, on this occasion, in the midst of friends with whom I have long acted, in peace and in war, and especially with the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES,] with whom I had the happiness to unite in a memorable instance. It was in this very chamber, that Senator presiding in the committee of the Senate, and I in the committee of twenty-four of the House of Representatives, on a Sabbath day, that the terms were adjusted, by which the compromise was effected of the Missouri question. Then the dark clouds that hung over our beloved country were dispersed; and now the thunders from others not less threatening, and which have been longer accumulating, will, I hope, roll over us harmless and without injury.

The Senator from Massachusetts objects to the bill under consideration on various grounds. He argues that it imposes unjustifiable restraints on the power of future legislation; that it abandons the protective policy; and that the details of the bill are practically defective. He does not object to the gradual, but very inconsiderable, reduction of duties which is made prior to 1842. To that he could not object; because it is a species of prospective provision, as he admits, in conformity with numerous precedents on our statute book. He does not object so much to the state of the proposed law prior to 1842, during a period of nine years; but, throwing himself forward to the termination of that period, he contends that Congress will then find itself under inconvenient shackles, imposed by our indiscretion. In the first place, I would remark, that the bill contains no obligatory pledges; it could make none; none are attempted. The power over the subject is in the constitution; put there by those who formed it, and liable to be taken out only by an amendment of the instrument. The next Congress, and every succeeding Congress, will undoubtedly have the power to repeal the law whenever they may think proper. Whether they will exercise it or not, will depend upon a sound discretion, applied to the state of the whole country, and estimating fairly the consequences of the repeal, both upon the general harmony and the common interests. Then the bill is founded in a spirit of compromise. Now, in all compromises there must be mutual concessions. The friends of free trade insist that duties should be laid in reference to revenue alone. The friends of American industry say that another, if not paramount, object in laying them, should be to diminish the consumption of foreign, and increase that of domestic products. On this point the parties divide, and, between these two opposite opinions, a reconciliation is to be effected, if it can be accomplished. The bill assumes, as a basis, adequate protection for nine years, and less beyond that term. The friends of protection say to their opponents, we are willing to take a lease of nine years, with the long chapter of accidents beyond that period, including the chance of war, the restoration of concord, and along with it a conviction, common to all, of the utility of protection; and, in consideration of it, if, in 1843, none of these contingencies shall have been realized, we are willing to submit, as long as Congress may think proper, to a maximum rate of twenty per cent. with a power of discrimination below it, cash duties, home valuations, and a liberal list of free articles, for the benefit of the manufacturing interest. To these conditions the opponents of protection are ready to accede. The measure is what it professes to be—a compromise; but it imposes, and could impose, no restriction upon the will or power of a future Congress. Doubtless great respect will be paid, as it ought to be paid, to the serious condition of the country that has prompted the passage of this bill. Any future Congress that might disturb this adjustment would act under a high responsibility; but it would be entirely within its competency to repeal, if it thought proper, the whole bill.

It is far from the object of those who support this bill to abandon or surrender the policy of protecting American industry. Its protection or encouragement may be accomplished in various ways. 1st. By bounties, as far as they are within the constitutional power of Congress to offer them. 2d. By prohibitions, totally excluding the foreign rival article. 3d. By high duties, without regard to the aggregate amount of revenue which they produce. 4th. By discriminating duties, so adjusted as to limit the revenue to the economical wants of Government. And 5th. By the admission of the raw material, and articles essential to manufactures, free of duty. To which may be added cash duties, home valuations, and the regulations of auctions. A perfect system of protection would comprehend most, if not all, of these modes of affording it. There might be, at this time, a prohibition of certain articles, (ardent spirits and coarse cottons, for example,) to public advantage. If there were not inveterate prejudices and conflicting opinions prevailing, (and what statesman can totally disregard impediments of that character?) such a compound system might be established.

Now, Mr. President, before the assertion is made that the bill surrenders the protective policy, gentlemen should understand perfectly what it does not, as well as what it does propose. It impairs no power of Congress over the whole subject; it contains no promise or pledge whatever, express or implied, as to bounties, prohibitions, or auctions; it does not touch the power of Congress in regard to them, and Congress is perfectly free to exercise that power at any time; it expressly recognises discriminating duties within a prescribed limit; it provides for cash duties and home valuations; and it secures a free list, embracing numerous articles, some of high importance to the manufacturing arts. Of all the modes of protection which I have enumerated, it affects only the third; that is to say, the imposition of high duties, producing a revenue beyond the wants of Government. The Senator from Massachusetts contends that the policy of protection was settled in 1816, and that it has ever since been maintained. Sir, it was settled long before 1816. It is coeval with the present constitution, and it will continue, under some of its various aspects, during the existence of the Government. No nation can exist, no nation, perhaps, ever existed, without protection, in some form, and to some extent, being applied to its own industry. The direct and necessary consequence of abandoning the protection of its own industry, would be to subject it to the restrictions and prohibitions of foreign Powers; and no nation, for any length of time, can endure an alien legislation, in which it has no will. The discontents which prevail, and the safety of the republic, may require the modification of a specific mode of protection; but it must be preserved in some other more acceptable shape.

All that was settled in 1816, in 1824, and in 1828, was, that protection should be afforded by high duties, without regard to the amount of the revenue which they might yield. During that whole period, we had a public debt which absorbed all the surpluses beyond the ordinary wants of Government. Between 1816 and 1824 the revenue was liable to great fluctuations, vibrating between the extremes of about nineteen and thirty-six millions of dollars. If there were more revenue, more debt was paid; if less, a smaller amount was reimbursed. Such was sometimes the deficiency of the revenue, that it became necessary, for the ordinary expenses of Government, to trench upon the ten millions annually set apart as a sinking fund to extinguish the public debt. If the public debt remained undischarged, or we had any other proper and practical mode of appropriating the surplus revenue, the form of protection, by high duties, might be continued without public detriment. It is the payment of the public debt, then, and the arrest of internal improvements by the exercise of the veto, that unsettle that specific form of protection. Nobody supposes, or proposes, that we should continue to levy, by means of high duties, a large annual surplus, of which no practical use can be made, for the sake of the incidental protection which they afford. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that surplus, on the existing scale of duties, and with the other sources of revenue, at six millions annually. An annual accumulation, at that rate, would, in a few years, bring into the treasury the whole currency of the country, to lie there inactive and dormant.

This view of the condition of the country has impressed every public man with the necessity of some modification of the principle of protection, so far as it depends upon high duties. The Senator from Massachusetts feels it; and hence, in the resolutions which he submitted, he proposes to reduce the duties, so as to limit the amount of the revenue to the wants of the Government. With him, revenue is the principal, protection the subordinate object. If protection cannot be enjoyed after such a reduction of duties as he thinks ought to be made, it is not to be extended. He says specific duties, and the power of discrimination, are preserved by his resolutions. So they may be under the operation of the bill. The only difference between the two schemes is, that the bill, in the maximum which it provides, suggests a certain limit; whilst his resolutions lay down none. Below that maximum, the principle of discrimination and specific duties may be applied. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [MR. DALLAS,] who, equally with the Senator from Massachusetts, is opposed to this bill, would have agreed to the bill if it had fixed thirty instead of twenty per cent.; and he would have dispensed with home valuation, and come down to the revenue standard in five or six years. Now, Mr. President, I prefer, and I think the manufacturing interest will prefer, nine years of adequate protection, home valuations, and twenty per cent., to the plan of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I want to be perfectly understood as to the motives which have prompted me to offer this measure. I repeat what I said on the introduction of it, that they are, first, to preserve the manufacturing interest; and, secondly, to quiet the country. I believe the American system to be in the greatest danger; and I believe it can be placed on a better and safer foundation at this session than at the next. I heard, with surprise, my friend from Massachusetts say that nothing had occurred within the last six months to increase its hazard. I entreat him to review that opinion. Is it correct? Is the issue of numerous elections, including that of the highest officer of the Government, nothing? Is the explicit recommendation of that officer, in his message at the opening of the session, sustained, as he is, by a recent triumphant election, nothing? Is his declaration in his proclamation, that the burdens of the South ought to be relieved, nothing? Is the introduction of the bill in the House of Representatives during this session, sanctioned by the head of the Treasury and the administration, prostrating the greater part of the manufactures of the country, nothing? Are the increasing discontents, nothing? Is the tendency of recent events to unite the whole South, nothing? What have we not witnessed in this chamber? Friends of the administration bursting all the ties which seemed indissolubly to unite them to its chief, and, with few exceptions south of the Potomac, opposing, and vehemently opposing, a favorite measure of that administration, which three short months ago they contributed to establish! Let us not deceive ourselves. Now is the time to adjust the question in a manner satisfactory to both parties. Put it off until the next session, and the alternative may, and probably then would be, a speedy and ruinous reduction of the tariff, or a civil war with the entire South.

It is well known that the majority of the dominant party is adverse to the tariff. There are many honorable exceptions, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DICKINSON] among them. But for the exertions of the other party, the tariff would have been long since sacrificed. Now let us look at the composition of the two branches of Congress at the next session. In this body we lose three friends of the protective policy, without being sure of gaining one. Here, judging from the present appearances, we shall, at the next session, be in the minority. In the House it is notorious that there is a considerable accession to the number of the dominant party. How, then, I ask, is the system to be sustained against numbers, against the whole weight of the administration, against the united South, and against the increased impending danger of civil war? There is, indeed, one contingency that might save it, but that is too uncertain to rely upon. A certain class of Northern politicians, professing friendship to the tariff, have been charged with being secretly inimical to it, for political purposes. They may change their ground, and come out open and undisguised supporters of the system. They may even find in the measure which I have brought forward a motive for their conversion. Sir, I shall rejoice in it, from whatever cause it may proceed. And if they can give greater strength and durability to the system, and at the same time quiet the discontents of its opponents, I shall rejoice still more. They shall not find me disposed to abandon it, because it has drawn succor from an unexpected quarter.

No, Mr. President; it is not destruction but preservation of the system at which we aim. If dangers now assail it, we have not created them. I have sustained it upon the strongest and clearest convictions of its expediency. They are entirely unaltered. Had others, who avow attachment to it, supported it with equal zeal and straightforwardness, it would be now free from embarrassment; but with them it has been a secondary interest. I utter no complaints—I make no reproaches. I wish only to defend myself now, as heretofore, against unjust assaults. I have been represented as the father of this system, and I am charged with an unnatural abandonment of my own offspring. I have never arrogated to myself any such intimate relation to it. I have, indeed, cherished it with parental fondness, and my affection is undiminished. But in what condition do I find this child? It is in the hands of the Philistines, who would strangle it. I fly to its rescue, to snatch it from their custody, and to place it on a bed of security and repose for nine years, where it may grow and strengthen, and become acceptable to the whole people. I behold a torch about being applied to a favorite edifice, and I would save it, if possible, before it was wrapt in flames, or at least preserve the precious furniture which it contains. I wish to see the tariff separated from the politics of the country, that business men may go to work in security, with some prospect of stability in our laws, and without every thing being staked on the issue of elections, as it were on the boards of the die.

And the other leading object which has prompted the introduction of this measure, the tranquillizing of the country, is no less important. All wise, human legislation must consult, in some degree, the passions, and prejudices, and feelings, as well as the interests of the people. It would be vain and foolish to proceed, at all times, and under all circumstances, upon the notion of absolute certainty in any system, or infallibility in any dogma, and to push these out without regard to any consequences. With us, who entertain the opinion that Congress is constitutionally invested with power to protect domestic industry, it is a question of mere expediency as to the form, the degree, and the time that the protection shall be afforded. In weighing all the considerations which should control and regulate the exercise of that power, we ought not to overlook what is due to those who honestly entertain opposite opinions to large masses of the community, and to deep, long-cherished, and growing prejudices. Perceiving, ourselves, no constitutional impediment, we have less difficulty in accommodating ourselves to the sense of the people of the United States upon this interesting subject. I do believe that a majority of them are in favor of this policy; but I am induced to believe this almost against evidence. Two States in New England, which had been in favor of the system, have recently come out against it. Other States of the North and the East have shown a remarkable indifference to its preservation. If, indeed, they have wished to preserve it, they have nevertheless placed the powers of Government in hands which ordinary information must have assured them were rather a hazardous depository. With us in the West, although we are not without some direct, and considerable indirect, interest in the system, we have supported it more upon national than sectional grounds.

Meantime, the opposition of a large and respectable section of the Union, stimulated by political success, has increased, and is increasing. Discontents are multiplying, and assuming new and dangerous aspects. They have been cherished by the course and hopes inspired during this administration, which, at the very moment that it threatens and recommends the use of the power of the whole Union, proclaims aloud the injustice of the system which it would enforce. These discontents are not limited to those who maintain the extravagant theory of nullification; they are not confined to one State; they are co-extensive with the entire South, and extend even to Northern States. It has been intimated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that, if we legislate at this session on the tariff, we would seem to legislate under the influence of a panic. I believe, Mr. President, I am not more sensible to danger of any kind than my fellow-men are generally. It, perhaps, requires as much moral courage to legislate under the imputation of a panic, as to refrain from it least such an imputation should be made. But he who regards the present question as being limited to South Carolina alone, takes a view of it much too contracted. There is a sympathy of feeling and interest throughout the whole South. Other Southern States may differ from that as to the remedy to be now used, but all agree (great as in my humble judgment is their error) in the substantial justice of the cause. Can there be a doubt that those who think in common will sooner or later act in concert? Events are on the wing, and hastening this co-operation. Since the commencement of this session, the most powerful Southern member of the Union has taken a measure which cannot fail to lead to important consequences. She has deputed one of her most distinguished citizens to request a suspension of measures of resistance. No attentive observer can doubt that the suspension will be made. Well, sir, suppose it takes place, and Congress should fail at the next session to afford the redress which will be solicited; what course would every principle of honor, and every consideration of the interests of Virginia, as she understands them, exact from her? Would she not make common cause with South Carolina; and, if she did, would not the entire South eventually become parties to the contest? The rest of the Union might put down the South, and reduce it to submission; but, to say nothing of the uncertainty and hazards of all war, is that a desirable state of things? Ought it not to be avoided if it can be honorably prevented? I am not one of those who think that we must rely exclusively upon moral power, and never resort to physical force. I know too well the frailties and follies of man, in his collective as well as individual character, to reject, in all possible cases, the employment of force; but I do think, that, when resorted to, especially among the members of a confederacy, it should manifestly appear to be the only remaining appeal.

But, suppose the present Congress terminate without any adjustment of the tariff, let us see in what condition its friends will find themselves at the next session. South Carolina will have postponed the execution of the law passed to carry into effect her ordinance until the end of that session. All will be quiet in the South for the present. The President, in his opening message, will urge that justice, as he terms it, be done to the South, and that the burdens imposed upon it by the tariff be removed. The whole weight of the administration, the united South, and majorities of the dominant party in both branches of Congress, will be found in active co-operation. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts tell me how we are to save the tariff against this united and irresistible force? They will accuse us of indifference to the preservation of the Union, and of being willing to expose the country to the dangers of civil war. The fact of South Carolina postponing her ordinance, at the instance of Virginia, and once more appealing to the justice of Congress, will be pressed with great emphasis and effect. It does appear to me impossible that we can prevent a most injurious modification of the tariff at the next session; and that this is the favorable moment for an equitable arrangement of it. I have been subjected to animadversion for the admission of the fact, that at the next session our opponents will be stronger, and the friends of the American system weaker than they are in this Congress. But is it not so? And is it not the duty of every man who aspires to be a Statesman to look at naked facts as they really are? Must he suppress them? Ought he, like children, to throw the counterpane over his eyes, and persuade himself that he is secure from danger? Are not our opponents as well informed as we are about their own strength?

If we adjourn, without any permanent settlement of the tariff, in what painful suspense and terrible uncertainty shall we not leave the manufacturers and business men of the country? All eyes will be turned, with trembling and fear, to the next session. Operations will be circumscribed, and new enterprises checked; or, if otherwise, ruin and bankruptcy may be the consequence. I believe, sir, this measure, which offers a reasonable guaranty for permanency and stability, will be hailed by practical men with pleasure. The political manufacturers may be against it, but it will command the approbation of a large majority of the business manufacturers of the country.

But the objections of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts are principally directed to the period beyond 1842. During the intermediate time, there is every reason to hope and believe that the bill secures adequate protection. All my information assures me of this; and it is demonstrated by the fact, that, if the measure of protection, secured prior to the 31st of December, 1841, were permanent, or if the bill were even silent beyond that period, it would command the cordial and unanimous concurrence of the friends of the policy. What, then, divides, what alarms us? It is what may possibly be the state of things in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, or subsequently! Now, sir, even if that should be as bad as the most vivid imagination or the most eloquent tongue could depict it, if we have intermediate safety and security, it does not seem to me wise to rush upon certain and present evils, because of those which, admitting their possibility, are very remote and contingent. What! Shall we not extinguish the flame which is bursting through the roof that covers us, because, at some future and distant day, we may be again threatened with conflagration?

I do not admit that this bill abandons, or fails by its provisions to secure, reasonable protection beyond 1842. I cannot know, I pretend not to know, what will then be the actual condition of this country, and of the manufacturing arts, and their relative condition to the rest of the world. I would as soon confide in the forecast of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, as in that of any other man in this Senate, or in this country; but he, nor any one else, can tell what that condition will then be. The degree of protection which will be required for domestic industry beyond 1842 depends upon the reduction of wages, the accumulation of capital, the improvement in skill, the perfection of machinery, and the cheapening of the price, at home, of essential articles, such as fuel, iron, &c. I do not think that the honorable Senator can throw himself forward to 1842, and tell us what, in all these particulars, will be the state of this country, and its relative state to other countries. We know that, in all human probability, our numbers will be increased by an addition of one-third, at least, to their present amount; and that may materially reduce wages. We have reason to believe that our capital will be augmented, or skill improved; and we know that great progress has been made, and is making, in machinery. There is a constant tendency to decrease in the price of iron and coal. The opening of new mines and new channels of communication must continue to lower it. The successful introduction of the process of coking would have great effect. The price of these articles, one of the most opulent and intelligent manufacturing houses in this country assures me, is a principal cause of the present necessity of protection to the cotton interest; and that house is strongly inclined to think that twenty per cent., with the other advantages secured in this bill, may do beyond 1842. Then, sir, what effect may not convulsions and revolutions in Europe, if any should arise, produce? I am far from desiring them, that our country may profit by their occurrence. Her greatness and glory rest, I hope, upon a more solid and more generous basis. But we cannot shut our eyes to the fact, that our greatest manufacturing as well as commercial competitor is undergoing a momentous political experiment, the issue of which is far from being absolutely certain. Who can raise the veil of the succeeding nine years, and show what, at their termination, will be the degree of competition which Great Britain can exercise towards us in the manufacturing arts?

Suppose, in the progress of gradual descent towards the revenue standard, for which this bill provides, it should, some years hence, become evident that further protection, beyond 1842, than that which it contemplates, may be necessary; can it be doubted that, in some form or other, it will be applied? Our misfortune has been, and yet is, that the public mind has been constantly kept in a state of feverish excitement in respect to this system of policy. Conventions, elections, Congress, the public press, have been for years all acting upon the tariff, and the tariff acting upon them all. Prejudices have been excited, passions kindled, and mutual irritations carried to the highest pitch of exasperation, insomuch that good feelings have been almost extinguished, and the voice of reason and experience silenced, among the members of the confederacy. Let us separate the tariff from the agitating politics of the country, place it upon a stable and firm foundation, and allow our enterprising countrymen to demonstrate to the whole Union, by their skilful and successful labors, the inappreciable value of the arts. If they can have, what they have never yet enjoyed, some years of repose and tranquillity, they will make, silently, more converts to the policy than would be made during a long period of anxious struggle and boisterous contention. Above all, I count upon the good effects resulting from a restoration of the harmony of this divided people—upon their good sense and their love of justice. Who can doubt, that when passions have subsided, and reason has resumed her empire, that there will be a disposition throughout the whole Union to render ample justice to all its parts? Who will believe that any section of this great confederacy would look with indifference to the prostration of the interests of another section, by distant and selfish foreign nations, regardless alike of the welfare of us all? No, sir; I have no fears beyond 1842. The people of the United States are brethren, made to love and respect each other. Momentary causes may seem to alienate them, but, like family differences, they will terminate in a closer and more affectionate union than ever. And how much more estimable will be a system of protection, based on common conviction and common consent, and planted in the bosoms of all, than one wrenched by power from reluctant and protesting weakness?

The Tariff.

That such a system will be adopted, if it should be necessary, for the period of time subsequent to 1842, I will not doubt. But, in the scheme which I originally proposed, I did not rely exclusively, great as my reliance is, upon the operation of fraternal feelings, the return of reason, and a sense of justice. That scheme contained an appeal to the interests of the South. According to it, unmanufactured cotton was to be a free article after 1842. Gentlemen from that quarter have again and again asserted that they were indifferent to the duty of three cents per pound on cotton, and that they feared no foreign competition. I have thought otherwise; but I was willing, by way of experiment, to take them at their word; not that I was opposed to the protection of cotton, but believing that a few cargoes of foreign cotton introduced into our Northern ports, free of duty, would hasten our Southern friends to come here and ask that protection for their great staple, which is wanted in other sections for their interests. That feature in the scheme was stricken out in the select committee, but not by the consent of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] or myself. Still, after 1842, the South may want protection for sugar, for tobacco, for Virginia coal, perhaps for cotton and other articles; whilst other quarters may need it for wool, woollens, iron, and cotton fabrics; and these mutual wants, if they should exist, will lead, I hope, to some amicable adjustment of a tariff for that distant period, satisfactory to all. The theory of protection supposes, too, that, after a certain time, the protected arts will have acquired such strength and perfection as will enable them subsequently, unaided, to stand up against foreign competition. If, as I have no doubt, this should prove to be correct, it will, on the arrival of 1842, encourage all parts of the Union to consent to the continuance of longer protection to the few articles which may then require it.

The bill before us strongly recommends itself by its equity and impartiality. It favors no one interest, and no one State, by an unjust sacrifice of others. It deals equally by all. Its basis is the act of July last. That act was passed after careful and thorough investigation, and long deliberation, continued through several months. Although it may not have been perfect in its adjustment of the proper measure of protection to each article which was supposed to merit it, it is not likely that, even with the same length of time before us, we could make one more perfect. Assuming the justness of that act, the bill preserves the respective proportions for which the act provides, and subjects them all to the same equal but moderate reduction, spread over the long space of nine years. The Senator from Massachusetts contends that a great part of the value of all protection is given up by dispensing with specific duties and the principle of discrimination. But much the most valuable articles of our domestic manufactures (cotton and woollens, for example,) have never enjoyed the advantage of specific duties. They have always been liable to ad valorem duties, with a very limited application of the minimum principle. The bill does not, however, even after 1842, surrender either mode of laying duties. Discriminations are expressly recognised below the maximum, and specific duties may also be imposed, provided they do not exceed it.

The honorable Senator also contends that the bill is imperfect, and that the execution of it will be impracticable. He asks, how is the excess above twenty per cent. to be ascertained on coarse and printed cottons, liable to minimums of thirty and thirty-five cents, and subject to a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; and how is it to be estimated in the case of specific duties? Sir, it is very probable that the bill is not perfect, but I do not believe that there is any thing impracticable in its execution. Much will, however, depend upon the head of the Treasury Department. In the instance of the cotton minimums, the statute having, by way of exception to the general ad valorem rule, declared, in certain cases, how the value shall be estimated, that statutory value ought to govern; and, consequently, the twenty per cent. should be exclusively deducted from the twenty-five per cent., being the rate of duties to which cottons generally are liable; and the biennial tenths should be subtracted from the excess of five per cent. With regard to specific duties, it will, perhaps, be competent to the Secretary of the Treasury, in the execution of the law, for the sake of certainty, to adopt some average value founded upon importations of a previous year. But if the value of each cargo, and every part of it, is to be ascertained, it would be no more than what now is the operation in the case of woollens, silks, cottons above thirty and thirty-five cents, and a variety of other articles; and, consequently, there would be no impracticability in the law.

To all defects, however, real or imaginary, which may be supposed will arise in the execution of the principles of the bill, I oppose one conclusive, and, I hope, satisfactory answer. Congress will be in session one whole month before the commencement of the law; and if, in the mean time, omissions calling for further legislation shall be discovered, there will be more time then than we have now to supply them. Let us, on this occasion of compromise, pursue the example of our fathers, who, under the influence of the same spirit, in the adoption of the constitution of the United States, determined to ratify it, and go for amendments afterwards.

To the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, that this interest, and that and the other cannot be sustained under the protection beyond 1842, I repeat the answer, that no one can now tell what may then be necessary. That period will provide for itself. But I was surprised to hear my friend singling out iron as an article that would be most injuriously affected by the operation of this bill. If I am not greatly mistaken in my recollection, he opposed and voted against the act of 1824, because of the high duty imposed on iron. But for that duty, (and perhaps the duty on hemp,) which he then considered threw an unreasonable burden upon the navigation of the country, he would have supported that act. Of all the articles to which protecting duties are applied, iron, and the manufactures of iron, enjoy the highest protection. During the term of nine years, the deductions from the duty are not such as seriously to impair those great interests, unless all my information deceives me; and beyond that period the remedy has been already indicated. Let me suppose that the anticipations which I form upon the restoration of concord and confidence shall be all falsified; that neither the sense of fraternal affection nor common justice, nor even common interests, will lead to an amicable adjustment of the tariff beyond 1842. Let me suppose that period has arrived, and that the provisions of the bill shall be interpreted as an obligatory pledge upon the Congress of that day; and let me suppose, also, that a greater amount of protection than the bill provides is absolutely necessary to some interests; what is to be done? Regarded as a pledge, it does not bind Congress forever to adhere to the specific rate of duty contained in the bill. The most, in that view, that it exacts is, to make a fair experiment. If, after such experiment, it should be demonstrated that, under such an arrangement of the tariff, the interests of large portions of the Union would be sacrificed, and they exposed to ruin, Congress will be competent to apply some remedy that will be effectual; and I hope and believe that, in such a contingency, some will be devised that may preserve the harmony and perpetuate the blessings of the Union.

It has been alleged that there will be an augmentation, instead of a diminution of revenue, under the operation of this bill. I feel quite confident of the reverse; but it is sufficient to say that both contingencies are carefully provided for in the bill, without affecting the protected articles.

The gentleman from Massachusetts dislikes the measure, because it commands the concurrence of those who have been hitherto opposed, in regard to the tariff, and is approved by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] as well as by myself. Why, sir, the gentleman has told us that he is not opposed to any compromise. Will he be pleased to say how any compromise can be effected, without a concurrence between those who had been previously divided, and taking some medium between the two extremes? The wider the division may have been, so much the better for the compromise, which ought to be judged of by its nature and by its terms, and not solely by those who happen to vote for it. It is an adjustment to which both the great interests in this country may accede, without either being dishonored. The triumph of neither is complete. Each, for the sake of peace, harmony, and union, makes some concessions. The South has contended that every vestige of protection should be eradicated from the statute book, and the revenue standard forthwith adopted. In assenting to this bill, it waives that pretension; yields to reasonable protection for nine years; and consents, in consideration of the maximum of twenty per cent. to be subsequently applied, to discriminations below it, cash duties, home valuations, and a long list of free articles. The North and West have contended for the practical application of the principle of protection, regulated by no other limit than the necessary wants of the country. If they accede to this adjustment, they agree, in consideration of the stability and certainty which nine years' duration of a favorite system of policy affords, and of the other advantages which have been enumerated, to come down in 1842 to a limit not exceeding twenty per cent. Both parties, animated by a desire to avert the evils which might flow from carrying out into all their consequences the cherished system of either, have met upon common ground, made mutual and friendly concessions, and I trust, and sincerely believe, that neither will have hereafter occasion to regret, as neither can justly reproach the other with what may be now done.

This, or some other measure of conciliation, is now more than ever necessary, since the passage, through the Senate, of the enforcing bill. To that bill, if I had been present on the final vote, I should have given my assent, although with great reluctance. I believe this Government not only possessed of the constitutional power, but to be bound, by every consideration, to maintain the authority of the laws. But I deeply regretted the necessity which seemed to me to require the passage of such a bill. And I was far from being without serious apprehensions as to the consequences to which it might lead. I felt no new born zeal in favor of the present administration, of which I now think as I have always thought. I could not vote against the measure; I would not speak in its behalf. I thought it most proper in me to leave to the friends of the administration, and to others who might feel themselves particularly called upon, to defend and sustain a strong measure of the administration. With respect to the series of acts to which the Executive has resorted, in relation to our Southern disturbance, this is not a fit occasion to enter upon a full consideration of them; but I will briefly say, that, although the proclamation is a paper of uncommon ability and eloquence, doing great credit, as a composition, to him who prepared it, and to him who signed it, I think it contains some ultra doctrines, which no party in this country had ventured to assert. With these are mixed up many sound principles and just views of our political systems. If it is to be judged by its effects upon those to whom it was more immediately addressed, it must be admitted to have been ill-timed and unfortunate. Instead of allaying the excitement which prevailed, it increased the exasperation in the infected district, and afforded new and unnecessary causes of discontent and dissatisfaction in the South generally. The message, subsequently transmitted to Congress, communicating the proceedings of South Carolina, and calling for countervailing enactments, was characterized with more prudence and moderation. And, if this unhappy contest is to continue, I sincerely hope that the future conduct of the administration may be governed by wise and cautious counsels, and a parental forbearance. But when the highest degree of animosity exists; when both parties, however unequal, have arrayed themselves for the conflict, who can tell when, by the indiscretion of subordinates, or other unforeseen causes, the bloody struggle may commence? In the midst of magazines, who knows when the fatal spark may produce a terrible explosion? And the battle once begun, where is its limit? What latitude will circumscribe its rage? Who is to command our armies? When, and where, and how is the war to cease? In what condition will the peace leave the American system, the American Union, and, what is more than all, American liberty? I cannot profess to have a confidence, which I have not, in this administration; but if I had all confidence in it, I should still wish to pause, and, if possible, by any honorable adjustment, to prevent awful consequences, the extent of which no human wisdom can foresee.

It appears to me, then, Mr. President, that we ought not to content ourselves with passing the enforcing bill only. Both that and the bill of peace seem to me to be required for the good of our country. The first will satisfy all who love order and law, and disapprove the inadmissible doctrine of nullification. The last will soothe those who love peace and concord, harmony and union. One demonstrates the power and the disposition to vindicate the authority and supremacy of the laws of the Union; the other offers that which, if it be accepted in the fraternal spirit in which it is tendered, will supersede the necessity of the employment of all force.

There are some who say, let the tariff go down; let our manufactures be prostrated, if such be the pleasure, at another session, of those to whose hands the Government of this country is confided; let bankruptcy and ruin be spread over the land; and let resistance to the laws, at all hazards, be subdued. Sir, they take counsel from their passions. They anticipate a terrible reaction from the downfall of the tariff, which would ultimately re-establish it upon a firmer basis than ever. But it is these very agitations, these mutual irritations between brethren of the same family, it is the individual distress and general ruin that would necessarily follow the overthrow of the tariff, that ought, if possible, to be prevented. Besides, are we certain of this reaction? Have we not been disappointed in it as to other measures heretofore? But suppose, after a long and embittered struggle, it should come, in what relative condition would it find the parts of this confederacy? In what state our ruined manufactures?

[SENATE.]

When they should be laid low, who, amidst the fragments of the general wreck, scattered over the face of the land, would have courage to engage in fresh enterprises, under a new pledge of the violated faith of the Government? If we adjourn, then, without passing this bill, having intrusted the Executive with vast powers to maintain the laws, should he be able by the next session to put down all opposition to them, will he not, as a necessary consequence of success, have more power than ever to put down the tariff also? Has he not said that the South is oppressed, and its burdens ought to be relieved? And will he not feel himself bound, after he shall have triumphed, (if triumph he may in a civil war,) to appease the discontents of the South by a modification of the tariff, in conformity with its wishes and demands? No, sir; no, sir; let us save the country from the most dreadful of all calamities, and let us save its industry, too, from threatened destruction. Statesmen should regulate their conduct and adapt their measures to the exigencies of the times in which they live. They cannot, indeed, transcend the limits of the constitutional rule; but, with respect to those systems of policy which fall within its scope, they should arrange them according to the interests, the wants, and the prejudices of the people. Two great dangers threaten the public safety. The true patriot will not stop to inquire how they have been brought about, but will fly to the deliverance of his country.

The difference between the friends and the foes of the compromise under consideration is, that they would, in the enforcing act, send forth alone a flaming sword; we would send out that also, but along with it the olive branch, as a messenger of peace. They cry out, the law! the law! the law! Power! power! power! We, too, reverence the law, and bow to the supremacy of its obligation; but we are in favor of the law executed in mildness, and of power tempered with mercy. They, as we think, would hazard a civil commotion, beginning in South Carolina, and extending God only knows where. While we would vindicate the authority of the Federal Government, we are for peace, if possible, union and liberty. We want no war; above all, no civil war, no family strife. We want to see no sacked cities, no desolated fields, no smoking ruins, no streams of American blood, shed by American arms.

I have been accused of ambition in presenting this measure. Ambition! inordinate ambition! If I had thought of myself only, I should never have brought it forward. I know well the perils to which I expose myself; the risk of alienating faithful and valued friends, with but little prospect of making new ones, if any new ones could compensate for the loss of those whom we have long tried and loved; and the honest misconceptions both of friends and foes. Ambition! If I had listened to its soft and seducing whispers; if I had yielded myself to the dictates of a cold, calculating, and prudential policy, I would have stood still and unmoved. I might even have silently gazed on the raging storm, enjoyed its loudest thunders, and left those who are charged with the care of the vessel of State to conduct it as they could. I have been heretofore often unjustly accused of ambition. Low, grovelling souls, who are utterly incapable of elevating themselves to the higher and nobler duties of pure patriotism; beings, who, forever keeping their own selfish aims in view, decide all public measures by their presumed influence on their aggrandizement, judge me by the venal rule which they prescribe to themselves. I have given to the winds these false accusations, as I consign that which now impeaches my motives. I have no desire for office, not even the highest. The most exacted is but a prison, in which the incarcerated incumbent daily receives his cold, heartless visitants, marks his weary hours, and is cut off from the practical enjoyment of all the blessings of genuine freedom. I am no candidate for any office in the gift of the people of these States, united or separated; I never wish—never expect to be. Pass this bill, tranquilize the country, restore confidence and affection in the Union, and I am willing to go home to Ashland, and renounce public service forever. I should there find, in its groves, under its shades, on its lawns, amidst my flocks and herds, in the bosom of my family, sincerity and truth, attachment and fidelity, and gratitude, which I have not always found in the walks of public life. Yes, I have ambition; but it is the ambition of being the humble instrument, in the hands of Providence, to reconcile a divided people, once more to revive concord and harmony in a distracted land; the pleasing ambition of contemplating the glorious spectacle of a free, united, prosperous, and fraternal people.

[NOTE.—This speech embraces not only what Mr. C. said in reply to Mr. WESTER, but several observations made by him on other occasions, during the progress of the bill.]

Mr. SMITH said this bill did not reduce the revenue one dollar. There would be no reduction, but the importations would be restricted.

After speaking for a few minutes, Mr. S. gave way at half past four, and

Mr. SILSBEE moved that the Senate take a recess until 6 o'clock—Yeas 17, nays 19.

Mr. SMITH then resumed, and went into a review of the various sections of the bill. He agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts that this bill repealed the whole of the ground on which our revenue system was built.

Mr. ROBBINS now moved that the Senate take a recess until 6 o'clock—Yeas 17, nays 17.

The CHAIR voting in the affirmative, it was ordered that the Senate take a recess until 6 o'clock.

On reassembling at 6 o'clock, the Senate resumed the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. BELL, of New Hampshire, said it was not his intention to enter into the discussion of this bill beyond what was necessary to explain the reasons which induced him to give it his support. I am not, said Mr. B., a new convert to the protective system, but have always been its advocate. The earliest opinions which I formed on that subject are the same which I now hold. I have ever believed that it was essentially necessary to the prosperity of our country, that its legislation should protect its own labor and industry against the products of the labor and industry of foreign countries, coming into competition with them in our own markets. This protection is given by every enlightened country to its own citizens, and no country can now adopt a different system without subjecting its own people and its own industry to an oppressive taxation from the foreign countries with which it has commercial intercourse.

I am not, said he, influenced, in giving a support to this bill, by the threatening attitude which one of the States has assumed in relation to this question. I yield to no such motive in the discharge of public duty. I see nothing in the present situation of our country to excite alarm. But I am free to acknowledge that the restoration of peace and quiet to an excited and distracted section of our country is one of the motives which induces me to consent to the modification of the tariff proposed by this bill. Much as I desire to see harmony and fraternal feelings between the different sections of our country restored, I would not purchase it by a surrender of the principle of protection, or by the prostration of any one of the important interests of our country. I do not believe that either can result from the passage of this bill. If I apprehended that its passage would endanger the protective system, it would not receive my support, as I firmly believe that the destruction of this system would bring general and severe distress upon a great majority of the citizens of our country, and would eventually produce a dissolution of the Union. Several of the provisions of the tariff law of 1832 never had my approbation. I opposed its passage, because I thought it partial in the distribution of the protection it afforded to the interests of the different sections of the Union. This bill reduces the duties imposed by the act of 1832 for the protection of the products of our industry, but not to an extent which will materially injure them. Many of its provisions are favorable to the interests of the manufacturers, and such as they have been anxious to obtain. One of the evils from which they have suffered has been the frequent changes made in the laws affecting their pursuits. They have often told us that the instability and incessant changes in our legislation were ruinous to their interests, and have entreated us to adopt a permanent system of legislation in reference to them. This bill contemplates a moderate but permanent system of protection to all the important interests of the country. From its character, and the circumstances under which it will pass, we may safely rely upon its permanency. It has been truly termed a compromise, since it has the assent of those who have heretofore been opposed to protective legislation, and the approbation of a large proportion of those who have been the earliest and firmest supporters of the protective system. It contains no pledge which can restrain a future Congress from making such further modification in favor of the protected articles as experience may show to be necessary to sustain them against foreign competition. Most of them will require no additional protection. After 1840 it is probable that some further protection may be necessary to sustain iron, lead, coal, sugar, raw cotton, and perhaps woollens, against foreign competition. The interests of all sections of the country will be promoted by giving additional protection to these important articles when it shall be seen that they require it; and we may safely rely upon its being given.

No section of the country will hereafter feel the necessity of protection to its staple products more than the Southern States. One half of the habitable globe is fitted by soil and climate for the production of their great staple—cotton; and its cultivation is rapidly extending in other countries as well as in our own. The East Indies alone could supply the markets of the world. The cotton of those countries has not been brought into general use, in consequence of the ignorance of the producers of the means necessary to prepare it for our machinery. The cotton gin has recently been introduced into those countries; and when it shall be brought into general use, it will be impossible for the Southern States to compete with a country so well adapted by soil and climate to the production of cotton, and where the common price of labor does not exceed six cents per day, without a protecting duty higher than will be required for any of our manufactures.

Our manufacturers have suffered frequently and severely from the excessive importation of foreign manufactures beyond what the immediate wants of the country required. The gluts in the market occasioned by such importations have kept prices unsteady, and brought embarrassment and ruin upon our domestic manufacturers operating upon small capitals. The gradual reduction of duties, established by this bill, will put a stop to these excessive importations. The merchant will see that his interest requires that he should proportion his imports to the immediate wants of the country, and will not import with a view to a distant sale, when he knows that such sale must be made at a reduced price. Reduction of price would be inevitable when he has to compete in the market with goods imported on a lower duty. The effect of the considerable and sudden reduction in 1841 and 1842 must so far check and prevent importations, as in a great degree to confine the supply to the home production, and save the home manufactures, during that period, from any considerable reduction in price. The ostensibly considerable reduction of duties which will take place in 1842, will be counterbalanced by the advantages which the domestic manufacturer will derive from the cash duties and the home valuation, which will then take place. By the home valuation, I understand what the words import—the price which the imported goods would sell for in cash, in open market, at the port where they are entered. This market price is ordinarily made up of the price paid for the goods in the foreign market, commissions, freight, insurance, importer's profits, and some, although a varying and uncertain, part of the duty. These several items, added to the twenty per cent. duty, will increase that duty, according to calculations which I have made, and which I believe to be correct, to twenty-five per cent. in all cases, and in some to upwards of thirty per cent. The reduction of the protecting duties proposed by this bill is so moderate and gradual, that the advances we are making in skill and improvement in machinery, the security against glutted markets, the benefit which the manufacturer will derive from the reduction of duties upon many of the imported articles which he uses or consumes, with the advantages resulting from cash duties, and the home valuation, will, when the bill comes into full operation in 1842, leave the manufacturers, generally, with a protection equal to that afforded them by the act of 1832. The manufacturers of cotton, and especially of woollen goods, have always asserted that they were deprived of a large proportion of the protection intended for their benefit by fraudulent foreign invoices, sustained by perjury.

They have estimated the loss of protection from this cause at from ten to twenty per cent. of the whole amount of the duties on the latter article. The home valuation, if rigidly enforced, will put an end to these frauds. When we take into view all the advantages which this bill affords to the woollen manufacture, we cannot estimate its protection at less than thirty per cent.; and this, secured as it will be against frauds, it is believed will be equal to any protection ever afforded it by an ad valorem duty. It is an interest of too much importance to the agriculturist, as well as the manufacturer, to be suffered to decline; and should it be found hereafter to require additional protection, it will doubtless receive it.

Our coarse cottons require no protection. We manufacture them now as cheaply as they are manufactured in any country in Europe. We have exported them for several years, to more than the amount of a million of dollars annually, at a fair profit. The finer descriptions of cotton goods will be protected by a duty of more than twenty-five per cent., an amount equal to the whole expense of the labor required to manufacture them. When we recollect that the water power which we use costs much less than the steam power used in Great Britain in this manufacture, that our establishments are subjected to a much smaller amount in the burden of taxes, and of excises upon articles required for carrying on the manufacture, we cannot doubt that all descriptions of cotton goods will receive a sufficient protection by the provisions of this bill.

It has been said that the mechanics and artisans of our country will be materially injured by the operation of this bill. An attention to its provisions will show that this assertion cannot be sustained. The law of 1832 affords a protection of only twenty-five per cent. to the product of the labor of by far the greater part of our artisans and mechanics. The whole amount of reduction made by this bill is one-half of one per cent., biennially. At the lowest point of reduction it will leave them a protection of twenty-two and a half per cent. This small reduction of two and a half per cent. will, during the time in which it exists, be more than counterbalanced by the advantage which they will derive from a security against glutted markets, and from the reduction of duties upon the articles which they use or consume. When the bill comes into full operation in 1842, they will enjoy a better protection than was given them by the act of 1832. In addition to the duty of twenty per cent., given by the bill, they will derive a benefit by the cash duties and home valuation, equal, at the most moderate calculation, to five per cent. This will make their protection equal to that given by the act of 1832. They will derive a considerable additional protection from the reduction of duties on other imported articles which they use or consume. It will be seen, by recurring to the law of 1832, that the class of manufactures protected by a duty of twenty-five per cent. is very extensive.

It embraces manufactures of iron, with a few exceptions, manufactures of steel, brass, copper, lead, tin, pewter, gilt wares, japanned wares, leather, shoes, carriages, printing types, with a long list of less important manufactures, all of which are amply and permanently protected by this bill. I believe that the bill will, during the next seven years, give adequate protection to all the existing manufactures of the country.

It will give an adequate permanent protection to all, with perhaps one or two exceptions. It will relieve the manufacturers from the dread, danger, and injuries which would continue to result from an incessant agitation of this question. It will restore quiet and harmony to those sections of the country which have been disturbed and agitated by it. It is obvious that we must legislate on this subject either at this or the next session. The President has strongly recommended such a reduction of duties as will bring them to the revenue standard. The influence of his recommendation will not be less at the next session than at the present.

I do not believe that a law more favorable to the protection of domestic industry can be obtained at the next session; and there are reasons, which need not be stated, that induce a belief, that if this bill do not pass, one more unfavorable to this interest will probably be passed at that session.

These, said Mr. B., are to my mind justifiable reasons for voting in favor of this bill, as a measure likely to promote the best interests of our country.

Mr. DICKERSON made some remarks in opposition to the bill, and concluded by moving that it be recommitted to the select committee, with instructions so to amend it that the gradual reductions of duties shall not be more unfavorable to those articles which are subject to a specific duty than to such as are subject to ad valorem duties.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, as Senators, we act not in our own right, but as public agents. This acknowledged truth is one of the reasons which induce me to give this measure my support, confident that in so doing I shall accord with the wishes of my constituents, the people of Maine, whose views and opinions it is my duty and my pleasure to consult. In the same truth, also, is found an answer to the suggestion that, in sustaining this bill, we bind ourselves by pledges, which must control our future course of legislative action.

We are agents; the extent of our authority is known to all; it is expressly defined in the constitution; we cannot go beyond it; we cannot bind the people, our successors, nor even ourselves, in our representative character, by this act, further than by all other acts of legislation. While in force it will be law, but at all times subject to revision, modification, or repeal. If the people shall acquiesce in and confirm it; if public sentiment shall be adverse to renewed and continued agitations of the subject; if the various sections of the country shall, on the whole, prefer to settle down in peace and tranquillity upon this basis, agreeable and disagreeable, in some respects, to all—then, indeed, it will be permanent and enduring. But if it shall be the deliberate will of our constituents to change or abolish it, they will do so, and that too by the instrumentality of ourselves or our successors, their servants here. I wish, therefore, to be distinctly understood, that if, from knowledge hereafter acquired, or events which shall hereafter transpire, I shall be convinced that the wishes and interests of my constituents, and of the country, shall require a revision or entire repeal of this act, I shall hold myself not only at liberty, but constrained by public duty, to attempt it. But, at the same time, I must declare my confident belief that the period will not soon arrive when public sentiment will tolerate any material alteration of its provisions, or in effect to disturb the compromise which it embraces. The circumstances under which this law is adopted; the agitations which it quiets; the convulsions which it arrests; the dangers and miseries which it averts, and the harmony and tranquillity which it restores; the magnitude and difficulty of the subject itself; the conflicting opinions and hostile passions which it has generated; and the manifest importance to every branch of domestic industry, that the incalculable mischiefs of fluctuating legislation should cease, and protection, even if more moderate in degree, be established by a permanent and enduring system; and the evident necessity, with reference to the peace and safety of the country, that violent sectional conflicts should not be renewed, are the highest and strongest guaranties for its future immunity from successful attack.

The alleged pledges which have been so strenuously objected to are supposed to be contained in those clauses which declare that certain things may, and others may not, be hereafter provided for by law. Such provisions are not unprecedented. In a bill which has passed this body at the present session, disposing, for a limited time, of the proceeds of the public lands, will be found declarations equally mandatory and restrictive upon future legislation. The second section provides that Congress may, notwithstanding that act, hereafter reduce the price of the public lands, or transfer them to the States. In the fourth section, "the power is reserved of assigning, by law," to new States, their proportion of the proceeds. The fifth section requires Congress, hereafter, annually to appropriate at least eighty thousand dollars for surveys, and prohibits the increase of the minimum price of the public lands. And yet no one objected to that bill as containing pledges constraining our future action; no one doubted, or can doubt, that if it shall become a law, it will at all times be subject, in all its parts, to revision or repeal, at the pleasure of the Legislature.

It has been vehemently urged that this bill abandons the principle of protection, and impairs the constitutional powers of the Government. So far from an abandonment of that principle, it is preserved throughout, and in every section. The first preserves a proportional protection, upon the basis of the act of last session, until the year 1842. The second section is introduced avowedly and palpably for the sole purpose of protecting a certain class of woollens, not only until 1842, but after that period. The third provides for cash duties and home valuations, with a view to protection. The fourth adds to the existing list of free articles until 1842; and the fifth makes further additions after that period, for the purpose of aiding manufactures, by furnishing commodities necessary for their successful prosecution at the cheapest rate, or to make the necessary reduction of the revenue, by removing imposts from non-protected articles, which do not enter into competition with our own productions, and reserving expressly the right of discrimination in the laying of duties. The sixth section provides a remedy for any deficiency or excess of revenue prior to 1842; also preserving the discriminating power. With what justice or propriety, then, can it be said that the bill abandons the principle of protection? Those who seriously insisted upon this must have mistaken the principle for the degree. The amount of protection is diminished. The manner in which this is accomplished has also been the subject of animadversion. For eight years to come it is agreed that it is ample, and receives all that the friends of domestic industry could reasonably desire. But beyond that period the reduction is alleged to be too great, and accomplished by a very objectionable process of equal diminution. In considering this part of the subject, it is to be constantly borne in mind, that it is agreed, on all hands, that some reduction must be made in order to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government. The payment of the public debt has left a considerable annual surplus, which all concede cannot be usefully expended, and must not be permitted to accumulate. Resolutions declaring that there ought to be a reduction of the revenue to the necessities of the Government have been offered by several of the fast friends of the American system, particularly by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, [Mr. WILKINS and Mr. WEBSTER,] and acquiesced in by all. The manner seems now to be the only debatable question. Theoretically, the best mode would doubtless be to take each article by itself, and decide solely with reference to its intrinsic merits, and with an impartial and disinterested view to the best interests of the whole country. But who is there so hallucinated as to imagine that such a course will be actually adopted in practice? Do we not know that each and every item will have its peculiar friends, who, from local interests, will strenuously exert themselves to rescue it from the threatened reduction, to except it from the general system, and throw the depression and loss upon others? Hence inevitably must result a conflict between the various subjects of protection; the friends of each struggling to keep up their own objects of peculiar favor as high as possible, leaving the reduction of the revenue to operate the prostration of others. In such a contest I have good reason to apprehend that the woollens interest, that in which my constituents, the farmers of Maine, and indeed of all New England, have the greatest stake—which, indeed, may be considered the great New England interest in the protective system—will be overwhelmed and sacrificed. I have for years anxiously watched the process of building up and breaking down tariffs; of increasing and diminishing protection; and have observed that there is one interest which seems to have ruled over others, literally as well as metaphorically, with a rod of iron. I well remember that in the year 1826 or '7, when a bill was before the other House to give to the woollens manufactures the protection which had been intended to be raised by the act of 1824, but which had been impaired by the counteracting legislation of Great Britain, all that was contemplated, all that was asked, was a restoration of actual protection, which former laws had designed. The comparative justice of the measure was so plain and palpable, that it seemed to command general favor, until a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, now our minister at the court of St. Petersburg, rose and denominated it a New England bill; a Boston and Salem bill; declaring that, as it proposed no increase of protection for Pennsylvania interests, it ought not to be adopted. From that moment opposition became formidable, and continued to strengthen, until the measure was finally defeated. This gave rise to the celebrated Harrisburg convention, and the tariff of 1828, the formation and progress of which, in the House of Representatives, is well known, in which liberal and excessive favor was extended to iron, and comparatively scanty and meagre protection doled out to the woollens. The Senate made some material corrections. This act carried the protective tariff to its zenith. Its declension commenced, and we all well remember the character and progress of the reducing act of 1832. Discontent in one section of our country had become loud and vehement; petitions and remonstrances, persuasion and denunciation, thickened upon us; concession—concession was the word; compromise and conciliation were in the mouths of gentlemen on both sides, among whom the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] was not the least prominent. A sacrifice was to be made to calm the storm of sectional discontent; and what was the offering? Was it iron, which is of such universal demand not only at the South, but in every city, village, and cottage, within the broad borders of these United States? Oh, no; that interest was too strong; the great central political power of Pennsylvania sustained it; but the woollens, the devoted woollens, were the selected victim. The coarse fabrics—negro cloths, as they are sometimes designated—were absolutely, at one fell swoop, brought down to the nominal duty of five per cent.; and all the valuable establishments and meritorious manufacturers engaged in their production immolated to appease the angry and threatening spirit of Southern discontent. Nor was this all; while there was scarcely more than a filing taken off the iron, wool, and the other fabrics of that material, were essentially reduced. The bill, as it came from the other House, was, in this respect, amended in the Senate, to give additional aid to that interest. The other branch disagreed to these amendments; a committee of conference was appointed, and the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKINSON,] who has so long and so ably presided over the Committee on Manufactures, and who, from interest and local position, has always had a peculiar devotion to iron; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] whose eye never winks when that preponderating production of his State is in question; and a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE,] who was the uncompromising enemy of all protection, constituted that committee on the part of the Senate. These were the champions, sent forth by this body, to be the guardians and defenders of the woollens interest in a contest with the House. And how did they bear themselves in the field? Two surrendered at once; and the other, having predetermined to submit, held out but for a moment, and then claimed the merit of having “died hard.” Every amendment of the Senate, in favor of the woollens, was abandoned; and our own committee joined with their opponents in recommending that the House should insist, and the Senate recede, in every particular. Their report was adopted. During the present session we have had further developments. If I may be permitted to allude to the proceedings in the other branch of the National Legislature, we have there seen a bill reported by the standing Committee on Finance, and well understood to be in accordance with the views of the Executive, by which the general system of domestic protection is cut down to the bone; while this favored item of iron is exempted from the general demolition, and touched so lightly as to be but little affected. The report, which ushered in the bill, states that the duties are thereby arranged “at rates of from ten to twenty per cent.,” varying from these, however, in the case of iron. That was to be still left a monument of sparing mercy. The spirit of destruction passed it by. The lightning, which blasts almost every other prominent object, leaves this unscathed, glancing lightly over the great central political power.

The measure before us has the merit of impartiality. My honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] is the first who has had the justice and the courage to present a scheme of equal reduction. And this feature, which has been made the ground of vehement objection, is to me one of its recommendations, because it is the nearest approximation to justice to the wool and woollens of any system which I have seen, or expect to see proposed, from any quarter capable of insuring its adoption. The loudest complaints against this bill are heard from the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and New Jersey, the devoted advocates of iron, which they assure us will be more reduced than other articles. That, sir, is because its protection is now higher than others, beyond all just and due proportion. It amounts to seventy or eighty per cent., or even more. My constituents are great consumers of that article. Our shipping requires an immense quantity; our mills demand much; every mechanic, farmer, and laborer, is a purchaser. There is not a man who drives a plough, or wields a hoe, axe, or a hammer, who raises a hill of potatoes, drives a nail, saws a board, sails a boat, or casts a hook into the sea, who is not in some degree interested in the reduction of the price of iron. Ever since I have had a seat in Congress, I have protested and struggled against this heavy duty. It was one of my strongest objections to the tariff of 1828; and I have ever since sought its material reduction; but it has been hopeless, until the introduction of this bill. I am willing to extend reasonable protection to that article; I would by no means prostrate it; but I would set bounds to its exorbitant demands, and terminate its controlling dominion over others. I agree, sir, that a better theoretical mode of reducing the tariff may easily be prepared, and arguments of much force, in the abstract, may be urged against it; but I have no hopes of seeing any better carried into practice. Who that knows any thing of the condition of our country, the conflicting opinions, the opposing interests, the warring prejudices, the raging passions of different sections; who that sees that the various and immense local interests involved in the tariff may be made the elements of political combinations, appropriated as the trading capital of bargaining politicians, can expect a system of reduction by the selection of items for specific duties, either by the present or next Congress, which will be theoretically correct or practically just? As well might you expect a ship to cross the Atlantic, amid varying currents and conflicting storms, upon a straight line, laid down with mathematical correctness in the calmness of the closet. No, sir; since this difficult and arduous voyage must be made, let us apply all our sagacity to adapt our course wisely and prudently to the state of the elements by which we must be borne along, and which cannot be subjected to our control. But the greatest of all recommendations of this measure is, that it promises peace, harmony, and tranquillity to this agitated and distracted country, the preservation of this invaluable Union, this great temple of human liberty, the citadel of the rights of mankind. It is the bow of promise in the troubled sky; the darkening and lowering clouds will be dispersed; the murmurings of the coming tempest will cease; and we may hope that halcyon days of calmness and peace, of mutual confidence and paternal regard, will again return, and the star-spangled banner, the glorious ensign of our glorious Union, forever wave over a united, free, prosperous, and happy people.

Mr. HOLMES next took the floor on the same side of the question, and, after a speech of about fifteen minutes, was succeeded by

Mr. DICKERSON, who again explained his views in opposition to the passage of the bill. He continued his argument for about half an hour; when

Mr. CLAY rose and stated, that inasmuch as it was represented that the House of Representatives had just now passed a bill, similar, if not identical, in its provisions to the one before the Senate, and it was believed it would, to-morrow, be presented to the Senate to sanction, it would obviate the reasons for a longer continuance of a laborious day's session of this body, and also supersede the objections of some Senators, who believed the Senate was not the proper place for the origin of this bill. He, therefore, moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was carried, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

MR. CALHOUN'S RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions heretofore introduced by Mr. CALHOUN, declaratory of the nature and power of this Government, being the special order of the day, were taken up.

Mr. CALHOUN rose in their support. When, said he, the bill, with which the resolutions are connected, was under discussion, the Senator from Massachusetts thought proper to give his remarks a personal bearing in reference to myself. I had said nothing to justify this course on the part of that gentleman. I had, it is true, denounced the bill in strong language, but not stronger than the rules which govern parliamentary proceedings permit; nor stronger than the character of the bill, and its bearing on the State which it is my honor to represent, justified. I am at a loss to understand what motive governed the Senator, in giving a personal character to his remarks. If he intended any thing unkind—[Here Mr. WEBSTER said, audibly, Certainly not; and Mr. C. replied,] I will not then say what I intended, if such had been his motives; but still I must be permitted to ask, if he intended nothing unkind, what was the object of the Senator? Was his motive to strengthen a cause which he feels to be weak, by giving the discussion a personal direction? If such was his motive, his experience as a debater ought to have taught him that it was one of those weak devices which seldom fails to react on those who resort to it. If his motive was to acquire popularity, by attacking one who voluntarily, and from a sense of duty—from a deep conviction that liberty and the constitution were at stake—had identified himself with an unpopular question, I would say to him, that a true sense of dignity would have impelled him in an opposite direction. Among the possible motives which might have influenced him, there is another, to the imputation of which he is exposed, but which certainly I will not attribute to him—that his motive was to propitiate in a certain high quarter; a quarter in which he must know that no offering could be more acceptable than the immolation of the character of him who now addresses you. But whatever may have been the motive of the Senator, I can assure him that I will not follow his example. I never had any inclination to gladiatorial exhibitions in the halls of legislation; and if I now had, I certainly would not indulge them on so solemn a question; a question, which, in the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, as expressed in debate, involves the Union of these States; and, in mine, the liberty and the constitution of the country. Before, however, I conclude the prefatory observations, I must allude to the remark which the Senator made at the termination of the argument of my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER.] I understood the Senator to say that, if I chose to put at issue his character for consistency, he stood prepared to vindicate his course. I assure the Senator that I have no idea of calling in question his consistency, or that of any other member of this body. It is a subject in which I feel no concern; but if I am to understand the remark of the Senator as intended indirectly as a challenge to put in issue the consistency of my course as compared to his own, I have to say that, although I do not accept of his challenge, yet, if he should think proper to make a trial of character on that or any other point connected with our public conduct, and will select a suitable occasion, I stand prepared to vindicate my course, as compared with his, or that of any other member of this body, for consistency of conduct, purity of motive, and devoted attachment to the country and its institutions.

Having made these remarks, which have been forced upon me, I shall now proceed directly to the subject before the Senate; and in order that it may, with all its bearings, be fully understood, I must go back to the period at which I introduced the resolutions. They were introduced in connexion with the bill which has passed this House, and is now pending before the other. That bill was couched in general terms, without naming South Carolina or any other State, though it was understood, and avowed by the committee, as intended to act directly on her.

Believing that the Government had no right to use force in the controversy, and that the attempt to introduce it rested upon principles utterly subversive of the constitution and the sovereignty of the States, I drew up the resolutions, and introduced them expressly with the view to test those principles, with a desire that they should be discussed and voted on before the bill came up for consideration. The majority ordered otherwise. The resolutions were laid on the table, and the bill taken up for discussion. Under this arrangement, which it was understood originated with the committee that reported the bill, I, of course, concluded that its members would proceed in the discussion, and explain the principles, and the necessity for the bill, before the other Senators would enter into the discussion, and particularly those from South Carolina. Understanding, however, that by the arrangement of the committee, it was allotted to the Senator from Tennessee to close the discussion on the bill, I waited to the last moment in expectation of hearing from the Senator from Massachusetts. He is a member of the committee. But, not hearing from him, I rose to speak to the bill, and, as soon as I had concluded, the Senator from Massachusetts rose—I will not say to reply to me, and certainly not to discuss the bill, but the resolutions which had been laid on the table, as I have stated. I do not state these facts in the way of complaint, but in order to explain my own course. The Senator having directed his argument against my resolutions, I felt myself compelled to seize the first opportunity to call them up from the table, and to assign a day for their discussion, in the hope not only that the Senate would hear me in their vindication, but would also afford me an opportunity of taking the sense of this body on the great principles on which they are based.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in his argument against the resolutions, directed his attack almost exclusively against the first, on the ground, I suppose, that it was the basis of the other two, and that, unless the first could be demolished, the others would follow of course. In this he was right. As plain and as simple as the facts contained in the first are, they cannot be admitted to be true, without admitting the doctrines for which I, and the State I represent, contend. He [Mr. W.] commenced his attack with a verbal criticism on the resolution, in the course of which he objected strongly to two words, "constitutional" and "accede." To the former, on the ground that the word, as used, (constitutional compact,) was obscure; that it conveyed no definite meaning; and that the constitution was a noun substantive, and not an adjective. I regret that I have exposed myself to the criticism of the Senator. I certainly did not intend to use any expression of a doubtful sense; and if I have done so, the Senator must attribute it to the poverty of my language, and not to design. I trust, however, that the Senator will excuse me, when he comes to hear my apology. In matters of criticism, authority is of the highest importance; and I have an authority of so high a character, in this case, for using the expression which he considers so obscure and so unconstitutional, as will justify me even in his eyes. It is no less than the authority of the Senator himself—given on a solemn occasion, (the discussion on Mr. Foot's resolution,) and doubtless with great deliberation, after having duly weighed the force of the expression.

[Here Mr. C. read from WEBSTER'S speech in reply to Mr. HAYNE, in the Senate of the United States, delivered January 26, 1830, as follows:

"The domestic slavery of the South I leave where I find it—in the hands of their own Governments. It is their affair, not mine. Nor do I complain of the peculiar effect which the magnitude of that population has had in the distribution of power under the Federal Government. We know, sir, that the representation of the States in the other House is not equal. We know that great advantage, in that respect, is enjoyed by the slaveholding States; and we know, too, that the intended equivalent for that advantage, that is to say, the imposition of direct taxes in the same ratio, has become merely nominal; the habit of the Government being almost invariably to collect its revenues from other sources and in other modes. Nevertheless, I do not complain; nor would I countenance any movement to alter this arrangement of representation. It is the original bargain—the compact; let it stand; let the advantage of it be fully enjoyed. The Union itself is too full of benefits to be hazarded in propositions for changing its original basis. I go for the constitution as it is, and for the Union as it is. But I am resolved not to submit, in silence, to accusations, either against myself individually, or against the North, wholly unfounded and unjust—accusations which impute to us a disposition to evade the CONSTITUTIONAL COMPACT, and to extend the power of the Government over the internal laws and domestic condition of the States."]

It will be seen, by this extract, that the Senator not only uses the phrase "constitutional compact," which he now so much condemns, but, what is still more important, he calls the constitution itself a compact—a bargain; which contains important admissions, having a direct and powerful bearing on the main issue involved in the discussion, as will appear in the course of his remarks. But, as strong as his objection is to the word "constitutional," it is still stronger to the word "accede," which, he thinks, has been introduced into the resolution with some deep design—as, I suppose, to entrap the Senate into an admission of the doctrine of State rights. Here, again, I must shelter myself under authority. But I suspect that the Senator, by a sort of instinct, (for our instincts often strangely run before our knowledge,) had a prescience, which would account for his aversion to the word, that this authority was no less than Thomas Jefferson himself, the great apostle of the doctrine of State rights. The word was borrowed from him. It was taken from the Kentucky resolution, as well as the substance of the resolution itself. But I trust that I may neutralize whatever aversion the authorship of this word may have excited in the mind of the Senator, by the introduction of another authority—that of Washington himself—who, in his speech to Congress, speaking of the admission of North Carolina into the Union, uses this very term, which was repeated by the Senate in their reply. Yet, in order to narrow the ground between the Senator and myself as much as possible, I will accommodate myself to his strange antipathy against the two unfortunate words, by striking them out of the resolution, and substituting in their place those very words which the Senator himself has designated as constitutional phrases. In the place of that abhorred adjective "constitutional," I will insert the very noun substantive "constitution;" and in the place of the word "accede," I will insert the word "ratify," which he designates as the proper term to be used.

Let us now see how the resolution stands, and how it will read after these amendments. Here, Mr. C. said the resolution, as introduced, reads:

Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a constitutional compact, to which the people of each State acceded as a separate and sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a union between the States ratifying the same.

As proposed to be amended:

Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a compact, under the title of the constitution of the United States, which the people of each State ratified as a separate and sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a union between the States ratifying the same.

Where, sir, I ask, is that plain case of revolution? Where that hiatus, as wide as the globe, between the premises and conclusion, which the Senator proclaimed would be apparent, if the resolution was reduced into constitutional language? For my part, with my poor powers of conception, I cannot perceive the slightest difference between the resolution as first introduced, and as it is proposed to be amended in conformity to the views of the Senator. And, instead of that hiatus between the premises and conclusion, which seems to startle the imagination of the Senator, I can perceive nothing but a continuous and solid surface, sufficient to sustain the magnificent superstructure of State rights. Indeed, it seems to me that the Senator's vision is distorted by the medium through which he views every thing connected with the subject; and that the same distortion which has presented to his imagination this hiatus, as wide as the globe, where not even a fissure exists, also presented that beautiful and classical image of a strong man struggling in a bog, without the power of extricating himself, and incapable of being aided by any friendly hand; while, instead of struggling in a bog, he stands on the everlasting rock of truth.

Having now noticed the criticism of the Senator, I shall proceed to meet and repel the main assault on the resolution. He directed his attack against the strong point, the very horn of the citadel of State rights. The Senator clearly perceived that if the constitution be a compact, it was impossible to deny the assertions contained in the resolutions, or to resist the consequences which I had drawn from them; and, accordingly, he directed his whole fire against that point; but, after so vast an expenditure of ammunition, not the slightest impression, so far as I can perceive, has been made. At least, the work is not reduced to that heap of ruins to which the fire of the French artillery reduced the citadel of Antwerp. I will not, however, pretend to decide whether this is owing to the difference in the skill and force of the assault, or in the difference of the strength of the works. But, to drop the simile, after a careful examination of the notes which I took of what the Senator said, I am now at a loss to know whether, in the opinion of the Senator, our constitution is a compact or not, though the almost entire argument of the Senator was directed to that point. At one time he would seem to deny directly and positively that it was a compact; while at another he would appear, in language not less strong, to admit that it was.

I have collated all that the Senator has said upon this point; and that what I have stated may not appear exaggerated, I will read his remarks in juxtaposition. He said that "The constitution means a government, not a compact. Not a constitutional compact, but a government. If compact, it rests on plighted faith, and the mode of redress would be to declare the whole void. States may secede, if a league or compact."

I thank the Senator for these admissions, which I intend to use hereafter.

Here Mr. C. proceeded to read from his notes:

"The States agreed that each should participate in the sovereignty of the other."

Certainly, a very correct conception of the constitution; but when did they make that agreement but by the constitution? and how could they agree but by compact?

"The system, not a compact between States, in their sovereign capacity, but a government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, and creating individual relations between itself and the citizens."

This the Senator lays down as a leading fundamental principle to sustain his doctrine, and I must say, by a strange confusion and uncertainty of language; not, certainly, to be explained by any want of command of the most appropriate words on his part.

"It does not call itself a compact, but a constitution. The constitution rests on compact, but it is no longer a compact."

I would ask to what compact does the Senator refer, as that on which the constitution rests? Before the adoption of the present constitution, the States had formed but one compact, and that was the old confederation; and certainly the gentleman does not intend to assert that the present constitution rests upon that. What, then, is his meaning? What can it be, but that the constitution itself is a compact? and how will his language read when fairly interpreted, but that the constitution was a compact, but is no longer a compact? It had, by some means or other, changed its nature, or become defunct.

He next states that "A man is almost untrue to his country who calls the constitution a compact."

I fear that the Senator, in calling it a compact, a bargain, has called down this heavy denunciation on his own head. He finally states that "It is founded on compact, but not a compact results from it."

To what are we to attribute this strange confusion of words? The Senator has a mind of high order, and perfectly trained to the most exact use of language. No man knows better the precise import of the words he uses. The difficulty is not in him, but in his subject. He who undertakes to prove that this constitution is not a compact, undertakes a task which, be his strength ever so great, he must be oppressed by its weight. Taking the whole of the argument of the Senator together, I would say that it is his impression that the constitution is not a compact, and will now proceed to consider the reason which he has assigned for this opinion.

He thinks there is an incompatibility between constitution and compact. To prove this, he adduces the words "ordain and establish," contained in the preamble of the constitution. I confess I am not capable of perceiving in what manner these words are incompatible with the idea that the constitution is a compact. The Senator will admit that a single State may ordain a compact; and where is the difficulty, where the incompatibility of two States concurring in ordaining and establishing a constitution? As between the States themselves, the instrument would be a compact; but in reference to the Government, and those on whom it operates, it would be ordained and established—ordained and established by the joint authority of two, instead of the single authority of one.

The next argument which the Senator advances to show that the language of the constitution is irreconcilable with the idea of its being a compact, is taken from that portion of the instrument which imposes prohibitions on the authority of the States. He said that the language used in imposing the prohibitions is the language of a superior to an inferior; and that, therefore, it was not the language of a compact, which implies the equality of the parties. As a proof, the Senator cited the several provisions of the constitution which provide that no State shall enter into treaties of alliance and confederation, lay imposts, &c. without the assent of Congress. If he had turned to the articles of the old confederation, which he acknowledges to have been a compact, he would find that those very prohibitory articles of the constitution are borrowed from that instrument; that the language which he now considers as implying superiority, was taken verbatim from it. If he had extended his researches still farther, he would find that it is the habitual language used in treaties, whenever a stipulation is made against the performance of any act. Among many instances which I could cite, if it were necessary, I refer the Senator to the celebrated treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay with Great Britain in 1793, and in which the very language used in the constitution is employed.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

To prove that the constitution is not a compact, the Senator next observes, that it stipulates nothing; and asks, with an air of triumph, where are the evidences of the stipulations between the States? I must express my surprise at this interrogatory, coming from so intelligent a source. Has the Senator never seen the ratification of the constitution by the several States? Did he not cite them on this very occasion? Do they contain no evidence of this stipulation on the part of the States? Nor is the assertion less strange, that the constitution contains no stipulation. So far from regarding it in the light in which the Senator regards it, I consider the whole instrument but a mass of stipulation. What is that but a stipulation to which the Senator refers, when he states, in the course of his argument, that each State had agreed to participate in the sovereignty of the others?

But the principal argument on which the Senator relied, to show that the constitution is not a compact, rests on the provision in that instrument which declares that "this constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under their authority, are the supreme law of the land." He asked, with marked emphasis, can a compact be the supreme law of the land? I ask, in return, whether treaties are not compacts; and whether treaties, as well as the constitution, are not declared to be the supreme law of the land? His argument, in fact, as conclusively proves that treaties are not compacts, as it does that this constitution is not a compact. I might rest this point on this decisive answer; but as I desire to leave not a shadow of doubt on this important point, I shall follow the gentleman in the course of his reasoning.

He defines a constitution to be a fundamental law, which organizes the Government, and points out the mode of its action. I will not object to the definition, though, in my opinion, a more appropriate one, or at least one better adapted to American ideas, could be given. My objection is not to the definition, but to the attempt to prove that the fundamental laws of a State cannot be a compact, as the Senator seems to suppose. I hold the very reverse to be the case; and that, according to the most approved writers on the subject of government, these very fundamental laws, which are now stated not only not to be compacts, but inconsistent with the very idea of compacts, are held invariably to be compacts, and in that character are distinguished from the ordinary laws of the country. I will cite a single authority, which is full and explicit on this point, from a writer of the highest repute.

Burlamaqui says, vol. ii, part 1, chap. 1, sec. 35, 36, 37, 38: "It entirely depends upon a free people to invest the Sovereigns, whom they place over their heads, with an authority, either absolute, or limited by certain laws. These regulations, by which the supreme authority is kept within bounds, are called the fundamental laws of the State.

"The fundamental laws of a State, taken in their full extent, are not only the decrees by which the entire body of the nation determine the form of government, and the manner of succeeding to the crown, but are likewise covenants between the people and the person on whom they confer the sovereignty, which regulate the manner of governing, and by which the supreme authority is limited.

"These regulations are called fundamental laws, because they are the basis, as it were, and foundation of the State, on which the structure of the Government is raised, and because the people look upon these regulations as their principal strength and support.

"The name of laws, however, has been given to these regulations in an improper and figurative sense; for, properly speaking, they are real covenants. But as those covenants are obligatory between the contracting parties, they have the force of laws themselves."

The same—2d vol. part 2, chap. 1, sec. 19 and 22, in part: "The whole body of the nation, in whom the supreme power originally resides, may regulate the Government by a fundamental law, in such manner as to commit the exercise of the different parts of the supreme power to different persons or bodies, who may act independently of each other in regard to the rights committed to them, but still subordinate to the laws from which those rights are derived."

"And these fundamental laws are real covenants, or what the civilians call pacta conventa, between the different orders of the republic, by which they stipulate that each shall have a particular part of the sovereignty, and that this shall establish the form of government. It is evident that by these means each of the contracting parties acquires a right, not only of exercising the power granted to it, but also of preserving that original right."

A reference to the constitution of Great Britain, with which we are better acquainted than with that of any other European Government, will show that it is a compact. Magna Charta may certainly be reckoned among the fundamental laws of that kingdom. Now, although it did not assume originally the form of a compact, yet, before the breaking up of the meeting of the barons, who imposed it on King John, it was reduced into the form of a covenant, and duly signed by Robert Fitzwalter and others on the one part, and the King on the other.

But we have a more decisive proof that the constitution of England is a compact, in the resolution of the Lords and Commons in 1688, which declared that "King James the Second, having endeavored to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between the King and the People; and having, by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons, violated the fundamental law, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, hath abdicated the Government, and that the throne is thereby become vacant."

But why should I refer to writers upon the subject of government, or inquire into the constitutions of foreign States, when there are such decisive proofs that our constitution is a compact. On this point the Senator is estopped. I borrow from the gentleman, and thank him for the word. His adopted State, which he so ably represents on this floor, and his native State, (the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire,) both declared, in their ratification of the constitution, that it was a compact. The ratification of Massachusetts is in the following words:

"In Convention of the Delegates of the People of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, February 6, 1788.

"The convention having impartially discussed and fully considered the constitution of the United States of America, reported to Congress by the convention of delegates from the United States of America, and submitted to us by a resolution of the General Court of said Commonwealth, passed the 25th day of October last past; and acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the goodness of the Supreme Ruler of the universe, in affording the people of the United States, in the course of his providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud or surprise, of entering into an explicit and solemn compact with each other, by assenting to and ratifying a new constitution, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and of Massachusetts, do assent to and ratify the said constitution for the United States of America."

The ratification of New Hampshire is taken from that of Massachusetts, and almost in the same words. But proof, if possible, still more decisive, may be found in the celebrated resolutions of Virginia, on the alien and sedition law, in 1798, and the responses of Massachusetts and the other States. Those resolutions expressly assert that the constitution is a compact between the States, in the following language:

"That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact, to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them.

"That the General Assembly doth also express its deep regret that a spirit has in sundry instances been manifested by the Federal Government to enlarge its powers by forced constructions of the constitutional charter, which defines them; and that indications have appeared of a design to expound certain general phrases, (which having been copied from the very limited grant of powers in the former articles of confederation, were the less liable to be misconstrued,) so as to destroy the meaning and effect of the particular enumeration, which necessity explains, and limits the general phrases, and so as to consolidate the States by degrees into one sovereignty, the obvious tendency and inevitable result of which would be to transform the present republican system of the United States into an absolute, or, at best, a mixed monarchy."

They were sent to the several States: We have the reply of Delaware, New York, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts, not one of which contradicts this important assertion on the part of Virginia; and, by their silence, they all acquiesce in its truth. The case is still stronger against Massachusetts, which expressly recognises the fact that the constitution is a compact.

In her answer, she says—[Here Mr. C. read from the answer of Massachusetts as follows:]

"But they deem it their duty solemnly to declare, that while they hold sacred the principle, that consent of the people is the only pure source of just and legitimate power, they cannot admit the right of the State Legislatures to denounce the administration of that Government to which the people themselves, by solemn compact, have exclusively committed their national concerns. That, although a liberal and enlightened vigilance among the people is always to be cherished, yet an unreasonable jealousy of the men of their choice, and a recurrence to measures of extremity upon groundless or trivial pretexts, have a strong tendency to destroy all rational liberty at home, and to deprive the United States of the most essential advantages in their relations abroad. That this Legislature are persuaded that the decision of all cases in law or equity, arising under the constitution of the United States, and the construction of all laws made in pursuance thereof, are exclusively vested by the people in the judicial courts of the United States.

"That the people, in that solemn compact which is declared to be the supreme law of the land, have not constituted the State Legislatures the judges of the acts or measures of the Federal Government, but have confided to them the power of proposing such amendments to the constitution as shall appear to them necessary to the interests, or conformable to the wishes, of the people whom they represent."

Now, I ask the Senator himself—I put it to his candor to say, if South Carolina be estopped on the subject of the protective system, because Mr. C. and Mr. Smith proposed a moderate duty on hemp, or some other article—I know not what, nor do I care—with a view of encouraging its production, (of which motion, I venture to say, not one individual in a hundred in the State ever heard,) whether he and Massachusetts, after this clear, full, and solemn recognition, that the constitution is a compact, both on his part and that of his State, be not forever estopped on this important point?

There remains one more of the Senator's arguments to prove that the constitution is not a compact, to be considered. He says it is not a compact, because it is a Government; which he defines to be an organized body, possessed of the will and power to execute its purposes, by its own proper authority; and which he says bears not the slightest resemblance to a compact. But I would ask the Senator, who ever considered a Government, when spoken of as the agent to execute the powers of the constitution, as distinct from the constitution itself, as a compact?

In that light it would be a perfect absurdity. It is true that, in general and loose language, it is often said that the Government is a compact—meaning the constitution which created it, and vested it with authority to execute the powers contained in the instrument; but when the distinction is drawn between the constitution and the Government, as the Senator has done, it would be as ridiculous to call the Government a compact, as to call an individual, appointed to execute provisions of the contract, a contract; and not less so, to suppose that there could be the slightest resemblance between them. In connexion with this point, the Senator, to prove that the constitution is not a compact, asserts that it is wholly independent of the State; and pointedly declares that the States have not a right to touch a hair of its head; and this, with that provision in the constitution, that three-fourths of the States have a right to alter, change, or amend, or even to abolish it, staring him in the face.

I have examined all of the arguments of the Senator intended to prove that the constitution is not a compact; and I trust I have shown, by the clearest demonstration, that his arguments are perfectly inconclusive, and that his assertion is against the clearest and most solemn evidence—evidence of record; and of such a character that they ought to close his lips forever.

I turn now to consider the other, and apparently contradictory aspect in which the Senator presented this part of the subject. He means that one in which he states that the Government is founded in compact, but is no longer a compact. I have already remarked that no other interpretation could be given to this assertion, except that the constitution was once a compact, but is no longer so. There is a vagueness and indistinctness in this part of the Senator's argument, which left me altogether uncertain as to its real meaning. If he meant, as I presume he did, that the compact is an executed, and not an executory one; that its object was to create a Government, and to invest it with a proper authority; and that, having executed this office, it had performed its functions, and with it had ceased to exist; then we have the extraordinary avowal that the constitution is a dead letter—that it has ceased to have any binding effect, or any practical influence or operation.

It had, indeed, often been charged that the constitution had become a dead letter; that it was continually violated, and had lost all its control over the Government; but no one had ever before been bold enough to advance a theory on the avowed basis that it was an executed, and therefore an extinct instrument. I will not seriously attempt to refute an argument which to me appears so extravagant. I had thought that the constitution was to endure forever; and that, so far from its being an executed contract, it contained great trust powers for the benefit of those who created it, and all future generations, which never could be finally executed during the existence of the world, if our Government should so long endure.

I will now return to the first resolution, to see how the issue stands between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself. It contains three propositions: first, that the constitution is a compact; second, that it was formed by the States, constituting distinct communities; and lastly, that it is a subsisting and binding compact between the States. How do these three propositions now stand? The first, I trust, has been satisfactorily established; the second, the Senator has admitted—faintly, indeed, but still he has admitted it to be true. This admission is something. It is so much gained by discussion. Three years ago even this was a contested point. But I cannot say that I thank him for the admission—we owe it to the force of truth. The fact that these States were declared to be free and independent States at the time of their independence; that they were acknowledged to be so by Great Britain in the treaty which terminated the war of the revolution, and secured their independence; that they were recognised in the same character in the old articles of the confederation; and, finally, that the present constitution was formed by a convention of the several States, afterwards submitted to them for their ratification, and was ratified by them separately, each for itself, and each by its own act binding its citizens, formed a body of facts too clear to be denied, and too strong to be resisted.

It now remains to consider the third and last proposition contained in the resolution; that it is a binding and a subsisting compact between the States. The Senator was not explicit on this point. I understood him, however, as asserting, that, though formed by the States, the constitution was not binding between the States as distinct communities, but between the American people in the aggregate; who, in consequence of the adoption of the constitution, according to the opinion of the Senator, became one people, at least to the extent of the delegated powers. This would, indeed, be a great change. All acknowledge that previous to the adoption of the constitution, the States constituted distinct and independent communities, in full possession of their sovereignty; and, surely, if the adoption of the constitution was intended to effect a great and important change in their condition, which the theory of the Senator supposes, some evidence of it ought to be found in the instrument itself. It professes to be a careful and full enumeration of all the powers which the States delegated, and of every modification of their political condition. The Senator said that he looked to the constitution in order to ascertain its real character; and surely he ought to look to the same instrument in order to ascertain what changes were in fact made in the political condition of the States and the country. But, with the exception of "we, the people of the United States," in the preamble, he has not pointed out a single indication in the constitution of the great change which he conceives has been effected in this respect.

Now, sir, I intend to prove that the only argument on which the gentleman relies on this point must utterly fail him. I do not intend to go into a critical examination of the expression of the preamble to which I have referred. I do not deem it necessary; but, were it so, it might be easily shown that it is at least as applicable to my view of the constitution as to that of the Senator; and that the whole of his argument on this point rests on the ambiguity of the term "thirteen United States," which may mean certain territorial limits, comprehending within them the whole of the States and Territories of the Union. In this sense the people of the United States may mean all the people living within these limits, without reference to the States or Territories in which they may reside, or of which they may be citizens; and it is in this sense only that the expression gives the least countenance to the argument of the Senator.

But it may also mean the States united; which inversion alone, without further explanation, removes the ambiguity to which I have referred. The expression, in this sense, obviously means no more than to speak of the people of the several States in their united and confederated capacity; and, if it were requisite, it might be shown that it is only in this sense that the expression is used in the constitution. But it is not necessary. A single argument will forever settle this point. Whatever may be the true meaning of this expression, it is not applicable to the condition of the States as they exist under the constitution, but as it was under the old confederation, before its adoption. The constitution had not yet been adopted; and the States, in ordaining it, could only speak of themselves in the condition in which they then existed, and not in that in which they would exist under the constitution. So that, if the argument of the Senator proves any thing, it proves, not, as he supposes, that the constitution forms the American people into an aggregate mass of individuals, but that such was their political condition, before its adoption, under the old confederation, directly contrary to his argument in the previous part of this discussion.

But I intend not to leave this important point, the last refuge of those who advocate consolidation, even on this conclusive argument. I have shown that the constitution affords not the least evidence of the mighty change of the political condition of the States and the country, which the Senator supposed it operated; and I intend now, by the most decisive proof, drawn from the constitutional instrument itself, to show that no such change was intended; and that the people of the States are united under it as States, and not as individuals. On this point, there is a very important part of the constitution entirely and strangely overlooked by the Senator in this debate, as it is expressed in the first resolution, which furnishes conclusive evidence, not only that the constitution is a compact, but a subsisting compact binding between the States. I allude to the seventh article, which provides that "the ratification of the convention of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the States so ratifying the same." Yes, between the States—a little word means a volume—compacts, not laws, bind between the States; and it here binds not between individuals, but between the States. The States ratify; implying, as strong as language can make it, that the constitution is what I have asserted it to be—a compact ratified by the States, and a subsisting compact binding the States ratifying it.

But, sir, I will not leave this point, all important in establishing the true theory of our Government, on this argument alone, demonstrative and conclusive as I hold it to be. Another, not much less powerful, but of a different character, may be drawn from the tenth amended article, which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The article of ratification which I have just cited, informs us that the constitution, which delegates powers, was ratified by the States, and is binding between them. This informs us to whom the powers are delegated—a most important fact in determining the point immediately at issue between the Senator and myself. According to his views, the constitution created a union between individuals, (if the solecism may be allowed,) and that it formed, at least to the extent of the powers delegated, one people, and not a federal union of the States, as I contend. Or, to express the same idea differently, that the delegation of powers was to the American people in the aggregate, (for it is only by such delegation that they could be made into one people,) and not to the United States; directly contrary to the article just cited, which declares that the powers are delegated to the United States. And here it is worthy of notice, that the Senator cannot shelter himself under the ambiguous phrase “to the people of the United States,” under which he would certainly have taken refuge, had the constitution so expressed it; but, fortunately for the cause of truth and for the great principles of constitutional liberty for which I am contending, “people,” is omitted; thus making the delegation of power clear and unequivocal to the United States, as distinct political communities, and conclusively proving that all the powers delegated are reciprocally delegated by the States to each other, as distinct political communities.

So much for the delegated powers. Now, as all admit, and as it is expressly provided for in the constitution, the reserved powers are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people, none will pretend that, as far as they are concerned, we are one people; though the argument to prove it, however absurd, would be far more plausible than that which goes to show that we are one people to the extent of the delegated powers. This reservation, “to the people,” might, in the hands of subtle and trained logicians, be a peg to hang a doubt upon; and had the expression “to the people” been connected, as fortunately it is not, with the delegated instead of the reserved powers, we should not have heard of this in the present discussion.

I have now established, I hope, beyond the power of controversy, every allegation contained in the first resolution: that the constitution is a compact formed by the people of the several States, as distinct political communities, subsisting and binding between the States in the same character; which brings me to the consideration of the consequences which may be fairly deduced, in reference to the character of our political system, from these established facts.

The first, and most important, is, that they conclusively establish that ours is a federal system; a system of States, arranged in a federal Union, and each retaining its distinct existence and sovereignty. Ours has every attribute which belongs to a federative system. It is founded on compact; it is formed by sovereign communities; and is binding between them in their sovereign capacity. I might appeal, in confirmation of this assertion, to all elementary writers on the subject of government; but will content myself with citing one only. Burlamaqui, quoted with approbation by Judge Tucker, in his Commentary on Blackstone, himself a high authority, says: [Here Mr. C. read from Tucker's Blackstone as follows:]

Extracts from Blackstone's Commentaries.

“Political bodies, whether great or small, if they are constituted by a people formerly independent, and under no civil subjection, or by those who justly claim independence from any civil power they were formerly subject to, have the civil supremacy in themselves, and are in a state of equal right and liberty with respect to all other States, whether great or small. No regard is to be had in this matter to names; whether the body politic be called a kingdom, an empire, a principality, a dukedom, a county, a republic, or free town. If it can exercise justly all the essential parts of civil power within itself, independently of any other person or body politic, and no other hath any right to rescind or annul its acts, it has the civil supremacy, how small soever its territory may be, or the number of its people, and has all the rights of an independent State.

“This independency of States, and their being distinct political bodies from each other, is not obstructed by any alliance or confederacies whatsoever, about exercising jointly any parts of the supreme powers, such as those of peace and war, in league offensive and defensive. Two States, notwithstanding such treaties, are separate bodies and independent.

“These are, then, only deemed politically united when some one person, or council, is constituted with a right to exercise some essential powers for both, and to hinder either from exercising them separately. If any person or council is empowered to exercise all these essential powers for both, they are then one State: such is the state of England and Scotland, since the act of union made at the beginning of the eighteenth century, whereby the two kingdoms were incorporated into one; all parts of the supreme power of both kingdoms being thenceforward united, and vested in the three estates of the realm of Great Britain. By which entire coalition, though both kingdoms retain their ancient laws and usages in many respects, they are as effectually united and incorporated as the several petty kingdoms which composed the heptarchy, before that period.

“But when only a portion of the supreme civil power is vested in one person or council for both, such as that of peace and war, or of deciding controversies between different States or their subjects, whilst each within itself exercises other parts of the supreme power, independently of all others; in this case, they are called systems of States, which Burlamaqui defines to be an assemblage of perfect Governments, strictly united by some common bond, so that they seem to make but a single body with respect to those affairs which interest them in common, though each preserves its sovereignty full and entire, independently of all others. And in this case, he adds, the confederate States engage to each other only to exercise, with common consent, certain parts of the sovereignty, especially that which relates to their mutual defence against foreign enemies. But each of the confederates retains an entire liberty of exercising, as it thinks proper, those parts of the sovereignty which are not mentioned in the treaty of union, as parts that ought to be exercised in common. And of this nature is the American Confederacy, in which each State has assigned the exercise of certain parts of the supreme civil power which they possessed before, (except in common with the other States included in the confederacy,) reserving to themselves all their former powers which are not delegated to the United States by the common bond of union.

“A visible distinction, and not less important than obvious, occurs to our observation in comparing these different kinds of union. The kingdoms of England and Scotland are united into one kingdom; and the two contracting States, by such an incorporate union, are, in the opinion of Judge Blackstone, totally annihilated, without any power of revival; and a third arises from their conjunction, in which all the rights of sovereignty, and particularly that of legislation, are vested. From whence he expresses a doubt whether any infringements of the fundamental and essential conditions of the union would of itself dissolve the union of those kingdoms; though he readily admits that, in the case of a federate alliance, such an infringement would certainly rescind the compact between the confederate States. In the United States of America, on the contrary, each State retains its own antecedent form of government; its own laws, subject to the alteration and control of its own Legislature only; its own executive officers and council of state; its own courts of judicature, its own judges, its own magistrates, civil officers, and officers of the militia; and, in short, its own civil state, or body politic, in every respect whatsoever. And by the express declaration of the twelfth article of the amendments to the constitution, 'the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.' In Great Britain a new civil State is created by the annihilation of two antecedent civil States; in the American States, a general federal council and administration is provided for the joint exercise of such of their several powers as can be more conveniently exercised in that mode than any other; leaving their civil State unaltered, and all other powers which the States antecedently possessed to be exercised by them respectively, as if no union or connexion were established between them.

"The ancient Achaia seems to have been a confederacy founded upon a similar plan; each of those little States had its distinct possessions, territories, and boundaries; each had its Senate or Assembly, its magistrates and judges; and every State sent deputies to the general convention, and had equal weight in all determinations. And most of the neighboring States which, moved by fear of danger, acceded to this confederacy, had reason to felicitate themselves.

"These confederacies, by which several States are united together by a perpetual league of alliance, are chiefly founded upon this circumstance, that each particular people choose to remain their own masters, and yet are not strong enough to make head against a common enemy. The purport of such an agreement usually is, that they shall not exercise some part of the sovereignty thereto specified, without the general consent of each other. For the leagues to which these systems of States owe their rise seem distinguished from others, (so frequent among different States,) chiefly by this consideration: that in the latter each confederate people determine for themselves, by their own judgment, to certain mutual performances, yet so that, in all other respects, they design not in the least to make the exercise of that part of the sovereignty whence these performances proceed dependent on the consent of their allies, or to retrench any thing from their full and unlimited power of governing their own States. Thus we see that ordinary treaties propose, for the most part, as their aim, only some particular advantage of the States thus transacting; their interests happening at present to fall in with each other; but do not produce any lasting union as to the chief management of affairs. Such was the treaty of alliance between America and France, in the year 1778, by which, among other articles, it was agreed that neither of the two parties should conclude either truce or peace with Great Britain, without the formal consent of the other first obtained; and whereby they mutually engaged not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States should be formally or tacitly assured by the treaty or treaties which should terminate the war. Whereas, in these confederacies, of which we are now speaking, the contrary is observable; they being established with this design, that the several States shall forever link their safety one with another, and, in order to their mutual defence, shall engage themselves not to exercise certain parts of their sovereign power, otherwise than by common agreement and approbation. Such were the stipulations, among others, contained in the articles of confederation and perpetual union between the American States, by which it was agreed that no State should, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty with, any King, Prince, or State; nor keep up any vessels of war, or body of forces, in time of peace; nor engage in any war, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, unless actually invaded; nor grant commissions to any ships of war, or letters of marque and reprisal, except after a declaration of war by the United States in Congress assembled; with several others: yet each State, respectively, retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled. The promises made in these two cases here compared, run very differently; in the former, thus: 'I will join you in this particular war as a confederate, and the manner of our attacking the enemy shall be concerted by our common advice; nor will we desist from war, till the particular end thereof, the establishment of the independence of the United States, be obtained.' In the latter, thus: 'None of us who have entered into this alliance will make use of our right as to the affairs of war and peace, except by the general consent of the whole confederacy.' We observed before, that these unions submit only some certain parts of the sovereignty to mutual direction. For it seems hardly possible that the affairs of different States should have so close a connexion, as that all and each of them should look on it as their interest to have no part of the chief Government exercised without the general concurrence. The most convenient method, therefore, seems to be, that the particular States reserve to themselves all those branches of the supreme authority, the management of which can have little or no influence in the affairs of the rest."

Mr. CALHOUN proceeded:

If we compare our present system with the old confederation, which all acknowledge to have been federal in its character, we shall find that it possesses all the attributes which belong to that form of government, as fully and completely as that did. In fact, in this particular, there is but a single difference, and that not essential, as regards the point immediately under consideration, though very important in other respects. The confederation was the act of the State Governments, and formed a union of Governments. The present constitution is the act of the States themselves, or, which is the same thing, of the people of the several States, and forms a union of them as sovereign communities. The States, previous to the adoption of the constitution, were as separate and distinct political bodies as the Governments which represent them; and there is nothing in the nature of things to prevent them from uniting under a compact, in a Federal Union, without being blended in one mass, any more than uniting the Governments themselves, in like manner, without merging them in a single Government. To illustrate what I have stated, by reference to ordinary transactions: The confederation was a contract between agents; the present constitution between the principals themselves; or, to take a more analogous case, one is a league made by ambassadors; the other a league made by sovereigns; the latter no more tending to unite the parties into a single sovereignty than the former. The only difference is in the solemnity of the act, and the force of the obligation.

There indeed results a most important difference, under our theory of government, as to the nature and character of the act itself, whether executed by the States themselves, or by their Governments; but a result, as I have already stated, not at all affecting the question under consideration, but which will throw much light on a subject, in relation to which I must think the Senator from Massachusetts has formed very confused conceptions. The Senator dwelt much on the point, that the present system is a constitution and a Government, in contradistinction to the old confederation, with a view of proving that the constitution was not a compact. Now, I concede to the Senator, that our present system is a constitution and a Government; and that the former, the old

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

confederation, was not a constitution or Government; not, however, for the reason which he assigned, that the former was a compact, and the latter not; but from the difference of the origin from which the two compacts are derived. According to our American conception, the people alone can form constitutions or Governments, and not their agents. It is this difference, and this alone, which makes the distinction. Had the old confederation been the act of the people of the several States, and not of their Governments, that instrument, imperfect as it is, would have been a constitution; and the agency which it created to execute its powers, a Government. This is the true cause of the difference between the two acts, and not that in which the Senator seems to be bewildered.

There is another point on which this difference throws important light, and which has been frequently referred to in debate on this and former occasions. I refer to the expression in the preamble of the constitution, which speaks of "forming a more perfect union;" and in the letter of General Washington, laying the draught of the convention before the old Congress, in which he speaks of "consolidating the Union;" both of which I conceive to refer simply to the fact, that the present Union, as already stated, is a union between the States themselves, and not a union like that which had existed between the Governments of the States.

We will now proceed to consider some of the conclusions which necessarily follow from the facts and positions already established. They enable us to decide a question of vital importance under our system. Where does sovereignty reside? If I have succeeded in establishing the fact that ours is a federal system, as I conceive I conclusively have, that fact of itself determines the question which I have proposed. It is of the very essence of such a system, that the sovereignty is in the parts, and not in the whole; or, to use the language of Mr. Palgrave, the parts are the units in such a system, and the whole the multiple; and not the whole the units, and the parts the fractions. Ours, then, is a Government of twenty-four sovereignties, created by a constitutional compact, for the purpose of exercising certain powers through a common Government, as their joint agent; and not a union of the twenty-four sovereignties into one, which, according to the language of the Virginia resolutions, already cited, would form a consolidation. And here I must express my surprise to the Senator from Virginia, that he should avow himself the advocate of these very resolutions, when he distinctly maintains the idea of a union of the States in one sovereignty, which is expressly condemned by those resolutions as the essence of a consolidated Government.

Another consequence, which was equally clear, is, that whatever modification was made in the condition of the States, under the present constitution, were modifications extending only to the exercise of their powers by compact, and not to the sovereignty itself, and are such as sovereigns are competent to make; it being a conceded point, that it is competent to them to stipulate to exercise their powers in a particular manner, or to abstain altogether from their exercise, or to delegate them to agents, without, in any degree, impairing sovereignty itself. The plain state of the facts, as regards our Government, is, that these States have agreed, by compact, to exercise their sovereign powers jointly, as already stated; and that, for this purpose, they have ratified the compact in their sovereign capacity; thereby making it the constitution of each State, in no wise distinguished from their own separate constitution, but in the superadded obligation of compact—of faith mutually pledged to each other. In this compact they have stipulated, amongst other things, that it may be amended by three-fourths of the States; that is, they have conceded to each other, by compact, the right to add new powers or to subtract old, by the consent of that proportion of the States, without requiring, as otherwise would be the case, the consent of all—a modification no more inconsistent, as has been supposed, with their sovereignty, than any other contained in the compact. In fact, the provision to which I allude furnishes strong evidence that the sovereignty is, as I contend, in the States severally; as the amendments are effected not by any one three-fourths, but by any three-fourths of the States, indicating that the sovereignty is in each of the States.

If these views be correct, it follows, as a matter of course, that the allegiance of the people is to their several States; and that treason consists in resistance to the joint authority of the States united, not, as has been absurdly contended, in resistance to the Government of the United States, which, by the provision of the constitution, has only the right of punishing.

These conclusions have all a most important bearing on that monstrous and despotic bill, which, to the disgrace of the Senate and the age, has passed this body. I have still a right thus to speak, without violating the rules of order, as it is not yet a law. These conclusions show that the States can violate no law; that they neither are, nor in the nature of things can be, under the dominion of the law; that the worst that can be imputed to them is a violation of compact, for which they, and not their citizens, are responsible; and that to undertake to punish a State, by law, or to hold the citizens responsible for the acts of the State, which they are on their allegiance bound to obey, and liable to be punished as traitors for disobeying, is a cruelty unheard of among civilized nations, and destructive of every principle upon which our Government is founded. It is, in short, a ruthless and complete revolution of our entire system.

I was desirous to present these views fully, before the passage of this long-to-be-lamented bill; but as I was prevented by the majority, as I have stated, at the commencement of my remarks, I trust that it is not yet too late.

Having now said what I intended in relation to my first resolution, both in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, and in vindication of its correctness, I will now proceed to consider the conclusions drawn from it in the second resolution; that the General Government is not the exclusive and final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it; but that the States, as parties to the compact, have a right to judge, in the last resort, of the infractions of the compact, and of the mode and measure of redress.

It can scarcely be necessary, before so enlightened a body, to premise, that our system comprehends two distinct Governments—the General and State Governments, which, properly considered, form but one: the former, representing the joint authority of the States in their confederate capacity; and the latter, that of each State, separately. I have premised this fact, simply with a view of presenting distinctly the answer to the argument offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, to prove that the General Government has a final and exclusive right to judge, not only of its delegated powers, but also of those reserved to the States. That gentleman relies, for his main argument, on the assertion, that a Government, which he defines to be an organized body, endowed with both will and power, and authority in proprio vigore, to execute its purpose, has a right inherently to judge of its powers. It is not my intention to comment upon the definition of the Senator, though it would not be difficult to show that his ideas of government are not very American. My object is to deal with the conclusion, and not the definition. Admit, then, that the Government has the right of judging of its powers, for which he contends; how, then, will he withhold, upon his own principle, the right of judging from the State Government, which he has attributed to the General Government? If it belongs to one, on his principle, it belongs to both; and if to both, if they differ, the veto, so abhorred by the Senator, is the necessary result; as neither, if the right be possessed by both, can control the other.

The Senator felt the force of this argument; and, in order to sustain his main position, he fell back on that clause of the constitution which provides that "this constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land."

This is admitted; no one has ever denied that the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance of it, are of paramount authority. But it is equally undeniable, that laws not made in pursuance, are not only not of paramount authority, but are of no authority whatever, being of themselves null and void; which presents the question who are to judge whether the laws be or be not pursuant to the constitution; and thus the difficulty, instead of being taken away, is removed but one step farther back. This the Senator also felt, and has attempted to overcome the difficulty, by setting up, on the part of Congress and the Judiciary, the final and exclusive right of judging, both for the Federal Government and the States, as to the extent of their powers. That I may do full justice to the gentleman, I will give his doctrine in his own words. He states:

"That there is a supreme law, composed of the constitution, the laws passed in pursuance of it, and the treaties; but in cases coming before Congress, not assuming the shape of cases in law and equity, so as to be subjects of judicial discussion, Congress must interpret the constitution so often as it has occasion to pass laws; and in cases capable of assuming a judicial shape, the Supreme Court must be the final interpreter."

Now, passing over this vague and loose phraseology, I would ask the Senator, upon what principle can he concede this extensive power to the Legislative and Judicial departments, and withhold it entirely from the Executive? If one has the right, it cannot be withheld from the other. I would also ask him, on what principle—if the departments of the General Government are to possess the right of judging finally and conclusively of their respective powers—on what principle can the same right be withheld from the State Governments, which, as well as the General Government, properly considered, are but departments of the same general system, and form, together, properly speaking, but one Government. This was a favorite idea of a man, for whose wisdom I have a respect, increasing with my experience, and whom I have frequently heard say, that most of the misconceptions and errors, in relation to our system, originated in forgetting that they were but parts of the same system. I would further tell the Senator, that if this right be withheld from the State Governments; if this restraining influence, by which the General Government is coerced to its proper sphere, be withdrawn; then that department of the Government from which he has withheld the right of judging of its own powers, (the Executive,) will, so far from being excluded, become the sole interpreter of the powers of the Government. It is the armed interpreter, with powers to execute its own construction, and without the aid of which the construction of the other departments will be impotent.

But I contend that the States have a far clearer right to the sole construction of their powers than any of the departments of the Federal Government can have; this power is expressly reserved, as I have stated on another occasion, not only against the several departments of the General Government, but against the United States themselves. I will not repeat the arguments which I then offered on this point, and which remain unanswered, but I must be permitted to offer strong additional proof of the views then taken; and which, if I am not mistaken, are conclusive on this point. It is drawn from the ratification of the constitution by Virginia, and is in the following words: [Mr. C. then read as follows:]

"We, the delegates of the people of Virginia, duly elected in pursuance of a recommendation from the General Assembly, and now met in convention, having fully and freely investigated and discussed the proceedings of the federal convention, and being prepared, as well as the most mature deliberation hath enabled us to decide thereon, do, in the name and in behalf of the people of Virginia, declare and make known, that the powers granted under the constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, may be resumed by them whensoever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression; and that every power not granted thereby remains with them, and at their will; that, therefore, no right of any denomination can be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified by the Congress, by the Senate, or House of Representatives, acting in any capacity, by the President, or any department or officer of the United States, except in those instances in which power is given by the constitution for those purposes; and that, among other essential rights, the liberty of conscience and of the press cannot be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified by any authority of the United States. With these impressions; with a solemn appeal to the Searcher of all hearts for the purity of our intentions; and under the conviction that whatsoever imperfections may exist in the constitution ought rather to be examined in the mode prescribed therein, than to bring the Union in danger by a delay; with the hope of obtaining amendments previous to the ratification; we, the said delegates, in the name and in the behalf of the people of Virginia, do, by these presents, assent to and ratify the constitution, recommended on the 17th day of September, 1787, by the federal convention, for the Government of the United States; hereby announcing to all those whom it may concern, that the said constitution is binding upon the said people, according to an authentic copy hereto annexed, in the words following," &c.

It thus appears that that sagacious State (I fear, however, that her sagacity is not as sharp-sighted now as formerly) ratified the constitution, with an explanation as to her reserved powers; that they were powers subject to her own will; and reserved against every department of the General Government, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial; as if she had a prophetic knowledge of the attempts now made to impair and destroy them; which explanation can be considered in no other light than as containing a condition on which she ratified, and, in fact, making part of the constitution of the United States, extending as well to the other States as to herself. I am no lawyer, and it may appear to be presumption in me to lay down the rule of law which governs in such cases, in a controversy with so distinguished an advocate as the Senator from Massachusetts; but I will lay it down as a rule in such cases, which I have no fear that the gentleman will contradict, that in case of a contract between several partners, if the entrance of one on condition be admitted, the condition enures to the benefit of all the partners. But I do not rest the argument simply upon this view. Virginia proposed the tenth amended article, the one in question; and her ratification must be at least received as the highest evidence of its true meaning and interpretation.

If these views be correct, (and I do not see how they can be resisted,) the right of the States to judge of the extent of their reserved powers stands on the most solid foundation, and is good against every department of the General Government; and the Judiciary is as much excluded from an interference with the reserved powers as the Legislative or Executive departments. To prove the opposite, the Senator relies upon the authority of Mr.

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

Madison, in the Federalist, to prove that it was intended to invest the court with the power in question. In reply, I will meet Mr. Madison with his own opinion, given on a most solemn occasion, and backed by the sagacious commonwealth of Virginia. The opinion to which I allude will be found in the celebrated report of 1799, of which Mr. Madison was the author. It says:

"But it is objected, that the judicial authority is to be regarded as the sole expositor of the constitution in the last resort; and it may be asked, for what reason the declaration by the General Assembly, supposing it to be theoretically true, could be required at the present day, and in so solemn a manner?"

"On this objection it might be observed: first, that there may be instances of usurped power, which the forms of the constitution would never draw within the control of the judicial department; secondly, that if the decision of the Judiciary be raised above the authority of the sovereign parties to the constitution, the decisions of the other departments, not carried by the forms of the constitution before the Judiciary, must be equally authoritative and final with decisions of the department. But the proper answer to this objection is, that the resolution of the General Assembly relates to those great and extraordinary cases, in which all the forms of the constitution may prove ineffectual against infractions dangerous to the essential rights of the parties to it. The resolution supposes that dangerous powers, not delegated, may not only be usurped and executed by the other departments, but that the judicial department, also, may exercise or sanction dangerous powers beyond the grant of the constitution; and, consequently, that the ultimate right of the parties to the constitution to judge whether the compact was dangerously violated, must extend to violations by one delegated authority, as well as by another; by the Judiciary, as well as by the Executive, or the Legislature."

The Senator also relies upon the authority of Luther Martin to the same point, to which I have already replied so fully, on another occasion, in answer to the Senator from Delaware, [MR. CLAYTON,] that I do not deem it necessary to add any further remarks, on the present occasion.

But why should I waste words in reply to these or any other authorities, when it has been so clearly established, that the rights of the States are reserved against all and every department of the Government; that no authority in opposition can possibly shake a position so well established? Nor do I think it necessary to repeat the argument which I offered when the bill was under discussion, to show that the clause in the constitution which provides that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, and to the laws and treaties made under its authority, has no bearing on the point in controversy; and that even the boasted power of the Supreme Court to decide a law to be unconstitutional, so far from being derived from this or any other portion of the constitution, results from the necessity of the case, where two rules of equal authority come in conflict, and is a power belonging to all courts, superior and inferior, State and general, domestic and foreign.

I have now, I trust, shown satisfactorily that there is no provision in the constitution to authorize the General Government, through any of its departments, to control the action of the States, within the sphere of its reserved powers; and that, of course, according to the principle laid down by the Senator from Massachusetts himself, the Government of the States, as well as the General Government, have the right to determine the extent of their respective powers, without the right on the part of either to control the other. The necessary result is, the veto, to which he so much objects, and to get clear of which, he informs us, was the object for which the present constitution was formed. I know not whence he has derived his information, but my impression is very different, as to the immediate motives which led to the formation of that instrument. I have always understood that the principal object was, to give to Congress the power to regulate commerce, to lay impost duties, and to raise a revenue for the payment of the public debt and the expenses of the Government, and to subject the action of the citizens, individually, to the operation of the laws, as a substitute for force. If the object had been to get clear of the veto of the States, as the Senator states, the convention certainly performed their work in a most bungling manner. There was unquestionably a large party in that body, headed by men of distinguished talents and influence, who commenced early, and worked earnestly to the last, to deprive the States—not directly, for that would have been too bold an attempt, but indirectly—of the veto. The good sense of the convention, however, put down every effort, however disguised and perseveringly made. I do not deem it necessary to give, from the journals, the history of these various and unsuccessful attempts, though it would afford a very instructive lesson. It is sufficient to say, that it was attempted by proposing to give to Congress power to annul the acts of the States which they might deem inconsistent with the constitution; to give to the President the power of appointing the Governors of the States, with a view of vetoing State laws through his authority; and, finally, to give to the Judiciary the power to decide controversies between the States and the General Government. All of which failed, fortunately for the liberty of the country, utterly and entirely failed; and, in their failure, we have the strongest evidence that it was not the intention of the convention to deprive the States of the veto power. Had the attempt to deprive them of this power been directly made, and failed, every one would have seen and felt that it would furnish conclusive evidence in favor of its existence. Now, I would ask, what possible difference can it make, in what form this attempt was made—whether by attempting to confer on the General Government a power incompatible with the exercise of the veto on the part of the States, or by attempting directly to deprive them of the right of exercising it? We have thus direct and strong proof, that, in the opinion of the convention, the States, unless deprived of it, possess the veto power; or, what is another name for the same thing, the right of nullification. I know that there is a diversity of opinion among the friends of State rights, in regard to this power, which I regret; as I cannot but consider it a power essential to the protection of the minor interests of the community, and the liberty and the union of the country. It was the very shield of State rights; and the only power by which that system of injustice, against which we have contended for more than thirteen years, could be arrested; by which a system of hostile legislation, of plundering by law, which must necessarily lead to a conflict by arms, can be prevented.

But I rest the right of a State to judge of the extent of its reserved powers, in the last resort, on higher grounds; that the constitution is a compact, to which the States are parties, in their sovereign capacity; and that, as in all other cases of compact, between parties having no common umpire, each has a right to judge for itself. To the truth of this proposition, the Senator from Massachusetts has himself assented, if the constitution itself be a compact; and that it is, I have shown, I trust, beyond the possibility of doubt. Having established that point, I now claim, as I stated I would do in the course of the discussion, the admissions of the Senator, and, among them, the right of secession and nullification, which he conceded would necessarily follow, if the constitution be indeed a compact.

SENATE.]

Mr. Calhoun's Resolutions.

I have now replied to the arguments of the Senator from Massachusetts, so far as they directly apply to the resolutions, and will, in conclusion, notice some of his general and detached remarks. To prove that ours is a consolidated Government, and that there is an immediate connexion between the Government and the citizen, he relies on the fact, that the laws act directly on individuals. That such is the case, I will not deny; but I am very far from conceding the point, that it affords the decisive proof, or even any proof at all, of the position which the Senator wishes to maintain. I hold it to be perfectly within the competency of two or more States to subject their citizens, in certain cases, to the direct action of each other, without surrendering or impairing their sovereignty. I recollect, while I was a member of Mr. Monroe's cabinet, a proposition was submitted by the British Government, to permit a mutual right of search and seizure, on the part of each Government, of the citizens of the other, on board of vessels engaged in the slave trade, and to establish a joint tribunal for their trial and punishment. The proposition was declined, not because it would impair the sovereignty of either, but on the ground of the general expediency, and because it would be incompatible with the provisions of the constitution which establish the judicial power, which must be appointed by the President and Senate. If I am not mistaken, propositions of the same kind were made and acceded to by some of the continental Powers.

With the same view, the Senator cited the suability of the States, as evidence of their want of sovereignty; at which I must express my surprise, coming from the quarter it does. No one knows better than the Senator that it is perfectly within the competency of a sovereign State to permit itself to be sued. We have on the statute book a standing law, under which the United States may be sued in certain land cases. If the provision in the constitution on this point proves any thing, it proves, by the extreme jealousy with which the right of suing a State is permitted, the very reverse of that for which the Senator contends.

Among other objections to the views of the constitution, for which I contend, it is said they are novel. I hold this to be a great mistake. The novelty is not on my side, but on that of the Senator from Massachusetts. The doctrine of consolidation, which he maintains, is of recent growth. It is not the doctrine of Hamilton, Ames, or any of the distinguished federalists of that period, all of whom strenuously maintained the federative character of the constitution, though they were accused of supporting a system of policy which would necessarily lead to consolidation. The first disclosure of that doctrine was in the case of McCulloch, in which the Supreme Court held the doctrine, though wrapt up in language somewhat indistinct and ambiguous. The next and more open avowal was by the Senator of Massachusetts himself, about three years ago, in the debate on Foot's resolution. The first official announcement of the doctrine was in the recent proclamation of the President, of which the bill that has recently passed this body is the bitter fruit.

It is further objected by the Senator from Massachusetts, and others, against this doctrine of State rights, as maintained in this debate, that if they should prevail, the peace of the country would be destroyed. But what if they should not prevail? Would there be peace? Yes, the peace of despotism; that peace which is enforced by the bayonet and the sword; the peace of death, where all the vital functions of liberty have ceased. It is this peace which the doctrine of State sovereignty may disturb by that conflict, which, in every free State, if properly organized, necessarily exists between liberty and power; but which, if restrained within proper limits, is a salutary exercise to our moral and intellectual faculties. In the case of Carolina, which has caused all this discussion, who does not see, if the effusion of blood be prevented, that the excitement, the agitation, and the inquiry which it has caused, will be followed by the most beneficial consequences? The country had sunk into avarice, intrigue, and electioneering, from which nothing but some such event could rouse it, or restore those honest and patriotic feelings, which had almost disappeared under their baneful influence. What Government has ever attained power and distinction without such conflicts? Look at the degraded state of all those nations, where they have been put down by the iron arm of the Government.

I, for my part, have no fear of any dangerous conflict, under the fullest acknowledgment of State sovereignty; the very fact that the States may interpose, will produce moderation and justice. The General Government will abstain from the exercise of any power in which they may suppose three-fourths of the States will not sustain them; while, on the other hand, the States will not interpose but on conviction that they will be supported by one-fourth of their co-States. Moderation and justice will produce confidence, attachment, and patriotism; and these, in turn, will offer most powerful barriers against the excess of conflicts between the States and the head of the confederacy.

But we are told that, should the doctrine prevail, the present system would be as bad, if not worse, than the old confederation. I regard the assertion only as evidence of that extravagance of declamation, in which, from excitement of feeling, we so often indulge. Admit the power, and still the present system would be as far removed from the weakness of the old confederation as it would be from the lawless and despotic violence of consolidation. So far from being the same, the difference between the confederation and the present constitution would still be most strongly marked. If there were no other distinction, the fact that the former required the concurrence of the States to execute its acts, and the latter the act of a State to arrest its acts, would make a distinction as broad as the ocean; in the former, the inertia of our nature was in opposition to the action of the system. Not to act, was to defeat. In the latter, the same principle is on the opposite side; action is required to defeat. He who understands human nature, will see, in this difference, the difference between a feeble and ill-contrived confederation, and the restrained energy of a federal system.

Of the same character is the objection that the doctrine will be the source of weakness. If we look to mere organization and physical power as the only source of strength, without taking into the estimate the operation of moral causes, such would appear to be the fact; but if we take into the estimate the latter, you will find that those Governments have the greatest strength in which power has been most efficiently checked. The Government of Rome furnishes a memorable example. There two independent and distinct powers existed—the people acting by tribes, in which the plebeians prevailed; and by centuries, in which the patricians ruled. The tribunes were the appropriate representatives of the one power, and the Senate of the other; each possessed of the authority of checking and overruling one another, not as departments of the Government, as supposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, but as independent powers; as much so as the State and General Governments. A shallow observer would perceive in such an organization nothing but the perpetual source of anarchy, discord, and weakness; and yet experience has proved that it was the most powerful Government that ever existed; and reason teaches that this power was derived from the very circumstance which hasty reflection would consider the cause of weakness. I will venture an assertion which may be considered extravagant, but in which history will fully bear me out, that we have no knowledge of any people in which a power of arresting the improper acts of the Government, or what may be called the negative power of Government, was too strong, except Poland, where every freeman possessed a veto; but even there, although it existed in so extravagant a form, it was the source of the highest and most lofty attachment to liberty, and the most heroic courage; qualities that more than once saved Europe from the domination of the crescent and scymetar. It is worthy of remark, that the fate of Poland is not to be attributed so much to the excess of this negative power of itself, as to the facility which it afforded to foreign influence in controlling its political improvements.

I am not surprised that, with the idea of a perfect Government which the Senator from Massachusetts has formed—a Government of an absolute majority, unchecked, and unrestrained, operating through a representative body—that he should be so much shocked with what he is pleased to call the absurdity of State veto. But let me tell him, that his scheme of a perfect Government, beautiful as he conceives it to be, though often tried, has invariably failed, and has always run, whenever tried, through the same uniform process of faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism. He considers the representative principle as the great modern improvement in legislation, and of itself sufficient to secure liberty. I cannot regard it in the light in which he does. Instead of modern, it is of remote origin, and has existed, in greater or less perfection, in every free State, from the remotest antiquity. Nor do I consider it as of itself sufficient to secure liberty, though I regard it as one of the indispensable means—the means of securing the people against the tyranny and oppression of their rulers. To secure liberty, another means is still necessary—the means of securing the different portions of society against the injustice and oppression of each other, which can only be effected by veto, interposition, or nullification, or by whatever name the restraining or negative power of Government may be called.

The Senator appears to be enamored with his conception of a consolidated Government, and avows himself to be prepared, seeking no lead, to rush in its defence to the front rank, where the blows fall heaviest and thickest. I admire his gallantry and courage; but I will tell him that he will find in the opposite ranks, under the flag of liberty, spirits as gallant as his own; and that experience will teach him, that it is infinitely easier to carry on the war of legislative exaction by bills and enactments, than to extort by sword and bayonet from the brave and the free.

The bill which has passed this body is intended to decide this great controversy between that view of our Government entertained by the Senator and those who act with him, and that supported on our side. It has merged the tariff, and all other questions connected with it, in the higher and direct issue, which it presents between the federal system of Government and consolidation. I consider the bill as far worse and more dangerous to liberty than the tariff. It has been most wantonly passed, when its avowed object no longer justified it. I consider it as chains forged and fitted to the limbs of the States, and hung up to be used when occasion may require. We are told, in order to justify the passage of this fatal measure, that it was necessary to present the olive branch with one hand, and the sword with the other. We scorn the alternative. You have no right to present the sword; the constitution never put the instrument in your hands to be employed against a State; and as to the olive branch, whether we receive it or not, will not depend on your menace, but on our own estimate of what is due to ourselves and the rest of the community, in reference to the difficult subject on which we have taken issue.

The Senator from Massachusetts has struggled hard to sustain his cause; but the load was too heavy for him to bear. I am not surprised at the ardor and zeal with which he has entered into the controversy. It is a great struggle between power and liberty—power on the side of the North, and liberty on the side of the South. But while I am not surprised at the part which the Senator from Massachusetts has taken, I must express my amazement at the principles advanced by the Senator from Georgia nearest me, [Mr. Forsyth.] I had supposed it was impossible, that one of his experience and sagacity should not perceive the new and dangerous direction which this controversy is about to take. For the first time, we have heard an ominous reference to a provision in the constitution, which I have never known to be before alluded to in discussion, or in connexion with any of our measures. I refer to that provision in the constitution, in which the General Government guarantees a republican form of government to the States—a power which, hereafter, if not rigidly restricted to the objects intended by the constitution, is destined to be a pretext to interfere with our political affairs, and the domestic institutions, in a manner infinitely more dangerous than any other power which has ever been exercised on the part of the General Government. I had supposed that every Southern Senator, at least, would have been awake to the danger which menaces us from this new quarter; and that no sentiment would be uttered, on their part, calculated to countenance the exercise of this dangerous power. With these impressions, I heard the Senator with amazement alluding to Carolina, as furnishing a case which called for the enforcement of this guaranty. Does he not see the hazard of the indefinite extension of this dangerous power? There exists in every Southern State a domestic institution, which would require a far less bold construction to consider the Government of every State in that quarter not to be republican; and, of course, to demand, on the part of this Government, a suppression of the institution to which I allude, in fulfilment of the guaranty. I believe there is now no hostile feelings combined with political considerations, in any section, connected with this delicate subject. But it requires no stretch of the imagination to see the danger which must one day come, if not vigilantly watched. With the rapid strides with which this Government is advancing to power, a time will come, and that not far distant, when petitions will be received, from the quarter to which I allude, for protection; when the faith of the guaranty will be at least as applicable to that case as the Senator from Georgia now thinks it is to Carolina. Unless this doctrine be opposed by united and firm resistance, its ultimate effect will be to drive the white population from the Southern Atlantic States.

As soon as Mr. C. had concluded,

Mr. WEBSTER rose in reply. He said that, having already occupied so much of the time of the Senate on the general subject, he should not do more than to make a very few observations, in reply to what the honorable member from Carolina had now advanced. The gentleman, said Mr. W., does me injustice, in suggesting the possibility that any remarks of mine could have been made for the purpose of obtaining favor, in any quarter, by an appearance of hostility to him.

[Mr. CALHOUN rose, and said, he had only suggested it as a matter of possibility.]

I hope it is not even possible, continued Mr. W., that my support or opposition of important measures should be influenced by considerations of that kind. Between the honorable member and myself, personal relations have always been friendly. We came into Congress, now near twenty years ago, both ardent young men; and however widely we may have differed at any time on political subjects, our private intercourse has been one of amity and kindness.

[Mr. CALHOUN rose and said, these remarks were just such as he himself had intended to make.]

The honorable member considers my remarks on his use of the phrase "constitutional compact" as not well founded, and says he has my own authority against myself. He quotes from my speech in 1830. But I did not, on that or any occasion, call the constitution a constitutional compact. In the passage to which he refers, I was speaking of one part of the agreement, on which the constitution was founded, viz: the agreement that the slave-holding States should possess more than an equal proportion of Representatives. That, I observed, was matter of compact, sanctioned by the constitution; it was an agreement, which, being adopted in the constitution, may be well enough called a constitutional compact; but that is not equivalent to saying that the constitution of the United States is nothing but a constitutional compact between sovereign States. The gentleman must certainly remember that my main object, on that occasion, was to establish the proposition, stated in the same speech, that the constitution was not a compact between States, but a constitution, established by the people, with a Government founded on popular election, and directly responsible to the people themselves.

The honorable gentleman attempts also to find an authority for his use of the word accede. He says the same word was used by General Washington, in speaking of the adoption of the constitution by North Carolina. It was so; and it is used by the biographer of Washington, also, in reference to the same occurrence; and although both, probably, adopted the phrase from the popular language of the day, yet the language in that case was not, perhaps, improper. By the adoption of the constitution by nine States, the old confederacy was effectually dissolved. North Carolina not having adopted it until after the Government went into operation, was out of the union. She had, at that moment, no distinct connexion with other States. The old Union was broken up, and she had not come into the new. There was propriety, therefore, perhaps, in calling her adoption of the constitution an accession. Yet, when she afterwards adopted the constitution, she used the same terms of ratification as the other States. Accede is unknown to all those ratifications, and to the constitution itself. But the honorable gentleman insists that he can change the phraseology of his resolutions, so as to avoid my objections, and yet maintain their substantial sense and import.

He says his first resolution may stand thus:

"Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a compact, under the title of the constitution of the United States, which the people of each State ratified as a separate and sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a union between the States ratifying the same."

This is a change, it is true, but it is a mere verbal change. It rejects certain words, but adopts their exact synonyms. In his resolution, he calls the constitution a "constitutional compact;" in the amended form which he now suggests, he calls it a "compact, under the title of a constitution."

These are just the same thing. Both call it a compact, and a compact between sovereign communities; and in both the attempt is to make the constitution not one substantive thing, but merely the qualification of something else. Now, sir, the constitution does not call itself a compact of any kind; the people did not call it such, when they ratified it. No State said, "We, as a sovereign community, accede to a constitutional compact;" or, "We, as a sovereign community, ratify a compact under the title of a constitution." No State said one word about compact—no State said one word about acting as a sovereign community. On the contrary, in each and in every State the language is, that the conventions, in the name and by the authority of the people, ratify this constitution, or frame of government. Neither the resolution, therefore, of the honorable member, nor this amended form of it, follows the official and authentic language applied to the transaction to which it refers. I again say, if he will follow that language, if he will state accurately what was done, and then state his proposed inference, that inference will be out of all sight from his premises. Let him say nothing of compact, because the people said nothing of it; let him not assert that the people of the States acted as sovereign communities, because they have not said so. Let him describe what the people did, in their own language. It will then stand, that the people ratified this constitution, or frame of government. Now, sir, the mere substitution of this just and true phraseology strikes away the whole foundation of the gentleman's argument. He cannot stand a moment, except on the ground of a compact between sovereign communities. Compact, therefore, and such a compact, must keep its place in his first resolution, or else his chain of reasoning breaks in the first link. He is, therefore, driven to the necessity of assuming what cannot be proved, and of giving a history of the formation of this constitution essentially different from its true history. He is compelled to reject the language of the constitution itself, and to reject also the language used by the people of every one of the States, when they adopted it; and to lay the cornerstone of his whole argument on mere assumption.

The honorable gentleman does not understand how the constitution can have a compact, or consent, for its basis, and yet not be a compact between sovereign States. It appears to me, the distinction is broad and plain enough. The people may agree to form a Government; this is assent, consent, or compact; this is the social compact of the European writers. When the Government is formed, it rests on this assent of the governed; that is, it rests on the assent of the people. The whole error of the gentleman's argument arises from the notion, that the people, of their own authority, can make but one Government; or that the people of all the States have not united, and cannot unite, in establishing a constitution, connecting them together, directly, as individuals, united under one Government. He seems unwilling to admit, that while the people of a single State may unite together, and form a Government for some purposes, the people of all the States may also unite together, and form another Government, for other purposes. But what he will not thus admit, appears to me to be the simple truth, the plain matter of fact, in regard to our political institutions.

The honorable gentleman thinks, sir, that I overlooked a very important part of the constitution, favorable to his side of the question. He says it is declared, in the seventh article, that the ratification of the convention of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of the constitution between the States ratifying the same. If I have overlooked this provision, sir, it is because it appears to me not to have that bearing on the question which the honorable member supposes. The honorable member has said, in one of his publications, that the word "States," as used in the constitution, sometimes means the States, in their corporate capacities, or Governments; sometimes it means their territory, merely; and sometimes it means the people of the States. This is very true; and it is perfectly clear, that in the clause quoted, the word means the people of the States. The same clause speaks of the conventions of the States; that evidently means conventions of the people of the States; else the whole provision would be absurd. All that this part of the constitution intended was simply to declare, that so soon as the people of nine States should adopt and ratify it, it should, as to these States, go into operation.

The gentleman has concluded, sir, by declaring, again, that the contest is between power on one side, and liberty on the other—and that he is for liberty. All this is easily said. But what is that liberty whose cause he espouses? It is liberty, given to a part, to govern the whole. It is liberty, claimed by a small minority, to govern and control the great majority. And what is the power which he resists? It is the general power of the popular will; it is the power of all the people, exercised by majorities, in the Houses of the Legislature, in the form in which all free Governments exercise power.

Mr. President, turn this question over, and present it as we will—argue upon it as we may—exhaust upon it all the fountains of metaphysics—stretch over it all the meshes of logical or political subtlety—it still comes to this: Shall we have a General Government? shall we continue the union of the States under a Government instead of a league? This is the upshot of the whole matter; because, if we are to have a Government, that Government must act like other Governments, by majorities; it must have this power, like other Governments, of enforcing its own laws, and its own decisions; clothed with authority by the people, and always responsible to the people; it must be able to hold on its course, unchecked by external interposition. According to the gentleman's view of the matter, the constitution is a league; according to mine, it is a regular popular Government. This vital and all-important question the people will decide, and, in deciding it, they will determine whether by ratifying the present CONSTITUTION AND FRAME OF GOVERNMENT they meant to do nothing more than to amend the articles of the old confederation.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that the transcendent importance of the topics of this debate had not been exaggerated by the Senator from South Carolina. The consequences, said Mr. S., already resulting, and those still more disastrous, which are threatened from the doctrines which he maintains, demonstrate that they should be regarded with intense interest. The President has declared that the laws must be enforced, and has called upon the National Legislature for the powers necessary to the performance of his high constitutional duties as the Chief Executive of the United States. The people of South Carolina have solemnly declared that the revenue laws shall not be executed within their limits. They have raised their banner, and inscribed upon it in capitals—"No more taxes shall be paid here." They have denounced our legislation as oppressive, and proclaimed that "they will throw it off at every hazard;" and they have announced, in the most authoritative manner, by a fundamental ordinance, that our laws are null and void, and that the passage by Congress of any act to authorize the use of force against the citizens of that State dissolves her connexion with her sister States. The bill which has passed the Senate may be considered as of that character; and if so regarded, and the ordinance shall be executed, South Carolina will deem herself out of the Union, and hold the citizens of the United States as she does the rest of the world, "enemies in war, in peace friends." We have, indeed, the hope that the operation of their ordinance, of their extraordinary replevin act, and their new military law, made to concentrate the whole martial energies of the State, may be arrested and postponed by the efforts of leading individuals. But a whole people have become deeply excited—not from their own feeling of oppression, but by the persuasions of others that they were the devoted victims of injustice. The address of the convention itself acknowledges that "the difficulty has been great to bring the people to the resisting point." The manner in which that was accomplished has been described by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] Tracts, pamphlets, newspapers, speeches, and addresses, were scattered, disseminated, and reiterated over the whole surface, to the remotest recesses of the State, till the people "received the doctrine." They have been aroused, excited, exasperated, wrought almost to desperation, and have hurled defiance at their supposed oppressors. The necromancers who have conjured up this evil spirit may not be able to bid it down. Those who have raised the storm may not have the power to allay it. The hand which has kindled the conflagration may in vain attempt its extinguishment. When the fountains of the deep are broken up, and ocean waves are heaving, who shall say that thus far shalt thou go and no farther? They have raised the wind, and may have to reap the whirlwind; they have "scattered firebrands, arrows, and death;" they may not now say "am I not in sport?"

We hope for the best. But no prescience can foresee the ultimate effects of our measures, and in their adoption we occupy a position of oppressive responsibility. It behooves us to consider well, to deliberate profoundly upon the fundamental principles of our action. For, if we are wrong in this question of constitutional power—if we have no legitimate authority or moral right to pass the bill, then it may well deserve the denunciations which the fervid eloquence and burning zeal of its opponents have poured forth. But, if they are wrong, if it be a rightful authority which they resist, and if their decrees shall be carried out in action, they must be content to have their conduct branded by its true appellations—lawless violence, rebellion, treason.

What, then, is the question at issue? What are the doctrines arrayed in opposition to that bill? It is insisted that no allegiance is due to the United States; that the highest and paramount obligation of every citizen is to his own State; that when she speaks, every man within her limits is bound to obedience, even if the command be resistance to the authority of the General Government; that this obligation is absolute, unqualified, and unconditional, leaving no right of inquiry into the correctness of the command, and no question to be made whether the laws of the General Government are constitutional or not. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] declared, that, if it were conceded that the tariff laws were all perfectly constitutional, and that the national Judiciary had the unquestioned jurisdiction and ultimate right of decision, still that the bill could not be justified, because it authorized force against individuals, who were constrained by higher and superior obligations to bow in blind and absolute submission to the paramount power—the State sovereignty. He stigmatizes it as worse than a barbarian outrage; that it is not, as some have declared, war upon a State; but a savage attack upon the citizens, passing by and disregarding the community, the sovereign, who rightfully controls their action.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MAYNOR] insisted that he is bound to obey the sovereign voice of his State, whether she be "right or wrong." And the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] enforced the same sentiments. They both contend that the State throws its shield of legislation over its citizens; no external power, not even the United States, can have any right to penetrate that agis, to touch any individual within its territory; that when a State law shall annul, conflict, or be inconsistent with the laws, treaties, or constitution of the United States, the latter are to be disregarded, and the former unconditionally obeyed.

Now, sir, the constitution of the United States has expressly declared that in such cases the State laws shall yield. It was foreseen by the convention which framed the constitution that such conflict and incompatibility would necessarily arise. The greatest difficulty which they had to encounter was from the pride and tenacity of State independence. The inherent and fatal vice of the old confederation was, that the Continental Congress had no power over individuals, but only addressed itself to States in their aggregate character as independent communities; and when the new constitution adopted the appropriate remedy, by creating a Government to make laws, a Judiciary to expound them, and an Executive to enforce them directly upon every person within the boundaries of the United States, it was at once foreseen that as the several States had also the power of legislation over the same persons, within their respective limits, the laws of these two Governments would be very likely sometimes to come in conflict. They, therefore, wisely made provision for such an event, and gave the supremacy to the laws of the Union. The sixth article declares that "this constitution," and all "laws made in pursuance thereof," and "treaties"—shall be the supreme law of the land, . . . "any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." And yet gentleman now assert, and vehemently and strenuously insist, that the laws of the State are to be the supreme laws, any thing in the constitution or laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding! How is such a conclusion attained? By what process do they escape from the express language and palpable meaning of the organic law? I have curiously and anxiously read and listened to their reasonings upon this subject, and find that they undertake to control and subdue the constitution by certain abstract notions of original unchangeable sovereignty. When scrutinized and analyzed, it will be found that the fundamental position which they assume is that the people could not, had not the power, to make such a constitution as this purports on its face to be, and that its plain meaning is to be restrained and overruled by an assumed political dogma. Their course of argument is this: The constitution was adopted by the people of the several States acting as distinct communities, which, before its adoption, were independent sovereignties. This, sir, I have no disposition to controvert; but their next proposition is, that sovereignty is in its nature indivisible and inalienable; and therefore could not be transferred by the States, and, of necessity, is retained by them unimpaired; that not a particle belongs to the United States; and as the sovereign power is always supreme, the State is paramount to the United States. Their fundamental postulate is, that sovereignty is inalienable; and from this all their consequences are deduced.

The address of the convention which passed the ordinance places their doctrines upon this foundation. Referring to the constitution, it says, "A foreign or an inattentive reader" . . . "would be very apt, from the phraseology of the instrument, to regard the States as having divested themselves of their sovereignty, and to have become great corporations, subordinate to one supreme Government. But this is an error; the States are as sovereign now as they were prior to their entering into the compact." Correctly speaking, sovereignty is a unit. It is one indivisible and inalienable. It is, therefore, an absurdity to imagine that the sovereignty of the States is surrendered in part and retained in part. The federal constitution is a treaty, a confederation, an alliance. And again: the great expositor of this doctrine [Mr. CALHOUN] has told us that the sovereignty is still "in the people of the several States," "unimpaired; not a particle resides in this Government; not one particle in the American people collectively." After admitting that the States have delegated certain powers to the General Government, he proceeds: "But to delegate is not to part with or impair power. The delegated power in the agent is as much the power of the principal as if it remained in the latter; and may, as between him and his agent, be controlled or resumed at pleasure." It cannot be denied that the constitution purports to impair the sovereignty of the States, and to establish a new Government over their citizens. But it is insisted that the language of the constitution is not to decide its character—[Mr. POINDEXTER;] and that although from its phraseology one would be very apt to regard the States as having divested themselves of their sovereignty, yet such a thing is impossible, in the nature of things, and therefore has not been done. The people have attempted it, indeed; but being in itself impracticable, of course, it has not been accomplished. Sovereignty is inalienable! This single abstraction, this figment of the imagination, this naked political dogma, restrains the whole people, disables them from accomplishing their purpose, limits and controls the constitution, annulling some of its provisions, and reversing others. The whole fabric of nullification, curiously and ingeniously wrought, computed by intellectual strength, enriched by the treasures of learning, and gilded by the splendors of genius, rests, like an inverted cone, upon this little dogma—a metaphysical chimera, an airy nothing!

Sovereignty is inalienable; and, if delegated, resumable at pleasure, and without revolution. Who were the original sovereigns? Individuals. Each came from the hands of his Maker sovereign and independent, owing no allegiance, and subject to no earthly power. May every man, at pleasure, resume his original, indivisible, inalienable sovereignty? The first step in the progress of society was the formation of families; next, patriarchal tribes; and then, their amalgamation into States or nations. And may those be resolved at pleasure into their original elements, by the rightful resumption of primitive inalienable independence?

The whole history of the human race falsifies the assumption, that sovereignty is inalienable. Every page records its transfer, by free consent, by purchase, by rebellion, revolution, and conquest. Take Great Britain for example. May the three nations—nay, may the ancient heptarchy, which have been swallowed up in that kingdom, now resume their former separate independence, and that, too, without revolution? But not to recur to the fruitful records of former ages; look at modern Europe, and its transmutations in our own age, and then say that sovereignty is not transferable. In a single place, this political, metaphysical impossibility has been actually overcome no less than five times within thirty years. Coblenz was attached to the dominions of the Elector of Cologne, afterwards united to the French republic, and then to the French empire; and successively to the Grand Duchy of Berg, under Murat; to the Grand Duchy of Baden; to the kingdom of Westphalia, and, after the prostration of Bonaparte, to Prussia. Turn to our own country. I ask these gentlemen, has Kentucky any sovereignty? How did she acquire it? She was once subjected to Virginia. There was but one sovereignty; and as that was indivisible and inalienable, how can Kentucky have one particle? I ask again, with still deeper interest, has Maine any sovereignty, having once been a portion of Massachusetts? But I request the particular attention of gentlemen to the condition of Louisiana. Is not that State equally sovereign with South Carolina, Virginia, or any other? Was it always so? Was it not transferred by Spain to France, and from France to the United States? Was not sovereign dominion held over it by all those Powers successively? Before its erection into a State, was it not our territory, our purchased property, subjected to our control, governed by our will, without ever having had, for a moment, the shadow or pretence of independent sovereignty? Was it not made a State by our act? And if, as gentlemen contend, the United States have not one particle of sovereignty, whence, and in what manner, has Louisiana acquired her sovereignty? Could the United States impart it, having none themselves; and not only impart, but render it transcendently paramount to the express provisions of the constitution controlling or annulling them? Do the United States hold delegated powers from Louisiana, which she may resume at pleasure—resume what she never possessed? Should she take to herself the powers only which she enjoyed prior to her supposed delegation of them by the constitution, she must restore herself to her anterior condition of territorial submission—and this by way of vindicating her sovereignty! How is it now with the Territory of Florida? and what sovereignty will the United States confer when we shall have admitted her into the Union?

The constitution provides for the admission of new States formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts thereof; but, as sovereignty is now found to be inalienable, this provision is thereby rendered utterly nugatory.

The doctrines against which I am contending are as novel as they are extraordinary. They find no place in the history of the formation, adoption, or contemporaneous expositions of the constitution; they were then terra incognita, and have been but recently discovered through the modern telescope of political metaphysics.

In the establishment of our present constitution, the great, prominent, and popular objection of its opponents was its supremacy and paramount authority over the States, its subtractions from State sovereignty. Its friends found it necessary to encounter this most formidable objection, by their utmost strength of fact and argument. All ability was exerted to overcome it; their utmost ingenuity to decide it. And yet not one of its framers in the general convention, of its supporters in the State Conventions, or of its numerous expounders, commentators, and advocates before the people, ever suggested the rights and doctrines of nullification; which, if they had had any existence, would at once have silenced the most formidable battery, and satisfied the most extravagant jealousy of State independence. So far from denying the fact of the paramount authority of the United States, they manfully and successfully defended it. The general convention itself, upon the consummation of their work, in communicating it to the States, through the Continental Congress, admit and answer it, declaring that "it is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of the States to secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all."

This new school in politics teaches that the several States have, by the constitution, only delegated certain powers, which each may resume at pleasure. The United States have the power to declare war; but each State has the reserved right to annul it and be herself at peace! The United States may make treaties; but each State may, ad libitum, revoke this authority, and terminate the compact! Express prohibitions are imposed upon the States; they may not declare war, make treaties, coin money, emit bills of credit, pass ex post facto laws, or those impairing contracts; and yet every State has reserved the right, at any moment, to cast off all these prohibitions! She is fettered, indeed, but just so long only as it may be her sovereign will and pleasure! And actually to throw off all these restraints, to resume all these powers, is not revolution—it is legal, peaceable, constitutional remedy! It is pursuant to the constitution, within its scope; and the State is still a member of the Union! The United States, the constitution, and the Government, it is said, are but agents; a mere aggregation of delegated powers; yet the agency may be revoked, the delegation terminated, and the constitution and Government remain! It will be no revolution! Can any thing be more preposterous?

Sir, we all admit the original inalienable right of man, individually and collectively, to resent oppression, to overturn and destroy Government, when, by perversions and corruptions, it has become subversive of the ends for which it was instituted. But this is the primary right of force—of revolution—of rebellion, by which Government is overthrown and subverted. It is not pursuant to the law of the land; it is above and beyond it; it is in defiance of oppressive legislation. Can the destruction of the Government be legal? Can the annihilation of the constitution be constitutional? The distinguished member from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has referred to the danger to which their slave property might be exposed if his doctrines be not established. Will he permit me to warn him of the greater danger of superseding the securities of the constitution? Let him beware how he appeals from the plain stipulations of that instrument to the original and inalienable rights of man. Let him not lead the way in a course of reasoning which points directly to the inquiry, by what means one half of the human beings upon the soil of South Carolina are held in absolute dominion as property by the other—how their natural and sovereign rights have been cloven down, and transferred to their masters. Be not wise beyond what is written. Abide by the constitution; that is your best and highest security. From that solemn compact we will not depart. We have no inclination to disturb it, nor to refine away its guaranties; they are the work of our fathers, and let them be forever sacred.

We have witnessed much controversy as to the origin of the constitution. In my judgment, it is the work of the people of the several States acting as separate communities. It was draughted by a convention, and proposed to the States; but, until their adoption, it was a mere proposition, an unexecuted instrument, having no efficiency. The ratification by the people of the several States imparts all its validity. They, having all power, could make it any thing that they pleased. The people of Virginia and Maryland, for example, might agree to commingle in one mass; to amalgamate; to become, as by fusion, one people—abrogating entirely their State institutions, and forming a new single Government over a single community; or they might make a league, a mere confederation; or form a union any where between these two extremes, participating of both, embracing such extent or degrees of each as to them might seem fit. And the same remark may be extended to the other States. Having this power, the only question is, how did they exercise it—what union did they form? The answer is to be found in the instrument itself—the constitution. It has been much contested whether it is federative or popular. It is neither. It is both. In its origin, and in the sources of the organization of the Government, it is federative; in the action of the Government, upon all those subject to its powers, it is popular. The laws are made for, and reach and operate directly upon individuals, passing by the local Governments, and penetrating beyond them, and scarcely recognising the existence of the States as communities. The Judiciary is co-extensive with the legislative power. Such being my view of the fundamental law of this nation, I cannot recognise any right in a State to arrest and repeal the legislation of Congress. I dare not withhold my support from a measure which seems essential to the maintenance of the Government and the constitution. If the Legislature of the nation should refuse to uphold and vindicate them at such a crisis, they must fall, and their authority be prostrated, I fear, forever. I could not forget the past, nor shut my eyes to the fact that the present alarming extent and threatening form of resistance and defiance have been consequent upon the tolerated practical nullification of the State of Georgia. The gentleman from South Carolina nearest to me [Mr. MILLER] has assured us that such is the fact. Attempts have been vainly made to find a distinction between the two. In principle, they are identical. I regret that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH], in his endeavor to render his defence of the one consistent with his condemnation of the other, has deemed it necessary to assail the Supreme Court of the no power over individuals, but only addressed itself to States in their aggregate character as independent communities; and when the new constitution adopted the appropriate remedy, by creating a Government to make laws, a Judiciary to expound them, and an Executive to enforce them directly upon every person within the boundaries of the United States, it was at once foreseen that as the several States had also the power of legislation over the same persons, within their respective limits, the laws of these two Governments would be very likely sometimes to come in conflict. Was not sovereign dominion held over it by all those Powers successively? Before its erection into a State, was it not our territory, our purchased property, subjected to our control, governed by our will, without ever having had, for a moment, the shadow or pretence of independent sovereignty? Was it not made a State by our act? And if, as gentlemen contend, the United States have not one particle of sovereignty, whence, and in what manner, has Louisiana acquired her sovereignty? Could the United States impart it, having none themselves; and not only impart, but render it transcendently paramount to the express provisions of the constitution controlling or annulling them? Do the United States hold delegated powers from Louisiana, which she may resume at pleasure—resume what she never possessed? Should she take to herself the powers only which she enjoyed prior to her supposed delegation of them by the constitution, she must restore herself to her anterior condition of territorial submission—and this by way of vindicating her sovereignty! How is it now with the Territory of Florida? and what sovereignty will the United States confer when we shall have admitted her into the Union?

The constitution provides for the admission of new States formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts thereof; but, as sovereignty is now found to be inalienable, this provision is thereby rendered utterly nugatory.

The doctrines against which I am contending are as novel as they are extraordinary. They find no place in the history of the formation, adoption, or contemporaneous expositions of the constitution; they were then terra incognita, and have been but recently discovered through the modern telescope of political metaphysics.

In the establishment of our present constitution, the great, prominent, and popular objection of its opponents was its supremacy and paramount authority over the States, its subtractions from State sovereignty. Its friends found it necessary to encounter this most formidable objection, by their utmost strength of fact and argument. All ability was exerted to overcome it; their utmost ingenuity to decide it. And yet not one of its framers in the general convention, of its supporters in the State Conventions, or of its numerous expounders, commentators, and advocates before the people, ever suggested the rights and doctrines of nullification; which, if they had had any existence, would at once have silenced the most formidable battery, and satisfied the most extravagant jealousy of State independence. So far from denying the fact of the paramount authority of the United States, they manfully and successfully defended it. The general convention itself, upon the consummation of their work, in communicating it to the States, through the Continental Congress, admit and answer it, declaring that "it is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of the States to secure all the rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all."

This new school in politics teaches that the several States have, by the constitution, only delegated certain powers, which each may resume at pleasure. The United States have the power to declare war; but each State has the reserved right to annul it and be herself at peace! The United States may make treaties; but each State may, ad libitum, revoke their authority, and terminate the compact! Express prohibitions are imposed upon the States; they may not declare war, make treaties, coin money, emit bills of credit, pass ex post facto laws, or those impairing contracts; and yet every State has reserved the right, at any moment, to cast off all these prohibitions! She is fettered, indeed, but just so long only as it may be her sovereign will and pleasure! And actually to throw off all these restraints, to resume all these powers, is not revolution—it is legal, peaceable, constitutional remedy! It is pursuant to the constitution, within its scope; and the State is still a member of the Union! The United States, the constitution, and the Government, it is said, are but agents; a mere aggregation of delegated powers; yet the agency may be revoked, the delegation terminated, and the constitution and Government remain! It will be no revolution! Can any thing be more preposterous?

Sir, we all admit the original inalienable right of man, individually and collectively, to resent oppression, to overturn and destroy Government, when, by perversions and corruptions, it has become subversive of the ends for which it was instituted. But this is the primary right of force—of revolution—of rebellion, by which Government is overthrown and subverted. It is not pursuant to the law of the land; it is above and beyond it; it is in defiance of oppressive legislation. Can the destruction of the Government be legal? Can the annihilation of the constitution be constitutional? The distinguished member from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has referred to the danger to which their slave property might be exposed if his doctrines be not established. Will he permit me to warn him of the greater danger of superseding the securities of the constitution? Let him beware how he appeals from the plain stipulations of that instrument to the original and inalienable rights of man. Let him not lead the way in a course of reasoning which points directly to the inquiry, by what means one half of the human beings upon the soil of South Carolina are held in absolute dominion as property by the other—how their natural and sovereign rights have been cloven down, and transferred to their masters. Be not wise beyond what is written. Abide by the constitution; that is your best, and highest security. From that solemn compact we will not depart. We have no inclination to disturb it, nor to refine away its guaranties; they are the work of our fathers, and let them be forever sacred.

We have witnessed much controversy as to the origin of the constitution. In my judgment, it is the work of the people of the several States acting as separate communities. It was draughted by a convention, and proposed to the States; but, until their adoption, it was a mere proposition, an unexecuted instrument, having no efficiency. The ratification by the people of the several States imparts all its validity. They, having all power, could make it any thing that they pleased. The people of Virginia and Maryland, for example, might agree to commingle in one mass; to amalgamate; to become, as by fusion, one people—abrogating entirely their State institutions, and forming a new single Government over a single community; or they might make a league, a mere confederation; or form a union any where between these two extremes, participating of both, embracing such extent or degrees of each as to them might seem fit. And the same remark may be extended to the other States. Having this power, the only question is, how did they exercise it—what union did they form? The answer is to be found in the instrument itself—the constitution. It has been much contested whether it is federative or popular. It is neither. It is both. In its origin, and in the sources of the organization of the Government, it is federative; in the action of the Government, upon all those subject to its powers, it is popular. The laws are made for, and reach and operate directly upon individuals, passing by the local Governments, and penetrating beyond them, and scarcely recognising the existence of the States as communities. The Judiciary is co-extensive with the legislative power. Such being my view of the fundamental law of this nation, I cannot recognise any right in a State to arrest and repeal the legislation of Congress. I dare not withhold my support from a measure which seems essential to the maintenance of the Government and the constitution. If the Legislature of the nation should refuse to uphold and vindicate them at such a crisis, they must fall, and their authority be prostrated, I fear, forever. I could not forget the past, nor shut my eyes to the fact that the present alarming extent and threatening form of resistance and defiance have been consequent upon the tolerated practical nullification of the State of Georgia. The gentleman from South Carolina nearest to me [Mr. MILLER] has assured us that such is the fact. Attempts have been vainly made to find a distinction between the two. In principle, they are identical. I regret that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORREST], in his endeavor to render his defence of the one consistent with his condemnation of the other, has deemed it necessary to assail the Supreme Court of the

United States—to pronounce the reasoning and argument of one of its most important decisions to be unworthy the lowest county court in any of the States! I can assure the gentleman that the country regards it far otherwise, and that the most vigorous and gifted minds deem it one of the most powerful productions of the wonderful intellect of the revered chief of that august tribunal. If, in the inscrutable ways of Providence, our institutions are destined to be subverted, and left in ruins by the convulsions of revolution, that decision, and other kindred constitutional opinions from the same mind, will remain to after generations, splendid and enduring monuments of intellectual and moral greatness, and, like the broken columns and classic remains of Athens and Palmyra, be the wonder and admiration of successive ages. The time has arrived when the progress of nullification must be arrested, or the hopes of permanent union surrendered. The gentleman [Mr. CALHOUN] assures us that his theory would make this Government a beautiful system! Beautiful as would be the proud and polished pillars which surround us, if resolved into their original rude and paltry pebbles; beautiful as the dashed mirror, from whose fragments are reflected twenty-four pigmy portraits, instead of one gigantic and noble original!

The triumph of that doctrine dissolves the Union. It must be so regarded by foreign nations; it is almost so even now. Already have the exultations of the oppressor, and the laments of the philanthropist, been heard beyond the Atlantic. They have looked with fear and hope, with wonder and delight, upon the brilliant and beautiful constellation in our western hemisphere, moving in majestic harmony, irradiating the earth with its mild and benignant beams. Shall these stars now be severed and scattered, and, rushing from their orbits through the troubled air, singly and feebly sink into clouds of murky blackness, leaving the world in rayless night? Shall the flag of our common country, the ensign of our nation, which has waved in honor upon every sea—the guardian of our common rights—the herald of our common glory—be severed and torn into twenty-four fragments; and our ships hereafter display for their protection but a tattered rag of one its stripes?—

The gentleman [Mr. CALHOUN] declares, emphatically, that this is a question of liberty or despotism. I believe it—in my conscience I believe it. If this Union be dissolved, despotism is the ultimate result. It requires no prophetic vision to see how it will be accomplished. Draw the line where you will, wars, frequent inevitable wars, will ensue. Border nations have been considered natural enemies. History is little more than a record of their contentions. Human nature is not changed on this side the ocean. Indeed, there is hardly a nation, in any age or continent, which has given more unequivocal proof of devotion to military achievement, and a spirit of martial adventure, than the people of these United States.

Their having been once friends, so far from preventing or restraining, would but aggravate their mutual animosity. The sweetest substances became the most acrid by perversion. Fraternal feelings, corrupted or perverted, give new bitterness and intensity to hatred and revenge. We have already had two wars with Great Britain, who once held toward us a parental relation; and who can doubt that they would have been more frequent had we been separated only by an imaginary line? The different sections of the country arrayed in arms each against the other would know no bounds to their mutual exasperation. We should be told, in relation to the slave population, what the British Parliament were with respect to the Indian savages—that they were arms which God and nature have put into our hands. It would, indeed, be a sacrilegious abuse of that hallowed name—but the argument would prevail; a servile war would be kindled. Relentless and fiendlike passions would be let loose to rage with unbridled license; and violence and havoc, conflagration and devastation, would ensue—the horrors of which could be depicted only by the imagination of a Milton or a Dante. It would seem that the severe regions of the North would have less to apprehend from hostile invasions. Southern chivalry, even if not in requisition for the defence of their own sunny lands, would find little to invite them to arctic expeditions. Would they come to our rugged soil and more rugged clime, to our rock-bound shores and snow-capped hills? Would they penetrate a dense and teeming population of hardy, laborious, and unyielding freemen—every valley a Thermopylæ, and every hill a Bunker's—where “friends may find a welcome, and foes a grave?” The North is by nature the region of strength. It has been so from the days of Attila, King of the Huns, to Platoff, hetman of the Cossacks. The Northern hive would again swarm upon the blooming and honeyed fields of the South. But is there any consolation in this? In such a contest, victory is disaster, and defeat is death. If this Union shall be severed, free Governments will for a while, perhaps, exist upon its fragments. But on both sides of the dividing line must speedily arise a chain of fortified places and military posts, for protection against sudden incursions of predatory and border warfare, to which they are eminently exposed. Standing armies, to occupy these fortifications, and to repel the formidable danger of organized invasion, are the necessary consequence. A martial spirit will be every where excited, and military ambition universally dominant. One party will obtain success and advantages in the war, to counteract which the other must give additional strength to the Executive arm. The first will resort to the same expedient to regain their preponderance, and the weaker will then concentrate all their power in the hands of one man, that it may be wielded with the most efficiency for their protection. Imminent danger of destruction, and the primary law of self-preservation, will silence the voice of liberty; civil power will be merged, and military despotism wave its horrid and resistless sceptre over the ruins of the republic.

This Union is not only the citadel of our liberty, but the depository of the hopes of the human race. He who shall be its destroyer will go down to future ages, associated, indeed, with its founder, the Father of his country—but with a contrasted immortality. No halo of glory will surround his brows, but on his head will gather the hissing curses of all generations—horrible as the snakes of Medusa. He will stand on the highest and blackest eminence of infamy—the station of mankind. If he meet not a traitor's death, he will fill a traitor's grave; over which there will be no requiem but the groans of the oppressed and the execrations of the good. His monument will be of human bones, upon foundations slippery with human blood. However high may have been his elevation, his fall will be like that of Lucifer; and, like him, sinking into his bottomless and boundless habitation of darkness and woe, he may exclaim—

“Hail! horrors, hail!
• • And thou, profoundest Hell,
Receive thy new possessor!”

Mr. FORSYTH said that he regarded the constitution as a surrender of power by the people, on behalf of their States, to the United States. He presumed that the gentleman from South Carolina could not contest the right of a people to surrender their sovereignty. By the constitution, they had surrendered their sovereignty, with the single exception of the equality of representation in this House. He considered that among the powers which were delegated to the United States, was the right to determine the mode and manner of obtaining redress of grievances. He also said a few words in reply to the assertion of the Senator from South Carolina, that the General Government could not give a guaranty to that State, in her present condition. Mr. F. concluded by moving to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN asked for a suspension of the motion for a moment; and it being granted, Mr. C. said he wished to have a vote taken on the resolutions as he had offered them. This could not be done without the withdrawal by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] of his proposed substitute, as the order of the Senate required that the vote should be first taken on the substitute.

Mr. GRUNDY said, if a vote was to be taken, it would be necessary for him to address the Senate; and declined to withdraw his substitute.

Mr. WEBSTER inquired if it was the wish of the Senator from South Carolina to take the question on his resolutions.

Mr. CALHOUN replied that he would not call for the question, as the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would, at this late period of the session, have the preference, and preclude any expression of the Senate's opinion on the original resolutions.

The resolutions were then, on the motion of Mr. FORTYTH, laid on the table.

THE TARIFF.

The bill from the House of Representatives to modify the existing tariff, (Mr. CLAY's bill, which was introduced yesterday in the House, and passed to-day,) was brought into the Senate by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, with a message from the House, requesting the concurrence of the Senate thereto; and the bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY then observed, that he had no disposition, without the assent of the Senate, to hasten the bill. He left it to them to say whether it should be read a second time that evening. There was no necessity, he presumed, to refer it to a committee, as the same bill, in terms, had been before a select one, and sufficiently discussed; and, indeed, the rules of the Senate did not require it. He would be satisfied with acting on it to-morrow, or the next day.

Objection being made to its second reading to-day,

The bill introduced by Mr. CLAY, to modify the tariff, which was before the Senate when it adjourned yesterday, then came up as the unfinished business, and was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

THE TARIFF.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to modify the act of the 14th of July, and other acts imposing duties on imports, was taken up, in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY moved that the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. GRUNDY inquired if the Senator from Kentucky had examined the bill to ascertain if it was the same as the bill which had been before the Senate.

Mr. CLAY replied in the affirmative; and said, that he believed it corresponded word for word with the other bill.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to amend the bill, by adding a provision, that the rule by which the graduation of duties shall be made, shall be the annual report of the state of commerce and navigation for the last year.

Mr. CLAY opposed the amendment, because he thought that it was founded on a total misapprehension of the bill. There would be now no difficulty in executing the law, if the Secretary of the Treasury should take it up in the spirit in which it will be passed. At the next session there will be a month before the bill will go into operation, while there are but three days left of this session; and any amendment made now must hazard the measure. He would take the example of the framers of the constitution, and follow it. They said, make the constitution, and let it be amended afterwards, and not now hazard the measure.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that although he thought that some amendments were indispensably necessary, yet if the bill were to pass, it ought to pass at once, and he hoped his friend from New Jersey would withdraw his amendment, and leave the matter to stand over until next session.

Mr. SMITH, referring to the state of another bill, (the force bill, now depending in the House of Representatives,) said that he would now give notice that he should to-morrow move to lay this bill on the table, until that bill should have passed.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that although he was in favor of the principle of the amendment, he should vote against it, because he thought that it would, at this period of the session, hazard the passage of the measure.

Mr. ROBBINS expressed a wish to state his objections to the bill, but on the suggestion of

Mr. CLAY, who said he would not press the third reading to-day,

Mr. ROBBINS gave way until the question on the third reading should come up.

The bill was then reported without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time.

AMERICAN STATE PAPERS.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to postpone the preceding orders, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution extending the subscription made to the compilation of documents, now in progress by Gales and Seaton, to the continuation of the same; which was agreed to.

The resolution was then read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HILL asked what was the cost of the documents already printed.

Mr. ROBBINS said he was not prepared to answer.

The resolution was then reported without amendment.

The question being on the third reading of the resolution, Mr. HILL asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

After a few words from Mr. CHAMBERS and Mr. ROBBINS, the question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS:—Messrs. Bell, Black, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Robbins, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—22.

NAYS:—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Grundy, Hill, King, Moore, White.—9.

So the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked permission to offer a resolution, in consequence of the abandonment of all hope that this new code for the District of Columbia could be passed at this session. He thought that at no session hereafter was it likely that members would go through the whole of the details of the voluminous bill which had been reported. It was therefore deemed advisable by the committee that the bill should be submitted during the recess to such of the citizens as were interested in the matter, in order that their suggestions might be received for the regulation of the action of Congress at the next session. He then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate cause to be

[It was agreed to on the following day.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

This day was consumed in the consideration of various private bills, District bills, and in executive business.

FRIDAY, MARCH 1.

THE TARIFF.

The bill for modifying the duties on imports, as passed by the House of Representatives, (in effect, Mr. CLAY's bill,) being read the third time, and put on its passage—

Mr. ROBBINS said he had returned to his first impressions, which were unfavorable to this project; he doubted his own, because some friends, to whom he had been in the habit of deferring much, had different impressions. But reflection has satisfied me (said Mr. R.) that my own impressions were right; and though the amendments to the bill have weakened, they have not removed them. I cannot dissemble my dislike of the bill, notwithstanding the temporary political good effect it may, by some, be expected to produce; nor can I refrain from stating the grounds of that dislike, or at least the more prominent grounds.

The bill carries with it the idea that the protective policy is an evil in itself; an evil to be deprecated, and not to be tolerated for a moment, but to prevent a greater evil—namely, the evil of a sudden overthrow of the great establishments dependent upon it; and to be tolerated only for a few short years, to give an opportunity to those establishments to wind up their affairs, and enable them, so far as that time will enable them, to prevent the consummation of their total ruin. The bill thus considers this protective policy as a great state criminal, condemned to die, but whose sentence is respited for a few days, to give him time to arrange his affairs, repent him of his evil deeds, and prepare for death; but whose doom is fixed, and irrevocably die he must. Such an idea going out to the country, I think, must be pernicious in its effects, especially as it goes out from the professed friends, or some of them, of the policy, with its great champion at their head. It must repress the spirit of adventure; it must depreciate the value of those establishments; it must arrest the progress of the business at the point where it now is; no more capital will be invested in it; and the capital already invested will be withdrawn, as far and as fast as it can be. The tide will have reached its high-water mark; it will now turn back and fall to low ebb, perhaps never to recommence its flood. These great establishments, so widely spread over the country, with all the industry dependent upon them, will be kept in a feverish lingering state of existence, suspended between hope and fear; with much to alarm their fears, with little to animate their hopes. It cannot be but this languishing state must ensue; for we all know how feeble is the hand, when not seconded and invigorated by the impulses of the heart.

But I have risen, mainly, to contribute, so far as my poor efforts could contribute, to correct the impression given by the bill to the prejudice of this policy. The protective policy an evil in itself! I would be glad to know if any gentlemen here will tell me that the immense resources of this great country are never to be developed; and, if to be developed, if they can be, without the aid of Government? And then, if this aid can be afforded by any means other than the protective policy?

The boundless resources in our agriculture, with its infinite capabilities; our resources in our mineral wealth; our resources in artificial power by water and by steam; our boundless resources in the manual labor of our many and rapidly increasing millions of people; the resources in the great capital of this country; in the skill acquired and to be acquired; but, above all, in the enterprise and inventive genius of the most enterprising and inventive people that perhaps ever existed on earth—are these resources never to be developed? However we may differ in opinion as to the best means of their development, as to our interest in the object itself we cannot differ; that must be the same every where—in the South and in the North, in the West and in the East. All parts abound with these resources; all are interested in their development. The country is unfaithful to herself, unfaithful to her people, if she do not adopt the means necessary to their development. I ask, again, can this development be effected without the aid of Government? Will any one tell me it can be effected by a system of free trade?—a trade free on one side, and restricted on the other?—free to us by all the world, and restricted by all the world against us? And this is all the free trade we can have. Free trade to develop our resources! Were it not for the respect I bear to some respectable patrons of that opinion, I would say, that such a thesis is only fit to be maintained by school-boys, as an exercise of the schools. How it can be attempted to be maintained by men, enlightened by experience, acquainted with the state of the world, and capable of reflection, is to me incomprehensible. Let them tell me, if they can, how this free trade system can be an efficient instrument of this development? How it touches, or can be ever made to touch, a hundredth part of these resources? They might as well undertake to tell me how a settler in the woods might fell the forest around him with a penknife, and let in the sun to develop the resources of the fertile earth.

I think a little reflection will satisfy any one that our great resources must forever remain dormant if they are to wait their development from the operations of free trade. But by the aid of Government they may be rapidly and fully developed; and by means so obvious, so direct, and so adequate, that nothing appears to me so unaccountable as the struggle that is made to prevent their adoption; or to get rid of them, so far as they have been adopted. It is only to give to the industry, the capital, and the enterprise of the country, the market of the country, and the work is accomplished, or in a train of rapid accomplishment. The result is necessary; if we look into the cause, we see it must be necessary; we see there a force that must have this effect. A market is the mighty power that is to perform this mighty work; and there are no limits to this power when created by this policy. The market brings forth your resources, and your resources augment the market; the action and the re-action are reciprocal, and the reciprocal effect is as unlimited as your resources themselves. The stream does not flow with more certainty from its fountain, and roll on to the ocean, than the development of all our resources would flow, from the operation of the simple expedient of giving to the industry of the country the market of the country.

Is it wise, then, to tell this country, as this bill seems to tell them, that this policy, so benevolent in its effects, so almighty, I might almost say, in its benevolent effects, is an evil in itself; and to be got rid of as soon as it can be under existing circumstances? I think not.

Again: this bill, if it is to be the permanent system of the country, (and there is nothing in it that implies the contrary; that is what it professes to be on its face,) it does propose that the country shall take security against the country—not to pursue any further, after the 30th of June, 1842, the great work of developing her own resources; to which work a system of protection is indispensable. For I have not heard one gentleman, either friend or foe to it, say that this bill would afford a system of protection; nor is it possible that any one should say this, and speak from knowledge of the subject.

But it has only been said, in its favor, first, that it preserves the principle of protection. Now, what signifies it to preserve the principle of protection, if protection itself is not preserved? If the principle is so limited and restricted in its exercise, as it is in this bill, that it cannot give protection, it might as well be out of the bill as in it. It is nugatory as to the great object. And then, it is said that the bill, as it is, will protect some branches of industry. True, it may some—a few. I think it probable that some few fragments of the system will remain, and survive the shock of 1842; but the system itself will be gone; and with it will be gone the necessary means to the great end of developing the resources of the country, which, as I have so often said, can only be found in a system, a complete system, of protection. They never can be found in a few fragments of a system. Then, in 1842, the barriers are to be broken down, and our markets are to be thrown open to the world, while the markets of the world are to remain closed against us, as they now are. Then will commence the glorious era of free trade, and its reign, by the bill, thereafter is to be everlasting. The 30th of June, 1842, will be to England a day of jubilee, such as she has rarely witnessed; the prospect of that day will infuse a lively joy into every British bosom; for that day is to let in and give to her industry, while it takes from our own, the supply of the wants of eighteen millions of people, and on her own terms.

"What shame, what loss is this to Greece! what joy

"To Troy's proud monarch, and the friends of Troy!"

If we were now at war with Great Britain, and if by the fortune of that war this country was subdued, and at the mercy of Great Britain; (I ask pardon of my country for supposing an event of the contest which I know would be impossible;) in that event, the worst we should have to apprehend from our conquerors would be, that very condition which we are going to impose upon ourselves. The greatest calamity that foreign war and foreign subjugation could inflict, is going to be inflicted on the country by the country herself. What, then, Great Britain, with her thousand ships, with her Wellington, and her Wellington armies, and by a ten years' war, could not acquire to herself, she is going to secure to herself by one single act of our own folly. Her young and gigantic rival, and the only rival she now dreads, whose eagle she has seen taking his flights with many a jealous pang; that young and gigantic rival is going to relieve her from all her inquietudes, by becoming her tributary. We may, then, bid adieu to all those visions of glory in which we have so fondly indulged, as connected with our future destinies, and take an humble rank with the tributary nations of the earth; tributary to a nation who has the wisdom to adhere to a policy which we have the folly to reject, and shall have renounced forever.

I know it is said this bill is not to be what it professes to be—a permanent system for this country. But, if this system is to be adopted, and then to be destroyed, who are to destroy it? We, the friends of the policy, are to destroy it—we are to wage the war—we are to make the attack—we are to obtain the conquest over it. Now, I had rather be in a condition to have to defend our own possessions, than to have to attack and conquer those of the enemy. I do not like the idea of first giving up our possessions, and then of going to war in order to recover them back. The event of that war depends upon the uncertain contingencies of the uncertain future; and I see nothing in the hopes resting on those contingencies to countervail the force of my contrary fears, and to quiet my mind on the subject.

It is said, too, that the treasury is in danger of a plethora, from a surplus, or accumulating surpluses, of revenue; that this danger must be obviated by graduating our income to the wants of the Government, Wants of the Government! These must depend upon the objects of expenditure by the Government; and these must be determined by the wisdom and discretion of Congress, hereafter, as well as now; they cannot be prescribed and limited by us. If an overflowing treasury be an evil, it will be time enough to apply a remedy when the evil exists. At present it does not exist, nor can we know with certainty that it will exist hereafter. But is an overflowing treasury an evil? and such an evil, that all the great interests of the country, involved in the development of her great resources, must be sacrificed to its prevention? An evil! Who feels this surplus of revenue, if there should be a surplus, as a burden? From whom does it abstract one necessary of life, one comfort, one luxury? Not an individual in this country. The revenues of this country are no more felt as a burden upon them, by the people of this country, than the dews of heaven are felt as a burden upon them; they are alike unconscious of both; and no one would think of the former as a burden, but for the metaphysics employed to prove it to be a burden. What sort of burden is that which is felt only by the aid of metaphysics, and then only by the aid of imagination?

I hope we shall consider, and, if we do not, that a future Congress will consider, the great and glorious objects yet to be accomplished by this Government, and to which these surpluses will be necessary—objects of national improvement, demanded by the geographical situation of the country, and which constitute, in fact, one of her great resources yet to be developed; and the establishment, too, necessary to develop the resources of the mind of the country—if she should deem it worthy of her ambition to aspire to the most glorious of all fame, the fame which mind confers by her immortal works. Believe me, the establishments necessary to this glorious end are yet to be created. Little views to little savings, very proper for petty corporations, are not the views proper to the statesman in the American Congress. These ought to be large and prospective, and to correspond to the grandeur of the trust committed to his charge; otherwise he runs the risk of dwarfing the country born of gigantic proportions to the littleness of his little views. The prospect of these surpluses, then, far from embarrassing, rejoices me; for I see in them the means to great and desirable ends, and without occasioning a particle of grievance or inconvenience to the people.

I know it is said, too, that the dissolution of the Union is threatened, and that this bill is necessary to hold the States together. Yet it is said, in the same breath, that this bond is no bond, and is represented as frangible as the flax scorched by the fire. The tendency to fly off from the Union, I should hope, was not very strong, if it could be overcome and constrained by so frail a ligature. But to be serious: this very argument is what alarms me most as to the stability and efficiency of this Union. Here, in this body, we have seen an inherent power claimed for the States unknown to the constitution, and incompatible with it, and to be despotic over this Union. We have seen a State arm herself with this power, and put herself in an attitude to exert it. That State hath neither disarmed herself nor renounced this power. Now we offer to her this bill, to induce her, not to renounce this power, but to refrain from its exercise at present. Is not this a practical recognition of this fatal power? What is to hinder this State from resuming this attitude hereafter? What is to hinder any other from assuming the same attitude, by this power to wrest from the General Government any one of its powers, or, what amounts to the same thing, prevent its exercise? In that case, by this precedent, we are either to yield the disputed power, or to buy off the Union by a compromise. If this precedent is to govern hereafter, where is the security for the stability or efficiency of this Union? I cannot see.

This bill, however, I suppose, is to pass, notwithstanding all these considerations, and the many others that have been urged with so much more ability. If it does pass, it may smother the fire now raging in one place, but I fear it will preserve the embers, that one day will consume the fabric of the Union.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that as the bill was now on its passage, he desired to make a few remarks, in order that the views which he entertained in relation to it, and the position he occupied, might be distinctly understood.

When the Senator from Kentucky first introduced the bill, he (Mr. C.) then said that he approved of the principle, and that he thought no satisfactory adjustment could take place but on time—time to afford the manufacturers to accommodate their business to the change which must follow the adjustment of the duties. He still remained of the same opinion.

To many of the details of the measure he had objections; but he was willing to take it with its faults, as a peace-offering; and, so far as he was concerned, his influence would not be interposed to prevent an acquiescence. Among the objections to the bill, he thought the reduction of the duties in the first part of the series too slow, and in the last too rapid; and that the time for the final reduction was too remote. He also objected to the home valuation; but he thought that these objections were outweighed by the fact that the bill provided, as to the final result, that the revenue should come down to the just and economical wants of the Government. With the contemplation of this result, as to its final operation, he believed it would be accepted of by the South; and that peace and harmony, as far as this subject was concerned, would be restored to the country.

There had been a good deal said during the discussion, how far this passage of the bill would involve a pledge as to the arrangement of the tariff which he proposed. He felt but little solicitude on that point. He had little faith in pledges; he had experience enough to know that the most solemn compact, and even the constitution itself, would be violated—palpably violated, in his opinion—whenever the dominant party saw its advantage in such violation. His reliance was not on pledge, but the circumstances under which the bill was about to pass; experience had shown the operation of the protective system, and had convinced every reflecting mind that it could not be persisted in without compulsion and division; and he had no fear that any one could be found so reckless as to attempt to reinstate the system with the present experience before his eyes. He had no doubt, if made, the voice of the people would repel it with indignation.

There may, indeed, at the termination of the series, be a question raised, likely to produce some excitement—he meant that of the distribution of the duties under the maximum rate of duty of twenty per cent., as fixed by the bill. But he had no fear that even then, with the light of our present experience, any will dare attempt to propose any distribution which shall not act with substantial justice between the great sections of the Union and the country. With the light which has been shed on this subject, no system will again be attempted which shall impose the taxes so unequally as to operate as burdens on one side, and bounties on the other.

He had said, that as far as this subject was concerned, he believed that peace and harmony would follow. But there is another connected with it, which had passed this House, and which had just been reported as having passed the other, which would prevent the return of quiet. He considered the measure to which he referred as a virtual repeal of the constitution; and, in fact, worse than a positive and direct repeal; as it would leave the majority without any shackles on its power, while the minority, hoping to shelter itself under its protection, and having still some respect left for the instrument, would be trammelled without being protected by its provisions. It would be idle to attempt to disguise that the bill will be a practical assertion of one theory of the constitution against another—the theory advocated by the supporters of the bill, that ours is a consolidated Government, in which the States have no rights, and in which, in fact, they bear the same relation to the whole community as the counties do to the States; and against that view of the constitution which considers it as a compact formed by the States as separate communities, and binding between the States, and not between the individual citizens. No man of candor, who admitted that our constitution is a compact, and was formed and is binding in the manner he had just stated, but must acknowledge that this bill utterly overthrows and prostrates the constitution; and that it leaves the Government under the control of the will of an absolute majority.

If the measure be acquiesced in, it will be the termination of that long controversy which began in the convention, and which has been continued under various fortunes until the present day. But it ought not—it will not—it cannot be acquiesced in—unless the South is dead to the sense of her liberty, and blind to those dangers which surround and menace them; she never will cease resistance until the act is erased from the statute book. To suppose that the entire power of the Union may be placed in the hands of this Government, and that all the various interests in this widely extended country may be safely placed under the will of an unchecked majority, is the extreme of folly and madness. The result would be inevitable, that power would be exclusively centered in the dominant interest north of this river, and that all the south of it would be held as subjected provinces, to be controlled for the exclusive benefit of the stronger section. Such a state of things could not endure; and the constitution and liberty of the country would fall in the contest, if permitted to continue.

He trusted that that would not be the case, but that the advocates of liberty every where, as well in the North as in the South; that those who maintained the doctrines of '98, and the sovereignties of the States; that the republican party throughout the country, would rally against this attempt to establish, by law, doctrines which must subvert the principles on which free institutions could be maintained.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, if this were a mere abstract question, he should concur with the views of his honorable friend from Massachusetts. He did believe, with him, that all civilized nations, who hold commercial relations with the world, must cherish their domestic industry by a protective policy. But, he said, this was not now an abstract but a practical question, of deep and most eventful moment. It is vain, said he, to disguise this matter, that for the last nine or ten years a constant pervading, and almost universal discontent with our tariff system, has prevailed throughout the Southern section of the United States. This dissatisfaction was aggravated by the tariff law of 1828; a measure which all agree was of very exceptionable character in many of its provisions, and at last has broken out into what I must denominate the absurd doctrines of nullification. Although these doctrines are effectually denounced by the power of public sentiment; yet, let it be remembered, this nullification is only one of the many forms by which discontent has manifested its influences. So uncompromising has been the hostility of the South to the policy, that we have seen men, who differ on all other subjects, agree in this. Even party spirit, in its all-absorbing power, has not been able to raise a voice in its favor. Yes, sir, the opposition has grown to such a magnitude, that two months ago every patriot trembled for his country. In this crisis, Mr. F. said, the bill now on its passage, as a great peace offering, was proposed to the deliberations of Congress. I confess, said he, that my mind was greatly embarrassed, and I feared that it was not only of doubtful, but dangerous tendency, not only to the tariff, but to my honorable friend from Kentucky. But the interchange of views, the benefit of opinions from those personally engaged in these branches of our industry, has brought my mind to the clear conviction that it is a patriotic effort to rescue the whole system from the perils that threaten it.

I believe, sir, that the honorable mover in this pacific and healing measure, however he may now be assailed by the press, will yet be hailed and honored by a grateful people, for his agency in restoring peace, harmony, and fraternal feeling to this distracted country.

It is with great satisfaction and consolation, also, that those of my constituents whose interests I am here to protect, are satisfied with the bill before us. They declare their preference for a measure, which secures to them eight years of tranquillity, to high tariffs with continued hostility. Sir, they are willing, and so am I, to wait for the influence which the lights of experience, which time and better feelings, we may hope, will shed over the claims of our great national interests. I am persuaded that far less danger will then betide this policy, than threatens it at this time. The system has, heretofore, had no fair trial with the Southern section. We all know that it has met with constant conflicts on our floors. There has been no time for calm and dispassionate consideration. It has been struggle and resistance, without intermission or end. The strife of debate, and the claims of consistency, have all been pledged against it.

Now, said Mr. F., I trust we shall have peace; the conflict is past; we shall have time to take breath, and look at the subject, with reflection and judgment, in all its national bearings; and I believe, sir, that eight years hence we shall find that public opinion, which now seeks the destruction, enlisted in the support of our home industry. But should we be disappointed at that time, and should the North find the tariff to be essential to its prosperity, and the South persist in unyielding hostility to protection, then, sir, will be soon enough to meet the momentous exigency; and the postponement of such an issue is among the strong inducements to the proposed compromise.

Who is there that does not rejoice, said Mr. F., in the happy change of feelings, that, by the blessing of a benignant Providence, we now witness? However others may have felt, sir, it has taken off from my mind an oppressive load of anxiety. At the commencement of the session apprehensions were strong, in every bosom, that the Union would be shaken to its foundations, if not utterly destroyed. Now, sir, instead of separating under the sad fears that we might not again meet as brethren of the same happy and blessed country, we are about to return to our homes with much of that good temper, kind feelings, and fraternal confidence, which entered so largely into the establishment of our Union.

Mr. DALLAS observed, that he had said, as yet, but little on the subject, and he should perhaps say very little at present. That little, however, he thought it his duty to say. Although the Senator from South Carolina had stated that the South would not view this bill in the light of a pledge to abandon the protective system, yet the gentlemen who had opposed the bill had indicated a different opinion; and, for himself, he was opposed to all that kind of legislation. If, indeed, it were a law in relation to the whole community of the United States, then it might be characterized as a healing measure. He (Mr. D.) had little or no faith in what might be denominated legislative bargains. He was averse to all legislative arrangements which compromised or abandoned certain great principles. This bill might have the effect of healing the grievances of the South, but he apprehended it would operate merely to create discontent in that State from whence he came. Gentleman on that floor, unacquainted with the present condition of Pennsylvania, could scarcely conceive what would be the effect of this measure on it. She had for many years back legislated in reference to her own concerns, in the full belief and confidence that the system which had been established by the United States would be steadily persevered in. If this bill should pass, the overthrow of the protective policy might be looked upon as almost certain; and the inevitable consequence would be, that thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of men, would be thrown out of employment, and become paupers. In addition to this, all those vast internal improvements which have attracted the admiration of other States would be rendered unproductive, and allowed to go into decay and ruin. The State, in order to bring all its resources into play, had expended immense sums in making railroads, turnpikes, and canals, all of which would be comparatively useless, and the loss of capital in consequence would be almost incalculable. Her system of coal-mining, too, would be comparatively unproductive; the attention now paid to the wool-growing interest would cease; and, in a few years, she would present a picture similar to that which she exhibited thirty or forty years ago. He (Mr. D.) thought that a bill involving such important results ought to have been maturely considered and weighed before any final decision was had upon it. But, in the course of ten days this bill had been offered, and passed rapidly through both Houses of Congress, and was now about to become a law of the land. Gentlemen had read private letters from individuals, perhaps partial friends, on the subject of this measure, speaking in praise of it; but really he (Mr. D.) was totally unaware whether or not the writers of them were interested by pure motives. Congress had acted hastily, and in a few days had brought to a final vote a measure which affected the whole people of the United States, more or less. He could have wished the postponement of this question until the meeting of Congress in December next. It would be a Congress under a new basis, a new census, and one which would more fully represent the feelings of the people. But few months would elapse before it would convene, and he thought it would have been wiser to have left this matter for their decision. He would not pretend to say what that might be. If they determined to destroy the system, he would acquiesce cheerfully in that decision, and so also would the State which he represented. South Carolina and Virginia (as far as she had spoken) had fixed upon the next Congress as the time for the settlement of this subject. It is but a few months since Congress had the tariff under debate—in July last: after a very full investigation of the matter, in debates protracted day after day, week after week, and month after month, they came to a conclusion satisfactory to both Houses of Congress; and he believed, that if a bill destroying that measure was now passed, it would be difficult to avoid the character of inconsistency. He thought that this was a measure which ought not to be passed by the Congress of the United States. It provided for a too rapid reduction of the rates of duties, and was not accompanied by sufficient guards and securities in reference to the principles and individuals affected by it. Here Mr. D. stated what his propositions and objections were while the bill was before the select committee. He believed that the honorable gentleman from Delaware agreed with him in all his views, with a single exception, and that was as to the home value. He (Mr. D.) was in favor of cash duties; but his friend was willing to give them up, provided he could get the home value.

[MARCH 1, 1833.]

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had offered some practical views in relation to this subject, which appeared to him (Mr. D.) altogether unanswerable. It had been said that this bill would secure protection and give stability to manufacturers for nine years. It would be very consolatory to him if he could see any foundation for believing that it would. He must look to the bill itself; must judge for himself as to the operation; and he confessed it did appear to him, that gentlemen were mistaken in saying that the principles would be carried into effect. Now, he would ask gentlemen, if a day was pointed out in a given number of years when the whole system was to be abandoned, what would be the inevitable effect with respect to the property of those engaged in the manufacturing business? He would ask honorable Senators whether it was possible to escape the conviction that, as soon as a stop was put to the prolongation of this system beyond the year 1842, the consequence would be, that the value of the property invested in manufactures must be depreciated throughout the country? He knew that the whole system of protection must terminate in 1842: He derived no benefit from his attachment to the system; but after being instructed in it by the gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from South Carolina, he could not consent to the overthrow of the system entirely. He expressed his inability to comprehend the benefits which he was told would result from the passage of the bill. But he was well aware that a skilful pilot in a storm might be giving his vessel a direction towards some preserving eddy at the very moment when, to a landsman, it would appear that she was running directly upon the rocks. So it might be with the gentleman from Kentucky, who had heretofore proved himself to be an admirable pilot. He might be running his ship towards some preserving eddy or current, in order to bring her up. If so, he (Mr. D.) should rejoice, though he confessed he could see nothing ahead but shoals and rocks, and, in consequence, felt himself bound to oppose his course: He, (Mr. D.,) though opposed to the passage of the bill, was nevertheless disposed to give it fair play. The votes given in favor of the measure by the Senators from South Carolina—and he (Mr. D.) said this with great respect—was a practical abandonment of the doctrine of nullification; since, after declaring the act of 1832 null and void, they voted for a measure based upon that act. The votes, therefore, given for this bill, also recognised the other. If we were to get rid of these constitutional scruples by the votes of the gentlemen from South Carolina, why then he considered that something had been gained by the passage of this bill. If it should produce harmony and conciliation among all parties, it would be a subject of universal congratulation.

In conclusion, he would only say that there was no doubt of the passage of the bill; and although it might operate oppressively on the interests of his State, yet, if it had the effect which was anticipated, in reconciling the Southern part of this country, he should feel highly gratified.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said he could not feel that he had discharged his whole duty to himself, and those whom he represented, if he gave a silent vote upon this bill. Modified and matured as it is, said he, I have, after some hesitation, determined to support it; and I will consume as little time as may be in giving the reasons which have brought me to that determination.

I could have wished, had it been practicable, said Mr. E., to have left the subject untouched, at least for the present session. At the last, it occupied our time, and that of the other branch of the National Legislature, for many months. The system which was then matured has, in but few of its provisions, yet gone into operation; but already a kind of political necessity requires that it should be retouched; that, too, in a manner most materially affecting the protection of our domestic industry.

First among the causes which combine to produce this necessity, is the liquidation of the national debt. Heretofore, the duties upon imports could be, and were, laid with the combined objects of revenue and protection, without any apprehension that the revenue would exceed the wants of the country. Whatever surplus might arise, from our highly flourishing commerce, was readily absorbed by the sinking fund, and applied beneficially to the country in the reduction of the national debt. But that debt is now paid, and the imposts must be reduced to the revenue standard, or the surplus revenue must be applied to some objects of national importance. To collect and accumulate in the treasury a surplus fund is what no man would recommend. The application of a surplus revenue to works of internal improvement has been, as is well known, a favorite policy; but the opinion of the present Chief Magistrate is decidedly hostile to this policy; and in this he has been sustained by a majority of the people. His opinions must be acquiesced in; for, without his sanction, no measure of this kind can be adopted—much less can it be acted upon as a system. We are, therefore, constrained to accept this branch of the alternative: the revenue must be brought down to an amount sufficient for the administration of the Government; and the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury show that a reduction of near six millions on the tariff of 1832 is necessary to bring it to that standard.

This necessity existing, the only question left is as to the time and manner of reduction. And I confess, sir, that I have had some weighty objections to touching the subject at this session of Congress. The law that we passed at the last session, on the most mature and careful consideration of all the various interests of our country, has not yet gone into effect, and I could earnestly have desired that the experiment should at least be tried under its provisions, and that we need not have been constrained by circumstances to remodel a work so fresh from our hands. But the Executive denunciation against the protective principle, as contained in his veto message of the 13th of July last; his recommendation in his annual message at the commencement of the present session, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which accompanied it; the immediate movement in the House of Representatives by the friends of the administration there, and the nature of the project presented them, as it was understood, with the concurrence of high authority—all convinced me, that whatever I, and those with whom I act, might wish upon that subject, the thing must and would be done. Another reason which weighed strongly with me against this measure was the attitude recently assumed by South Carolina. The Senator from that State, farthest to my left, [Mr. CALHOUN,] has, in speaking on this subject, deprecated, in the strongest terms, the bill which originated here, and which has just passed the House of Representatives, arming the Executive with power to counteract and resist the measures of that State. But I say, unhesitatingly, for myself, I would never have given my sanction to this bill, or any other which might look to concession and conciliation, without the previous passage of some law such as that asserting the supremacy and sustaining the power of the Union. But the success of that measure, which I entirely approved, and heartily sustained, satisfies me on this point, and removes, in my estimation, that objection to the present consideration of the subject.

This difficulty removed, there are reasons growing out of the situation of the country which would induce me the more readily to do at this time what must soon be done, even if the option were left with me, as I am sure it is not. Sir, the discontents in the whole southern division of our Union—not in Carolina alone, but in the whole South—have been fanned and nurtured, year after year, until they have risen to a pitch of excitement which is destructive of the harmony, if it do not threaten the stability, of our Union. If those unhappy discontents can be removed by this conciliatory measure, it will give us concord and good will, as we have a right to believe it may, when we have for years past had nothing but heartburnings and divisions. If it will, in truth, harmonize the discordant elements of our country, and give us peace at home, I, for one, shall not regret that I have sacrificed some of my predilections to obtain it; and even as to those of our brethren who have wandered farthest and erred most, surely we cannot desire, unless necessity demand it, to see them crushed and humbled to the earth. One of the Grecian generals—I think it was Themistocles—said he would erect a bridge of gold to aid the retreat of an invading enemy; and his saying was a wise one. Ought less to be done to invite the footsteps of returning friends?

But the bill has been assailed, on all sides, with great wrath, and a determined spirit of hostility. The Senator from Georgia, while apparently giving it his support, has pursued a course of argument the best of all calculated to array Southern men and Southern feeling against it. He treats it as an abandonment of principle on their part; as a giving up of all that they have so long and so steadily struggled for, and that, too, at the moment when it was just in their grasp. On the other hand, my friend from Massachusetts, from whom I never differ without much self-distrust, tells us that it is on our part an abandonment of the principle of protection. It contains, he says, a pledge not to vary, not to modify the duties, and that it will put us in the power of foreign nations, and prevent us from countervailing any legislation of theirs which may be directed against our industry.

On the strictest examination which I have been able to give this subject, some of their objections appear to me wholly unfounded, and others greatly exaggerated, by the strong and imposing manner in which they are presented. Of one thing I feel confident; with the intellectual power which is brought to bear upon this proposition, no actual defect in the bill can have escaped exposure, nor is there any one which has not been shown us in its full dimensions at least, if not somewhat magnified. Indeed, I was half inclined to think that my honorable friend himself labored under an illusion similar to that of the philosopher, who, looking through a telescope of very high power, discovered a living monster striding across the disc of the sun. The origin of the wonder is well known. A small insect, invisible to the naked eye, was making its way over a lens of his telescope.

How, sir, is the fact? Does this bill abandon the principle of protection? Satisfy me that it does, and no consideration will induce me to yield it my assent. But, sir, no idea can be more erroneous; even after the year 1842, when all the proposed reductions shall have taken place, there is a long list of articles, nearly one hundred in number, introduced duty free, for the express object of protecting and sustaining the manufactures of our country, and a proposed discrimination of duties on all other articles below the range of 20 per cent. So far, then, from the principle of protection being yielded by this bill, it is distinctly recognised; the sufficiency of that protection is another question, and one which has been already considered by gentlemen more completely masters of the subject in its details than I am.

I cannot concur with the Senator from Massachusetts in his opinion that this bill contains a pledge to sustain future legislation, or rather to bind the honor and consciences of those of us who now support it. I sign no bond in legislation, nor will I hold myself bound beyond what the good of my country may require or justify. Sir, all that it speaks of future legislation is but recommendatory in its nature. It is not law, nor can it have the binding force of law. It is, then, nothing more than an expression of the present opinions of those who support it, having in fact precisely the same force and effect as a resolution; and, on comparing the words in this bill, which my honorable friend construes as a pledge, with the first of a series of resolutions which he offered a few days ago, I can discover no shadow of difference in the principle laid down by each; they are almost identical. In truth, sir, there is nothing in this idea of a pledge so much dwelt upon by the opponents of this bill. All who support it say, with one voice, there is not. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] on the other side, says that he does not so consider it. He trusts to its permanence on the more substantial ground, that the time and circumstances under which it was brought forward, and the effect which it was intended to produce, and which we confidently hope it will produce, in yielding peace and repose to our agitated country, will cause it to be considered as a settlement of this great political controversy, in which each of the extremes has yielded something to union and conciliation; and that no one will touch it until time shall have tested its merits, or some urgent necessity shall require a change.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, near me, [Mr. DALLAS] said, a few days ago, that he looked on this bill as a disgraceful abandonment of the principle of protection. I confess I was surprised, and at the same time gratified, to find that he has entirely changed his opinion; to-day he tells us that he looks upon its acceptance by the gentlemen of the South as an entire abandonment of their opposition to the protective principle. Still, his objections to the measure do not appear to be diminished by this change of opinion; he looks upon it as an abandonment of the interest of the Northern and Middle States, and especially Pennsylvania, who expected, and had a right to expect, that her industry, which had grown up under this system of protection, would be still fostered and protected.

I recollect that the honorable Senator, at the last session of Congress, stood by us through a long and difficult contest, a firm and able supporter of the protective policy. I recollect, too, in the historic sketch which he gave of the origin and progress of that principle in our Government, that he appealed to Washington, and his successors in the Presidential chair, as gentlemen whose recommendations were entitled to respect and consideration. But it was on the opinion of the present Chief Magistrate that he said he rested; and, in speaking of him and his views, he seemed, like the wrapped Platonist, to be lost in the bright emanation of the ethereal essence. But the opinion of the Executive has changed on this subject, or, if not changed, it was not then understood. At the close of that very session, in his veto message, to which I have already referred, he condemns the whole protective policy as iniquitous and unjust; and, in his last annual message, he distinctly tells us that the revenue must be reduced to the wants of the Government. Then, while we remember the authority on which the Senator from Pennsylvania founded his support of the tariff at the last session, and since have seen that foundation swept from beneath his feet; if we recollect, too, that he supported with equal zeal, nay, led the van, was first of the foremost in support of another measure of great national importance—the rechartering of the Bank of the United States; and that, in less than one short month after that measure was destroyed by the veto of the Executive, the honorable Senator attended and addressed an assembly of his fellow citizens met to approve the veto, and consequently to repudiate the law which was forbidden; while we recollect these things, I appeal to the gentleman himself, had any of us who wished to sustain the protective policy any right to expect his aid in its support, if a bill, which was understood to have originated in a certain high quarter, had come before us for consideration. Let the honorable Senator remember, too, that but one intimation of his views upon this subject was permitted to escape during the present session, until this bill was presented by the Senator from Kentucky; and that expression, as I understood it, went to this: that he would abandon the whole protective policy, if necessary, to preserve the Union. We had this without the explanation which the Senator has since given of it; and always heretofore, during the present session, on this subject, he has been either silent or ambiguous.

Under these circumstances, if we had wished to make a stand, and hazard every thing in support of the present tariff, had we any reason to hope for the support of the Senator from Pennsylvania? We thought we had none; and the Senator himself will, I fancy, be satisfied that we reasoned correctly from the facts that were before us; and, without his aid, and that of those who act with him, we well knew the effort would be hopeless. And what right has the honorable Senator, or what right has Pennsylvania to complain, if this state of things do in fact lead to the prostration of her industry? She has placed in the hands of an individual the power, after he had expressly declared that he had the will to destroy this system. Situated thus, we saw and felt that the protective policy could not be long sustained in its present effective form; it must suffer retrenchment and diminution; many of its roots must be severed, and its branches topped. But, with care and caution in the process, we still hoped that the trunk might be preserved; but, in this hour of trial, it was thought better that it should be in the hands of its friends than of its enemies. Since reduction was inevitable, there is, in my opinion, no mode which could have been devised, better than that gradual reduction proposed by this bill. It causes no sudden shock in the business of the country, and it gives time to the manufacturers to mature their machinery, perfect themselves in the details of their business, and prepare to meet the foreign competition as it gradually presses upon them. In every respect it is better than a sudden and immediate reduction, such as was proposed in the original bill reported in the House.

A gradual reduction, by legislation, from year to year, would have been attended also with unhappy consequences. No one could have rested for a single year on a certainty of the future; the public mind would have been still kept in a constant state of feverish excitement; a war of intellect and opinions would have been still waged, and the extreme sections of the Union would have gone on increasing in bitterness and hostility against each other. But we have a right to hope now, for a short season at least, of quiet; that the troubled ocean will, for a while, be still; and, in the mean time, we have all the chances of a change of public opinion in favor of the protective policy; the chances of war in Europe, which would be itself protection; and, at worst, the protection afforded by this bill, when reduced to its lowest point, will be large, if not ample—taking into view the home valuation and cash duties. And, on the whole, I feel confident that the industry of our country will be more safe in 1842, under the provisions of this bill, than it would be in 1834, if this bill do not become a law.

Mr. MANGUM would not, he said, long detain the Senate; but, before they parted with the subject, as he hoped they soon should, he felt it due to himself to say a few words. Does the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania suppose (said Mr. M.) that we shall be driven from this work of harmony, by his suggestion that it is an abandonment of the grounds which we had taken against the protective system? After sleeping upon it three or four nights, the Senator at last finds that the bill recognises the principle of the tariff of 1832, and he professes his gratification at the readiness of the Southern people to gulp it down. He was not disposed to scan, very closely, a measure, the object of which was to give peace and harmony to the country; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall not, said Mr. M., put words in my mouth, as expressive of my opinions of this measure. He acted on the subject, at this time, in the same manner as formerly. A settlement of the subject had been held out to us, and we were promised a restoration to our rights sooner and more complete. But does any one wish to see a sudden and total destruction of manufactures by a single blow? This bill kept them alive for ten years, and, after that time, will enable all honest pursuits to live and thrive. The honorable gentleman seemed to suppose that the bill derived its origin from some sudden and great panic in the public mind. It becomes not me, said Mr. M., to trace the motives of those who brought forward this measure; but I have no doubt that they are, in an eminent degree, honorable. He felt deep gratitude to those who had come to our deliverance, in the hour of our deepest gloom, when we saw no light save the sparkles which gleamed from the steel of the enemy. If I were tenfold more ambitious than I am, I would not derive more glory than he has who restores peace to an empire like this. His laurels will grow green, and be forever cherished by a grateful people.

It had been said that the bill was the result of a general panic, by those who affected insensibility to the danger to which our institutions were exposed. From the panacea which they advocated, good Lord deliver us! They supported, with a zeal which could not be exceeded, a measure, the abominations of which he wanted words to express. The last argument of kings they chose as the first argument of a republic. They sent out the sword, the bayonet, and the banner, but no olive branch. Gentlemen are startled at the idea of surrendering the dignity of the Government. What Government is it? It is the Government of those who set it up. The solid foundations of its strength are the confidence of the people. When it leaves that confidence, and appeals to the sword for support, it must totter and fall. But, sir, said Mr. M., I leave this subject. I rose to return my thanks to my honorable friends, through whose zealous and patriotic efforts this glorious consummation has been brought about. The measure would, he believed, tranquillize the agitations which threatened to produce a desperate result; and those who had come forward to save our Government, and restore peace and harmony to the country, would, he hoped, receive the deep and lasting gratitude of their fellow-citizens.

Mr. CLAYTON then made some observations on the assertion that the principle of protection was abandoned, a statement which he denied. He could not understand how any gentleman could stand up, in the face of all the exemptions which the bill contained of articles used by the manufacturer, and say that there was any intention to abandon the principle of protection. He would not sacrifice any of the great interests of the country, but would look abroad upon the whole, with a desire to extend to all an equal and an efficient protection. He believed that, instead of being abandoned, the tariff system would, hereafter, be placed on a better footing than any on which it had heretofore stood. It was from no feeling of panic that he had been induced to vote for this measure. He had been disposed to soothe the feelings of the people of South Carolina, and to produce a state of things which would bring all the great interests of the country to act together. He replied to some of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHINGTON,] especially to the one in which he had said that this bill contained a pledge which would prevent any honorable man from voting for a repeal of this law. In such a case, he wished the Senator from Massachusetts to establish a rule exclusively for his own government, and to leave others to the same free course of action. He also went over the ground he had formerly taken as to the concurrence between the resolutions of that gentleman and the bill now under consideration. He then replied to what had fallen from the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DALLAS,] as to the course pursued in committee, and insisted that the protection secured by the bill, as it now stands, is more efficient than that which would have been obtained by the amendment of that Senator. He also stated that he had conversed with practical manufacturers, and had been satisfied that none of the great interests of the country would be sacrificed by this bill. In reference to the statements made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, relative to the ruin which this bill would bring on the establishments in Pennsylvania, he expressed his belief that as much injury would not result from this measure as would have resulted from the proposition made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. However Pennsylvania may have legislated at home, she had not, on this floor, shown that steady, inflexible determination not to surrender a particle of the principle of protection which was now manifested. He would not permit it to go forth to the world that he and his friends, who were about to record with pleasure, because it would give peace to the country, their names in favor of this bill, were about to yield any thing of the principle of protection. He regretted that he had occupied the Senate so long. He would not go through the clauses of the bill, which was printed. He trusted that his constituents would understand the motives which had induced him to vote for this bill. If he should find, at the expiration of the nine years, that there had been too much yielded of the interests of the manufacturers, he would willingly go with those friends with whom he had so long acted, in restoring things to their former condition.

Mr. WEBSTER said, in respect to what was surrendered by the bill, gentlemen had stated their own opinions. He stood before the country on the proposition that every thing which had been found valuable in the protective system was abandoned by the bill. True, there was a list of free articles in the bill, but the essential principles of the protective system were specific duties and discriminating duties, which the bill abandoned to destruction. He went before the country on the position that the only principles of a protective tariff, which in this or any other country had been found valuable, were not contained in this tariff. As to the pledge for the continuance of this system, he could not express his views of it more strongly than the gentleman from Kentucky had done. Every body, he said, would be disposed to repeat it. I cannot, said Mr. W., judge for others, but if I voted for the bill, I should feel myself bound to suffer it to go into complete operation. When we show the friends of the bill that it will destroy manufactures, they say, let posterity take care of itself. Every argument in favor of the bill results in this: Why not, they ask, let the year 1842 take care of itself? But do you not legislate for 1842 by this bill? It might be that the peace and quiet expected from this measure will follow from it, but he did not believe it. He believed that, next year, it would be found that the bill was impracticable, and could not be put in operation without further legislation; and that further, it would be found not to diminish the revenue at all. He might be mistaken, but this was his opinion. The gentlemen from New Jersey and Delaware had stated that, in the opinion of practical business men, the bill would not essentially injure the handicraft and some other interests. The opinion of half a dozen gentlemen, however respectable, could not be taken as the general sense of practical men; nor were practical men always the surest guides in legislation. When they are persuaded by their friends that this bill will give them eight years of secure protection, they are well satisfied, and look not further into the future. Under the apprehension of what mischief may be done by the next Congress, and under a disposition to send forth to the country a measure of peace, this bill has been pressed upon us: but it was our duty to see that this measure of peace leaves unimpaired our constitutional powers. The gentleman from New Jersey says that the handicraft trades will not suffer; but it is as demonstrable, in my opinion, as any thing can be, that this bill will ultimately destroy many of them. It will be worse for them, when the duty comes down to twenty per cent., than the free trade system. No great improvement is likely to be made in the manufacture of boots and hats, whereby they can be afforded much cheaper than at present. Nobody expects that, at the end of ten years, they will be any better or cheaper than at present. Take ready-made clothing: does any body suppose that it can be furnished so much cheaper at the end of ten years, as to render twenty per cent. an efficient protection? He did not mean to go into this question: he had only risen to state how far, in his opinion, this bill surrendered the principle of protection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, the gentleman from Massachusetts had not dealt fairly with his argument. By the measure under consideration the country would be allowed time to take breath, and the harshness of the present opposition to the protective policy would be soothed. It was true that the interests of the manufacturers would be put to hazard in 1842, but the dangers which they would encounter then would be far less threatening than those which surround them now. If, at the end of eight or ten years, the South will not consent to the continuance of a moderate degree of protection, then we shall have before us the very issue which we now have. Will we have the tariff, or have the Union? His information as to the effect of the reduction upon the handicraftsmen in his State, he had received before he left home. He had submitted to them the question whether the tariff or the Union should be destroyed; and their reply was, that they loved the Union better than the tariff, and would cling to the Union at all hazards. Whenever it comes to that dreadful issue, said Mr. F., I take the Union.

Mr. SILSBEE remarked, that it had been his intention to give his views at length on this subject, but, at this late stage of the bill, he would forego that intention. He rose merely to reply to a remark of the gentleman from Delaware, that a duty of 20 per cent. on home valuation, and paid in cash, would be equal to a duty of 30 per cent. levied and paid in the usual manner. He was convinced that there was a wide difference, and he would explain it in a single word: Take an article which costs abroad $1. The home value, adding the duty of 20 per cent., is 120 cents. The duty on this home value will be 24 cents. The usual credits on duties are eight, ten, and twelve months: they average ten months. Taking the rate of interest at 5 per cent., the payment of duties in cash would add one per cent. to the duty, making the whole amount of duty 25 and not 30 per cent.

Mr. CLAYTON would not, he said, enter into an argument on this point. His object was to give the manufacturers an honest and fair 20 per cent., which he believed would be secured to them by the home valuation and cash payments.

Mr. FORSYTH said, one thing had been conclusively established by the discussion, that the bill was bad. It was taken by all not as good in itself, but as probably good in its effects. He voted for it with all its imperfections on its head, relying upon the declarations of those who ought to know that it would put an end to the distractions of South Carolina. He would have voted for it with pleasure, as somewhat better than the act of 1832, if the second section had been expunged; as it was, he did it reluctantly, confiding in the disposition of his fellow-citizens to bear without complaint their portion of the additional burdens of 144,000 dollars for the ensuing year, as their irritated neighbors were willing to endure yet a larger part.

The Senator from Massachusetts had repeated to-day a question he asked some days since: How could those who should vote for this bill attempt hereafter to modify or repeal it in the face of the pledges upon it? Mr. F. had no difficulty in giving a distinct and satisfactory answer to this inquiry. Those who voted for, were no more bound to regard the law (and it would be nothing more) as sacred, than those who voted against it. It was to be obeyed while it existed, but was changeable, like all other laws; the follies engrafted upon it to the contrary notwithstanding. The idea of pledges was every where given up. How far the circumstances under which it was passed gave firmness and endurance to its provisions was another affair: that was for the people to judge; for himself, he considered himself as totally uncommitted to endure it a single moment beyond the time it should be of public benefit. Had any scruple been felt on this point, it must have been removed by the declarations of the Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON.] They had openly anticipated a better and more effectual bill of protection within the nine years, founded on a looked for change of public opinion in the Western States. Mr. F. anticipated a further modification, if not a complete abandonment of the protective system, from a progressive and progressing change of public opinion in the Western, Middle, and Eastern States.

Mr. F. congratulated himself that a few days of reflection had shown that the suggestions he had thrown out when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] asked leave to introduce the bill, and for which he had been somewhat fiercely assailed from all quarters, were not entirely so unreasonable and anti-pacific as they had been denominated. The validity of the constitutional objection had been substantially conceded. The Senate, too, to save time, had waited for the bill from the House of Representatives; and it was now admitted that, to wait for the next Congress to settle this vexed question, would be a losing game to the manufacturers. The Senator from Kentucky says he saw the torch about to be applied to his favorite system, and he seeks to snatch it away. He did more: he demonstrated that it was in imminent peril. Mr. F. recommended to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] who had rushed upon him with so much knightly fury for expressing this opinion some days since, to couch his lance and charge upon the Senator from Kentucky, whose crime was certainly the greater, as he has taken the trouble to prove what Mr. F. had only asserted.

The Senator from Massachusetts has spoken of the absurdities of the bill very truly; they are numerous and inevitable. Mr. F. had endeavored to remove them; not succeeding, he was contented to take them for the sake of peace, although certainly not a little surprised that they were deemed necessary or sufficient to secure peace. Had the reduction of duties in the time specified been alone insisted on, all would have been well; introducing the pros and cons necessarily begat confusion and contradiction. Fire and water united produce spoke; oil and vinegar shaken into a union produce air bubbles: directly opposite political or politico-economical opinions, acted upon in concert, produce absurdity. The moderate men of both parties have not united to arrange this question; they are not numerous enough at present to effect it. But the fire and sword opposers of the tariff have entered into negotiation with the plunderers of the South. The robbers and the robbees had made terms together. [Mr. F., in using this language, begged to be understood as speaking of the parties, not as he thought of them, but as they spoke of one another.] The question was, how much black mail was to be paid to the Caterans, and for how long, for a contingent promise of future immunity from their predatory inroads? Both parties must have ground to stand upon for defence of their respective adherents; hence the contradictions of the bill. In one point of view, it was all protection; protection, the right to plunder, admitted by the payment of security money falling as low as 20 per cent., and then to stand forever. In another, it was all free trade and sailors' rights: the revenue being to be reduced to the wants of an economical administration of the Government in 1842. Both sides admit that all this is to depend upon contingencies, over which we have no controlling power: but here is the basis for argument on both sides, and each may claim a triumph, and support the claim by quoting the bill as a compromise. Mr. F. did not think that either side could safely cry out with crooked back Richard—

Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by the son of York;
And all the clouds that lower'd upon our house
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
Now are our brows crowned with victorious wreaths.

But, if they could, the sound would be more pleasing to his ear than the trumpet call for one hundred bayonets to reduce the rebellious spirits of the South, or the war-cry of the gallant general to extract a promise from his inflamed auditors to follow him "to the death for his sugar." So far as his opinion was of any value, Mr. F. would not withhold it: he thought the highlanders had made the best of the bargain.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had introduced again the topic of the bill passed a few days since in the Senate, and now just passed in the House of Representatives—the bloody bill—the bill to repeal the constitution. Mr. F. regretted to hear that Senator introduce again this topic: he had been heard on it before, at large, with indulgence, and with all the attention due to his character and the peculiar position in which he stood. This ought to have satisfied him. It cannot have escaped the Senator's observation, that, on this subject, he is struggling against public opinion. Mr. F. would not add any thing to what he had said when the bill was discussed; but there was one remark made by the Senator which was almost exclusively applicable to himself and his friend from Virginia, on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. RIVES.] The Senator said, no one who valued his reputation for candor could deny that that bill was a violation of the constitution, if he admitted that the constitution was founded on compact. Now, Mr. F. said, we [Mr. RIVES and himself] admit that the constitution is founded on a compact between the people of the States, for themselves and for their States. We are the only persons expressing that opinion who have participated in the discussion, and voted for the bill.

[Mr. CALHOUN interposed and said, he hoped the Senator from Georgia would take his whole proposition, between the States as separate, independent communities, and still subsisting as independent communities united by compact.]

Mr. F. said, he did not understand the remark to have been so qualified. It was not important, however, to enter into the opinion in detail. He had expressed, and he now repeated his conviction, for which he claimed all the credit for sincerity due to that expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the bill passed by the two Houses was constitutional and expedient. He knew well he was to be assailed on that ground, and was quite ready to meet the assault. Standing alone more than once before his constituents, he had never failed to receive a patient hearing, and never was or would be deserted by them while he was sustained by reason and justice. Mr.

The Tariff.

[SENATE.]

F. heard with pleasure that the tariff was to be no longer discussed; that the bloody bill was to take its place as the battle-word in the next Southern campaign. The old subject was threadbare as a matter of dispute; a pretty quarrel enough, until it was spoiled by the late explanation. It was now time to look for something new, and the bill "to repeal the constitution" might serve for a term, until something better offered. Mr. F. rejoiced to hear that the contest was to be bloodless; there was to be no force. Paper bullets of the brain were to be substituted for musket balls; the cannons of the press for the cannon of the artillery; steel pens for steel bayonets; and the cartouch-box was to be thrown aside forever, while we are to stick to what should never have been abandoned, the great panacea for all our political evils—the ballot box. With this change in the mode and material of war, the republic was safe. To the end of the contest Mr. F. looked with a confidence proportioned to his knowledge of the enlightened people who were to award the palm of victory.

Mr. F. could not refrain from addressing a few words to those of his Southern friends who were so censorious, during the past year, of his vote against the indefinite postponement of the bill of 1832. He was accused of abandoning his opposition to the principle of protection. He surrendered, they maintained this principle; and yet now, at this day, his honorable friends were about to vote with him for this bill, confessedly a bill of protection (protection its great and only end) for nine years. Admit the right to protect for an hour, and theoretically and practically it is admitting it forever. The amount of protective duty is also unimportant to the principle. A duty of twenty per cent., not for revenue but protection, is an abandonment of opposition to the principle as complete as a duty of one hundred. Mr. F. referred to this matter with no feeling of resentment to those who had differed with him, or of gratification at their changed position, but simply to satisfy those who were disposed to condemn him that they had not done him justice. They act now as he had acted then. They make the most of the circumstances of the hour; are willing to admit some evil, that greater evil may not fall upon us.

Mr. SPRAGUE replied to what had fallen from the last speaker, and expressed his regret that the gentleman from Georgia should make his speech run counter to his vote. He repeated what he had formerly said, that this was a concession from the strong to the weak; and argued that a change had taken place in consequence of the influence of the desire of concession, in the opinions of many who were opposed to any legislative action. If the spirit which ran through the speech of the Senator from Georgia was the prevailing spirit in the South, there would have been found in his part of the country a different spirit than that of concession.

Mr. HOLMES said he was astonished that any one should speak of consistency in his presence. Every thing he saw or heard convinced him that he was the only consistent man in the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts threw charges of inconsistency against South Carolina, and the latter threw them back, and so on and so forth. He was bound to believe them all, as they were all honorable men, and consequently he was bound to believe that they were all inconsistent. He then went into an examination of what had been said, pro and con, on the subject of the pledge contained in the bill. In reference to the representative obligation, he was happy to be supported by his friend from Delaware, who had said that he did not view himself as the exclusive representative of Delaware. Now, he did not regard himself as the exclusive representative of his assumed constituents; and when he received some time since instructions from those who, like himself, were merely representatives of others, he thought them entitled to any thing rather than respect. He had answered them, and he believed they were since very sorry they had ever passed their resolutions; for what with his answer, and what with their disposition of it, they had managed to make themselves supremely ridiculous. He went on to state, that the Northern manufacturers would deem themselves sufficiently protected by this bill; and that the possibility was, that the next application for protection would be from the South. He then declared that all the legislative efforts which might be brought against the manufacturers would never be found able to put down Yankee industry and Yankee enterprise.

Mr. WRIGHT rose, he said, to give very concisely the views which he entertained in regard to this measure. His objections to it were strong; and, under any other than existing circumstances, would perhaps be insurmountable. He thought the reduction too slow for the first eight years, and vastly too rapid afterwards. Again, he objected to the inequality of the rule of reduction which had been adopted. It will be seen, at once, that on articles paying one hundred per cent. duty, the reduction is dangerously rapid. There was uniformity in the rule adopted by the bill, as regards its operation on existing laws. The first object of the bill was to effect a compromise between the conflicting views of the friends and the opponents of protection. It purports to extend relief to Southern interest; and yet it enhances the duty on one of the most material articles of Southern consumption—negro cloths. Again, while it increases this duty, it imposes no corresponding duty on the raw material from which the fabric is made.

Another objection arose from his mature conviction that the principle of home valuation was absurd, impracticable, and of very unequal operation. The reduction on some articles of prime necessity—iron, for example—was so great and so rapid, that he was perfectly satisfied that it would stop all further production before the expiration of eight years. The principle of discrimination was one of the points introduced into the discussion; and, as to this, he would say that the bill did not recognise, after a limited period, the power of Congress to afford protection by discriminating duties. It provides protection for a certain length of time, but does not ultimately recognise the principle of protection. The bill proposes ultimately to reduce all articles which pay duty to the same rate of duty. This principle of revenue was entirely unknown to our laws, and, in his opinion, was an unwarrantable innovation. Gentlemen advocating the principle and policy of free trade admit the power of Congress to lay and collect such duties as are necessary for the purposes of revenue; and to that extent they will incidentally afford protection to manufactures. He would, upon all occasions, contend that no more money should be raised from duties on imports than the Government needs; and this principle he wished now to state in plain terms. He adverted to the proceedings of the Free Trade Convention to show that, by a large majority, (120 to 7,) they recognised the constitutional power of Congress to afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures. They expressly agreed that the principle of discrimination was in consonance with the constitution.

Still another objection he had to the bill. It proposed on its face, and, as he thought, directly, to restrict the action of our successors. We had no power, he contended, to bind our successors. We might legislate prospectively, and a future Congress could stop the course of this prospective legislation. He had, however, no alternative but to vote for the bill, with all its defects, because it contained some provisions which the state of the country rendered indispensably necessary.

This brought him to the consideration of the reasons which would induce him to vote for the bill. Under what circumstances, Mr. President, are we called upon to vote for a bill thus imperfect? Is the occasion one of ordinary character, and one which can be lightly regarded? He might render himself obnoxious to the charge of legislating under the influence of fear. But are there not considerations of a proper nature which operate in favor of this measure? What are they? There is, in some parts of the country, a strong and deep expression of discontent at our legislation on the subject of the tariff. These discontents, it was not to be concealed, had risen to such a height as to threaten the peace of the country and the integrity of the Union. The hostile attitude assumed by a sister State towards the country had induced us to do what we are now bound to do, and a refusal to do which would have endangered the integrity of the Union. The blow was aimed at the fiscal resources of the country—at the purse, which was a troublesome thing to manage, though without it Government could not exist. The measure proposed would restore harmony to the country, and he believed it to be just and proper to yield much for the purpose of effecting this object. The time was come when the revenue should be reduced, even the revenue derived from protected articles. This single measure for effecting a reduction was presented to him for his acceptance or rejection; and, defective as it was in many respects, he would take it as a satisfactory concession to all that portion of the South which believed the existing laws to be unjust and oppressive.

SENATE.]

The Tariff.

[MARCH 1, 1853.]

It was unnecessary to say that the whole country was strongly impressed with the necessity of reducing the revenue gradually to the wants of the Government. It was the details of such a measure, it was the rule by which we should reach the proper standard, upon which members of this body and the people generally differed. If no better measure than that before us would be agreed upon, he should feel it to be his duty to support it. He had now given the reasons which would induce him to vote for the bill. The principal reason was, that a sister State of the Union was highly exasperated at the course of federal legislation, and was on the eve of having recourse to a desperate remedy for what she considered as her wrongs. Thinking this measure to be necessary for the peace of the country, all its defects sunk out of his sight.

Mr. BIBB stated, that he regarded the bill as a peace offering, so offered and so accepted, for the purpose of conciliation:

"Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by the son of"—

Not of Old York, or New York, but a son of the Old Dominion—from the slashes of Hanover; he did not care by what hand it was offered, he would willingly take it. He made a few additional observations on the propriety of taking the bill in the spirit in which it was offered.

Mr. CLAY said a few words in reference to this bill and the enforcing bill, both of which he considered that it was necessary to send forth, as well to show that the laws must be executed, as that there was a disposition to make concessions. He stated, that on the subject of the Government being a compact, he principally agreed with the Senator from South Carolina, but with some difference as to the character of the rights conferred by that compact. He did not adopt the opinion that there had been any advance made in the usurpation of powers by the General Government. He then went into a view of the history of this system to show, that twelve or thirteen years ago there was no opposition raised against the power of Congress to protect domestic industry. The opposition, on constitutional grounds, had subsequently grown up. He then stated, that in his opinion no State could so practically construe the constitution as to nullify the laws of the United States, without plunging the country into all the miseries of anarchy. He said that he adhered to the doctrines of that ablest, wisest, and purest of American statesmen, James Madison, who still lives, and resides in Virginia—the doctrines which were advanced by him in 1799. The answer of that distinguished man to the resolutions of the other States, and his address to the people, effected a sudden revolution of public opinion. The people rallied around him; the alien and sedition laws were repealed; and the usurpations of the General Government were arrested. He viewed the Government as federative in its origin, in its character, and in its operation; and under the clause of the constitution which gives it to Congress to pass all laws to carry into effect the granted powers, they could pass all necessary laws. He hoped that the effect of this bill would conciliate all classes and all sections of the Union.

He did not arrogate any merit for the passage of this bill. He had cherished this system, as a favorite child, and he still clung to it, and should still cling to it. Why had he been reproached? He had come to the aid and found it in the hands of the Philistines, who were desirous to destroy it. He wished to save and cherish it, and to find for it better and safer nurses. He did not wish to employ the sword, but to effect his object by concession and conciliation. He wished to see the system placed on a securer basis, to plant it in the bosoms and affections of the people. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had learned his views of the system from the Senator from South Carolina, had spoken of him as the pilot who was directing the vessel. If it were so, he would ask if she had been secured by a faithful crew? If all had been faithful, he believed there would have been no danger now assailing the system. He assailed no one; he merely defended himself against the reproaches of others.

Another motive with him was to preserve the Union. He feared he saw hands uplifted to destroy the system; he saw the Union endangered; and, in spite of all peril which might assail himself, he had determined to stand forward and attempt the rescue.

He felt himself pained exceedingly in being obliged to separate on the question from valued friends, especially from his friend from Massachusetts, whom he had always respected, and whom he still respected. He then replied to the argument founded on the idea that the protective principle had been abandoned by this bill. He admitted that protection had been better secured by former bills, but there was no surrender by this. He considered revenue as the first object, and protection as the second. As to the reduction of the revenue, he was of opinion that there was an error in the calculations of gentlemen. He thought that in the article of silks alone there would be a considerable reduction. The protection to the mechanic arts was only reduced, by the whole operation of the bill, to twenty-six per cent.; and he did not know that there would be any just ground for complaint, as some of the mechanic arts now enjoy only twenty-five per cent.

The argument of the Senator from New York was against the bill, but he was happy to find his vote was to be for it. If his argument brought other minds to the same conclusion to which it had brought his, the bill would not be in any danger. He would say, save the country—save the Union—and save the American system.

After a few words from Mr. WRIGHT, in which the latter said he had so much confidence in the people as to believe there would not be a worse Congress than this,

Mr. CLAY made a short rejoinder, in which he reminded the gentleman from New York of the words of a much greater man than any member of Congress: "Confidence is a plant of slow growth," which may be accelerated or retarded by circumstances. The gentleman should not outdo him in prepossessions of confidence in the people.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hill, Holmes, Johnston, King, Mangum, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Rives, Robinson, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, White, Wright—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Hendricks, Knight, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Webster, Wilkins—16. So the bill was finally passed.

The Senate then took a recess of an hour and a half, until a quarter past seven o'clock.

On re-assembling in the evening, and after disposing of much other business, the Senate took up the amendment made by the House of Representatives to the bill authorizing the distribution of the proceeds of the PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLAY said that, although the objects to which these proceeds were to be applied were a favorite point with him, yet as he had found that he was differing on this topic with some of his friends, and as it had been suggested that there might be difficulty in another quarter if the words struck out by the House were retained, he would move to concur in the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON expressed a hope that the question would not be pressed at this late hour, in so thin a Senate, when many were absent who are so much interested in the measure. He hoped that the question would not be taken, except in a full Senate.

Mr. CLAY expressed his regret that, at this late period of the session, the Senator from Illinois should wish for delay, which might endanger the passage of the bill. It was not the fault of the members present that there are so many absentees.

Mr. C. wished to take the question to-night, in order that the Executive might have time to act upon the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he should vote against the amendment. He would rather vote against the bill than take it with the amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to concur, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Black, Buckner, Clay, Clayton, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Hendricks, Holmes, King, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Robbins, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, White—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Chambers, Grundy, Robinson, Tipton—5.

So the amendment was concurred in.

And at 11 o'clock the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, MARCH 2.

ADDITIONAL PENSION AGENCY.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill authorizing the establishment of a Pension Agency at Decatur, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the bill, so as to read "one pension agency in the northern part of the State of Alabama," &c.

Mr. CHAMBERS objected to the bill, which he regarded as an effort to remove the public funds from the United States Bank. As the charter of the bank will expire in two years, it was scarcely worth while, for that short period, to make the change.

Mr. KING disclaimed any intention to charge against the United States Bank that it was not competent to perform its obligations to pay the pensioners. The object of the friends of the bill was to enable the pensioners in Alabama to obtain their pensions without being put to the expense, inconvenience, and delay, which are consequent on a journey to the place where the moneys are deposited.

Mr. SPRAGUE opposed the bill. He warned the Senate against returning to the practice of investing the public funds in local banks, by which the Government had already sustained heavy losses. The system established had been found convenient, easy, and secure; and there was no reason for departing from it. If this bill passed, Maine would have an equal right to come to Congress for a similar agency.

Mr. EWING moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table, which motion was decided in the affirmative—Yeas 20, nays 17.

So the bill was laid on the table.

EXPLANATION.

In the course of the day, after a great number of bills had been passed through different stages,

Mr. CLAY rose, and said that an incident had occurred a few days ago which gave him very great pain, and he was quite sure that in that feeling the whole Senate participated. I allude, said Mr. C., to some of the observations made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts near me, with reference to an important bill then pending. I was persuaded, at the time those remarks were made, that they were the result of mutual misconception, and were to be attributed solely to that zeal which each of those honorable Senators felt in the position in which they stood towards each other—the one to carry, the other to defeat the measure; with respect to which my friend from Mississippi and myself unfortunately took different views.

The concluding observations of the Senator from Mississippi, after having delivered a very able and argumentative speech, one which I need not say to him and the Senate embodied all which could be brought to bear on his side of the question, and made me regret that we had lost the benefit of his ability—in concluding his remarks, it did appear to some members of the Senate, and to myself, and I have no doubt that it was so felt by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that there was something personal and peculiarly harsh in his language. Acting on that supposition, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in the course of his observations, also used language which may have seemed to be unnecessarily harsh; but in the sense which I understood the remarks of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Massachusetts might have found some justification.

I can perfectly well conceive, however, that the Senator from Mississippi was influenced in his course by nothing beyond the ardor of the momentary excitement to which he had yielded himself. I know the respect which he bears, has borne at least, and I am sure yet bears, to the Senator from Massachusetts, the personal and friendly intercourse which has always existed between them, and the respect which they bear to each other; and I am perfectly persuaded that the honorable Senator from Mississippi, in the remarks with which he concluded his speech, referred solely to the public course—the public measures of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and the character of the particular measure under consideration, without intending to reflect on the personal character of the gentleman from Massachusetts. And I am sure it was not the purpose of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to give any personal bearing to observations which he felt called upon to make. Under these circumstances, I should feel, and I am sure the Senate would also feel, great pain if these two gentlemen, who have been for so long a time on a footing of friendship, should be separated by any circumstance attributable to hostile feeling; or, rather, to the misunderstanding which has arisen. I am sure that the Senate, as well as myself, would be glad that these two gentlemen should still pursue their friendly feelings to each other; and I hope such an explanation will be given as will produce a reconciliation between the two gentlemen, who have so frequently acted in concert together on important subjects, and who entertain towards each other the highest respect. And I do hope that, in some way or other, means will be found to remove this momentary interruption of the good feeling which had so long existed between these gentlemen, and that nothing will occur to disturb, among the members of the Senate, that harmony and peace, which I trust will prevail among all the members of this body.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose and said, that the circumstance which the honorable Senator from Kentucky had alluded to, as having passed between him and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, was to him a source of regret. The measure under consideration at the time was one to which he was strongly opposed, and against which he entered his solemn protest. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts had advocated that measure with his usual zeal and ability. In the course of his remarks he alluded to the course of the South in opposition to the American system, and charged upon the citizens of that section of the Union in general, and more particularly on South Carolina, acts which amount to treason and rebellion, and a disposition to rupture our happy Union, and to burn the constitution at the point of the bayonet. Coming, sir, from that quarter of the Union, I felt it to be my duty to vindicate it from those aspersions, and to throw back to the honorable Senator, as far as I could, a Roland for his Oliver. Believing that the South was right in the position which it has assumed, I felt authorized to allude to the past history of the country, and to the political conduct of the honorable gentleman himself, in illustration of my argument. Perhaps, in the ardor of my feeling, I went too far; and, if so, I deeply regret it. For it was far from my purpose to violate the decorum of debate which has ever characterized this body, or to express myself with harshness towards the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. He well knows the respect and kindness which I bear for him; and I assure him that I had no intention to reflect either upon his personal character, or the purity of his political motives. Having said this, I trust I have put myself "rectus in curia" on this subject. It was assuredly far from my intention to trespass on the feelings of the honorable member from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEBSTER. It is not more a matter of regret to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, than to myself, that any misunderstanding should have occurred between us. Since our acquaintance in this body, we have been on a footing of kindness and courtesy, and there is no gentleman in the Senate towards whom I have been less inclined to manifest any warmth, which might be attributed to want of decorum. I certainly thought that the last portion of the honorable Senator's remarks had a very strong personal bearing on myself. I certainly thought they were intended to have that effect. I am very happy to hear the honorable gentleman disavow that he intended to give them such a bearing. I respond entirely to the declaration that there has been between us, always, kindness and a good understanding. There are incidents connected with our relative situations towards each other which would make it extremely unpleasant that any thing should occur which can disturb the good understanding which ought to exist between honorable members. I therefore entirely disavow any intention to offer any personal disrespect towards him, in my answer to the remarks which he made towards me.

Mr. POINDEXTER then rose and said, the disclaimer made by the gentleman from Massachusetts calls for further explanation from me. In reply to what I deemed a personal affront towards myself, from the honorable

Senator, I used expressions, which, if such was not intended, might appear harsh, and a violation of the respect which ought to be preserved between members of this honorable body. Finding, from the explanation which has been given by the honorable Senator, that his purpose was not to offer me any personal insult, or to wound my sensibility as an individual, I take this occasion, voluntarily, and with great pleasure, to retract the offensive expressions, hastily used, under the impulse of the moment; and I tender my hand to the honorable Senator with perfect freedom and cordiality.

At three o'clock the Senate took a recess until five o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

At six o'clock the Senate met; when the bill for the relief of Samuel Hall was considered, and ordered to a third reading. The bill was then read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DUDLEY, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

When the doors were re-opened, Mr. CLAY was found speaking. He was engaged in expressing his approbation of the conduct of the President pro tempore of this body. The present, he said, had been a very arduous session. He should not have voted for the present presiding officer, had he been present when he was elected; nor did he mean to say what would be his vote, if the election were now to be made. But he gave with great pleasure his testimony in favor of the faithful, and able, and impartial manner in which that officer had performed his duty. He concluded with asking leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be presented to the honorable HUGH L. WARTZ, for the dignity, ability, and impartiality, with which he has discharged the duties of President pro tempore of the Senate.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Late in the course of the evening,

Mr. POINDEXTER moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow; and asked for the yeas and nays, which were taken as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Buckner, Clay, Dickerson, Holmes, Johnson, Moore, Poindexter, Robbins, Tyler, Waggaman.—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Chambers, Dallas, Dudley, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Robinson, Ruggles, Seymour, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wilkins, Wright, White.—23.

In the course of the evening, a bill from the House of Representatives for making appropriations for building light-houses, &c., was read a first time; and on the question that it be now read a second time,

Mr. GRUNDY objected; and the motion requiring, by rule, the unanimous consent of the Senate; the bill was, of course, rejected.

The Senate then spent about three hours in the consideration of executive business; after which, several attempts were made to induce the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of the heirs of Matthew Lyon; but the Senate refused to consider it.

About half-past four o'clock, A. M., a committee on the part of the Senate was appointed to join such committee as the House might appoint, to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses were ready to adjourn.

The House having appointed a committee, the joint committee waited on the President, and returned with an answer that he had no further communication to make; whereupon,

Mr. KING moved that the Senate adjourn.

MARCH 2, 1833.]

Adjournment.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WHITE (President pro tempore) then rose and addressed the Senate, as follows:

Before the presiding officer leaves the chair, he is desirous of saying a few words.

We met under circumstances calculated to induce us to believe that matters of high excitement would arise during our sojourn here. It was by the will of the majority of this body that I was placed in this chair, to preside over your deliberations. I looked upon the high honor thus conferred to be but temporary; for could I then have foreseen that I was to act in this capacity until now, most certainly my distrust of my experience would have induced me to shrink from undertaking the task. The duties of the Chair are at all times arduous, but the more particularly so when topics of high interest and importance are under discussion. My experience, however, has convinced me that even under these circumstances, the presiding officer may have a pleasant task to perform, when every member submits himself to be guided by the rules of this body, instead of having a law for himself.

I take pleasure in stating, that during the whole course of the session, no act has been done by any one member, and no single expression has reached my ear, calculated to give pain to the presiding officer. If, in the discharge of the duties confided to me, I have had the misfortune to injure or to wound the feelings of any individual, I trust he will do me the justice to believe that it has happened without any intention on my part. I have endeavored to act impartially towards every member of this body; and, I would have them to bear in mind, that if, during the arduous duties I have had to perform, and amidst all the excitements that have existed, any thing like order has been preserved, it must be attributed more to the kindness and courtesy of Senators towards the presiding officer, than to the capacity which he was able to bring to the duties assigned him. It is not probable, in the course of human events, that we can all ever assemble in this chamber again. I shall, after putting the question, take a farewell of all who are here present; and I feel regret that I cannot exchange good wishes with those who are absent; hoping that it may be our good fortune all to meet again.

The President then put the question on adjournment, which was carried, nemine dissente, and

The Senate, at five o'clock, A. M., adjourned sine die.

FLORIDA TERRITORY—Joseph M. White.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1832.

At 12 o'clock Mr. Speaker STEVENSON took the chair, and called the House to order.

The Clerk having called over the roll, one hundred and sixty-five members answered to their names; which being a quorum, a message was ordered to be sent to the Senate announcing that the House of Representatives was organized, and ready to proceed to business.

DEATH OF MR. DODDRIDGE.

Mr. MERCER rose and observed, that it was his melancholy duty to announce to the House the decease of his lamented colleague, the honorable PAUL DONNARIES, and to offer a resolution, assuring the friends of the deceased, and the country at large, of the sense entertained by this House of the loss it had sustained. In performing this duty, Mr. M. said, that were he to indulge the feeling he possessed of the merits of his departed friend, he should find himself speedily arrested. In intellectual power, that friend had been surpassed by few in this or any other country; in integrity of motive, he was excelled by none; and in simplicity of heart, by no man he had ever known. Mr. M. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the House of Representatives, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of PHILIP DONNELSON, late a member thereof from the State of Virginia, will go in mourning by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm for one month.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, a resolution was adopted fixing the time of meeting of the House at 12 o'clock, M., until otherwise ordered.

After the usual orders for a joint committee to wait on the President, and to furnish the members with newspapers,

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, it was ordered that two chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed for the session; one by each House.

On motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, it was ordered that the House proceed on Thursday next to the election of a Sergeant-at-arms, in the place of John O. Dunn, resigned.

A message was then announced from the President of the United States; and Mr. Donelson, his private secretary, delivered to the Chair the message of the President to the two Houses of Congress at the opening of their session. [See Appendix.]

The message was read, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and 10,000 copies ordered to be printed.

Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5.

The House met, and adjourned to-day without transacting any business.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, it was Ordered, That the standing committees of the House be now appointed.

VETO OF THE HARBOR

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private secretary:

To the House of Representatives:

In addition to the general views I have heretofore expressed to Congress on the subject of internal improvement, it is my duty to advert to it again in stating my objections to the bill entitled "An act for the improvement of certain harbors, and the navigation of certain rivers," which was not received a sufficient time before the close of the last session to enable me to examine it before the adjournment.

Having maturely considered that bill within the time allowed me by the constitution, and being convinced that some of its provisions conflict with the rule adopted for my guide on this subject of legislation, I have been compelled to withhold from it my signature; and it has, therefore, failed to become a law.

To facilitate as far as I can the intelligent action of Congress upon the subjects embraced in this bill, I transmit, herewith, a report from the Engineer Department, distinguishing, as far as the information in its possession would enable it, between those appropriations which do, and those which do not, conflict with the rules by which my conduct in this respect has hitherto been governed. By that report it will be seen that there is a class of appropriations in the bill for the improvement of streams, that are not navigable, that are not channels of commerce, and that do not pertain to the harbors or ports of entry designated by any law, or have any ascertained connexion with the usual establishments for the security of commerce, external or internal.

It is obvious that such appropriations involve the sanction of a principle that concedes to the General Government an unlimited power over the subject of internal improvements; and that I could not, therefore, approve a bill containing them, without receding from the positions taken in my veto of the Maysville road bill, and, afterwards, in my annual message of December 7, 1830.

It is to be regretted that the rules by which this classification of the improvements in this bill has been made by the Engineer Department are not more definite and certain, and that embarrassment may not always be avoided by the observance of them; but, as neither my own reflection, nor the lights derived from other sources, have furnished me with a better guide, I shall continue to apply my best exertions to their application and enforcement. In thus employing my best faculties to exercise the powers with which I am invested, to avoid evils, and to effect the greatest attainable good for our common country, I feel that I may trust to your cordial co-operation; and the experience of the past leaves me no room to doubt the liberal indulgence and favorable consideration of those for whom we act.

The grounds upon which I have given my assent to appropriations for the construction of light-houses, beacons, buoys, public piers, and the removal of sand-bars, sawyers, and other temporary or partial impediments in our navigable rivers and harbors, and with which many of the provisions of this bill correspond, have been so fully stated, that I trust a repetition of them is unnecessary. Had there been incorporated in the bill no provisions for works of a different description, depending on principles which extend the power of making appropriations to every object which the discretion of the Government may select, and losing sight of the distinctions between national and local character, which I had stated would be my future guide on the subject, I should have cheerfully signed the bill.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Mr. TAYLOR moved that the communication be laid on the table, and printed; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. WICKLIFFE, who moved its reference to the Committee on Internal Improvement; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, subsequently moved to reconsider the above vote, on the ground that the question had not been understood by all the House.

After some conversation between him and Mr. WICKLIFFE, he agreed to postpone the consideration of his motion for re-consideration until to-morrow.

The annual report from the Treasury Department on the finances of the Government was received, and, on motion of Mr. POLK, 10,000 additional copies of it were ordered to be printed.

Reports were also received from the Treasury and Navy Departments, and from the Treasurer of the United States; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DEC. 10, 1832.]

Standing Committees.—Election of Sergeant-at-arms.—President's Message.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. EVERETT offered the following resolution, which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as far as the public service will permit, such portions as have not heretofore been communicated, of the instructions given to our ministers in France on the subject of claims for spoliation, and of the correspondence of said ministers with the French Government, and with the Secretary of State of the United States on the same subject.

The hour appointed for proceeding to the election of a Sergeant-at-arms, having arrived, the House proceeded to the ballot: when, no fewer than twenty-six candidates were nominated for the office. After three unsuccessful ballotings, the result on the fourth ballot stood as follows:

For William J. McCormick	-	-	35
William B. Robinson	-	-	29
William A. Gordon	-	-	25
Jonathan Nye	-	-	25
Thomas B. Randolph	-	-	25

And many scattering votes.

The House then adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10.

The following committees were announced to have been appointed by the Speaker in pursuance of the order of the House of Thursday last:

On Elections.—Messrs. Claiborne, Randolph, Holland, Griffin, Bethune, Collier, and Arnold.

On Revision and Unfinished Business.—Messrs. Reed, of Massachusetts, Bouck, and Silas Condit.

On Accounts.—Messrs. Bergen, Burd, and Hodges.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved the following resolution, which, under the rule, lies on the table one day, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to this House the report of the person or agent employed by him to make an inquiry into the solvency of the Bank of the United States, with a view of enabling the department to determine whether the Bank of the United States be a safe depository for the public revenue.

ELECTION OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The House then again proceeded to ballot for a Sergeant-at-arms, to supply the vacancy in that office occasioned by the resignation of John Oswald Dunn; and, on the ninth ballot, (four were taken on Thursday last,) Thomas B. Randolph, of Virginia, was elected.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SPEIGHT, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. J. W. TAYLOR in the chair, and proceeded to consider the message of the President of the United States; the reading of the message having been dispensed with.

Mr. SPEIGHT submitted a number of resolutions for distributing the message to various committees.

The resolutions were generally agreed to mem. con. But, when

The third resolution, proposing a reference of that part of the message which recommends a sale of the stocks belonging to Government in incorporated companies had been passed by,

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, said he rose to take the sense of the committee in reference to the last subject which had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, viz: the relation sustained by the Government towards those canal companies whose stock it held. It would be remembered by the House, that all the bills providing for a subscription of stock in such companies, had originated in the Committee on Internal Improvements more familiarly known as the Committee on Roads and Canals. In furtherance of his object in rising, he should now move to strike out the whole of the resolution; and should that motion fail, he would then move to amend the resolution by substituting the Committee on Internal Improvement for the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPEIGHT hoped that the amendment would not be agreed to. It must be obvious, from the reading of the message, that the President was of opinion that, on this subject, a new policy ought to be adopted. It was, indeed, true, that all the bills for a subscription of stock in companies of the kind indicated, had originally been proposed by the Committee on Roads and Canals. It was known to be the favorite scheme of the gentleman's ingenuity, and for that very reason there would be a manifest impropriety in referring this part of the message to that committee. They had prejudged the subject. Besides, the subject itself was appropriate to the Committee of Ways and Means, which had charge of the revenue, and who would, of course, recommend in what way this part of the revenue should be transferred. Believing that it was time that the policy of the country was changed, Mr. S. has been induced to draw up the resolution. If the object of the gentleman from Virginia was to smother it, and to prevent its being fairly treated, and if the House agreed with him in sentiment, they would vote for the gentleman's amendment. For himself, it was his desire to meet the gentleman openly upon that floor. He should fight him fairly. And if the gentleman could convince him that the policy at present pursued ought to remain as the policy of this country, he should then submit, but not otherwise.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Connecticut, said he would agree in part with the gentleman from Virginia, but could not go to the extent of the amendment. It was very true that, so far as stock in canal companies was concerned, the bills had originated in the gentleman's committee, but a majority of the stock held by the United States was not of that description, it was stock in the Bank of the United States. Of this kind of stock the Government held to the amount of 7,000,000, but of canal stock only about 2,000,000. There was, therefore, a manifest impropriety in sending the whole subject to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and he hoped, therefore, that the gentleman would modify his amendment so as to send the subject of canal stock to the Canal Committee, and leave the rest to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MERCER replied, that, if the amendment he had offered erred in point of analysis, it was owing to the fact that the President, in his message, had not intimated any impropriety in the subscription of stock in the Bank of the United States. If stock of that description was indeed included, it had not only escaped Mr. M.'s notice, but that of the more powerful and sagacious mind of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT.] However, to avoid all confusion or mistake, he would amend his amendment as suggested. The gentleman from North Carolina had spoken of the proposed measure as simply a financial arrangement, and had argued that, on that account, it ought to go to the Financial Committee. If it was a mere question as to the supply of funds, such a reference would no doubt be proper; but it was a question as to the policy or impolicy of promoting works of internal improvement by a subscription of stock. This certainly was a question which belonged to the Committee on Internal Improvement. The present committee could not be considered as having prejudged the question of such a policy, because the policy had existed antecedent to the appointment of the committee, and even before the existence of the present Congress. The gentleman seemed apprehensive that, if the subject were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, it would be suppressed and smothered. He could assure the gentleman that it was very far from his intention to suppress the subject; on the contrary, the gentleman might rely upon his meeting him in the most ample discussion he could desire.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he had not intended to convey any such idea; but he considered the gentleman from Virginia as committed on this subject, and it was reasonable to suppose that a majority of that committee agreed with him in sentiment. The policy which the President proposed to change was itself the work of that gentleman. It was he who had brought the project into the House; and was it to him or his committee that the question should be proposed, whether that policy ought to be changed. It was a policy which threatened to disturb the peace and harmony of the country. Would the gentleman still insist upon pushing it on?

The question being put on Mr. MERCER's amendment as modified, it was carried—ayes 83, noes 78. So it was agreed that so much of the message as related to the sale of canal stock should be referred to the Committee on Internal Improvement, and that in reference to the other stock should go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The fourth resolution being read, proposing to refer to a select committee so much of the President's message as relates to the Bank of the United States,

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he did not know exactly how to arrive at the object he had in view with regard to this resolution. His object was to postpone the reference in this resolution until an answer should be obtained to a resolution which he this day had the honor to submit to the House, and which now lay on the table. He was at a loss whether to move to strike out the whole resolution, or to ask the mover to withhold his proposition for the present, until such answer could be obtained.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he should have no objection to comply with such a request, except that it would be a departure from the ordinary course of legislation. He had proposed to refer this subject to a select committee, because he believed that the Committee of Ways and Means would not be able to give the subject a proper investigation. Should the resolution pass, the House might restrain its action upon it until the answer desired by the gentleman should be received. He was sorry he could not accommodate the gentleman from Kentucky, but he did not see how he could do it. He had no object to carry in proposing this measure; he expected no action on the subject of the bank during the present Congress.

Mr. WAYNE said it was probable he might be able to meet the wishes of the gentleman from Kentucky. He saw plainly that that gentleman did expect some action of the House upon the bank subject during this session, and it was Mr. W.'s own belief that some action in reference to it would be necessary. Mr. W. then offered an amendment, that the committee should have power to send for persons, and to call upon the bank and its branches for papers, and to examine witnesses generally in relation to the operations of the bank.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia would not answer the object he had in view. Mr. W. had every confidence, both from his own judgment and from information in his possession, that when the resolution he had offered should receive its answer, and the House should have the report of the agent sent by the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire into the affairs of the bank, with a view to ascertain whether it was a safe depository for the public funds, the answer would be favorable to the bank and to the entire security of the revenue. Mr. W. said he had hoped that the resolution he had offered would have superseded the necessity of another bank discussion in that House, and of the consequences upon the financial and commercial operations of the country, and upon the credit of our currency. He had not understood, from a hasty reading of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that that officer had expressed any desire for the appointment of any committee on the subject. The Secretary said that he had taken steps to obtain such information as was within his control, but that it was possible he might need further powers hereafter. What had already been the effect throughout the country of the broadside discharged by the message at the bank? Its stock had, on the reception of that message, instantly fallen down to 104 per cent. Connected with this proposition to sell the stock, a loss had already been incurred by the Government of half a million of dollars. What further investigations did gentlemen require? What new bill of indictment was to be presented? There was one in the Secretary's report, which was also alluded to in the message: it was, that the bank had, by its unwarranted action, prevented the Government from redeeming the three per cent. stock at the time it desired. But what was the actual state of the fact? What had the bank done to prevent such redemption? It had done nothing more nor less than what it had been required by the Government to do. The Secretary of the Treasury, on the 17th of July, (he could not be absolutely certain as to the day, but it was on the 17th or 18th,) had advertised the intended payment of the three per cent. stock, two-thirds in October, and the remaining third in January. The bank was written to, appraising it of this intention, and the suggestion was made to it, as a previous understanding between the Government and the bank, that, as the Government might not have enough disposable revenue to meet the whole sum of fifteen millions, being the amount of the three per cents., the bank should withhold the certificates of so much of the three per cent. stock as the bank might have the control of.

The President's Message.

This Mr. W. understood to be the new sin charged upon the institution. Of what amount the bank obtained the control he had not been certainly informed, for the 1st of January had not arrived; but if gentlemen would look at the report they would find that, on the 1st of January next, the treasury would be minus, provided the whole amount of three per cent. stock should be paid off. There would, therefore, be a necessity that the bank should obtain control of a part of the certificates. On the 1st of January there would be (including the money to be paid on account of Danish claims) a little over two millions of dollars in the treasury, deducting the Danish funds, (which were not revenue) the balance would not be equal to the unavailable funds of the Government. By unavailable funds is meant one million and a half of dollars not worth one cent, which the Treasury lost by attempting to make State banks places of deposit for the public moneys, and by attempting to rely upon State bank paper as a medium in which to collect the revenues of the Government. Does the administration now desire or hope to find in these State institutions, about which they know nothing officially, and have a right to know nothing, greater safety for the public funds? Or is it the wish of the administration, and the desire of gentlemen in this House, to appoint another investigating committee? For what? To raise the hue and cry against the solvency of that institution, which the honorable Secretary told us last session had been well managed, and which had rendered such important services to the Government and country that he felt it to be a part of his official duty to urge Congress to recharter it.

Mr. W. said he had hoped that the bank would have been permitted to wind up its concerns, if the public judgment had been irrevocably pronounced upon the question in the recent election, with as little injury to public and private interest as possible for so delicate an operation to be performed.

In the time yet allowed the institution, with its present ample means, if let alone, if left in the enjoyment of that credit to which I believe its means and funds entitled, it is in the power of the bank, and I would hope in the disposition of the directors, to mitigate the blow which the downfall of a sound currency must ever inflict upon an honest community. Already, Mr. Chairman, has that part of the country whence I come, said Mr. W., felt, and heavily felt, the effects of the necessary curtailment of the business of this bank since our last session. What we are destined to suffer, time alone can develop.

I entreat gentlemen to stay their efforts, at least for a time, that we may see what evidence the Secretary of the Treasury has collected upon this subject, and then it will be time enough to ask this investigation. Do not, by the sanction of a vote of this House, strike a panic in the commercial community, and beget distrust with all classes, when in truth and in fact there may not exist any well founded grounds for it.

If it is the purpose of the administration to withdraw the public deposits from this institution, and place them in State banks, let them do it upon their own responsibility, as they have a right to do it; but do not, by the hasty and inconsiderate action of this House, furnish them with an apology for so ruinous a measure. I invoke gentlemen to be patient; the time will soon come, if the people do not see abundant cause to reverse what is claimed as their judgment upon this subject, when we shall have State banks and their notes in abundance with which to inflict and oppress the labor of the country, and which will soon increase to the amount of your "unavailable funds" in the public treasury.

Mr. WAYNE said, that though he desired not to enter at large into the debate at this time, and would not do so, yet gentlemen had compelled him, by the course of their remarks, to make some reply. It has been said that nothing was now before the House to make an inquiry into the condition of the bank desirable or necessary. He would refer to the President's message, and to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, both suggesting an examination, to ascertain if the bank was, or would be in future, a safe depository for the public funds. Mr. W. did not say it was not, but an inquiry into the fact might be very proper notwithstanding; and the President and Secretary, in suggesting it, had imputed no suspicion of the insolvency of the bank. Eventual ability to discharge all of its obligations is not of itself enough to entitle the bank to the confidence of the Government. Its management, and the spirit in which it is managed, in direct reference to the Government, or to those administering it, may make investigation proper. What was the Executive's complaint against the bank? That it had interfered with the payment of the public debt, and would postpone the payment of five millions of it for a year after the time fixed upon for its redemption, by becoming actually or nominally the possessors of that amount of the three per centum stock, though the charter prohibited it from holding such stock, and from all advantages which might accrue from the purchase of it. True, the bank had disavowed the ownership. But of that sum which had been bought by Baring, Brothers, & Co., under the agreement with the agent of the bank, at 91½, and the cost of which had been charged to the bank, who would derive the benefit of the difference between the cost of it and the par value, which the Government will pay? Mr. W. knew this gain would be affected by what may be the rate of exchange between the United States and England, but still there would be gain, and who was to receive it? Baring, Brothers, & Co.? No. The bank was, by agreement, charged with the cost of it, in a separate account, on the books of Baring, Brothers, & Co., and it had agreed to pay interest upon the amount, until the stock was redeemed. The bank being prohibited to deal in such stock, it would be well to inquire, even under the present arrangement with Baring, Brothers, & Co., whether the charter, in this respect, was substantially complied with. Mr. W. would not now go into the question of the policy of the arrangement by the bank concerning the three per cents. It may eventuate in great public benefit, as regards the commerce of the country; but if it does, it will be no apology for the temerity of an interference with the fixed policy of the Government, in regard to the payment of the national debt; a policy, which those who administer the bank knew had been fixed by all who, by law, can have any agency in its payment. Nor can any apology be found for it in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 19th of July last to Mr. Biddle; for, at Philadelphia, the day before, on the 18th, he employed an agent to go to England, and had given instructions to make an arrangement, by which the payment of the public debt was to be postponed until October, 1833.

Whatever solicitude there may have been to lessen the commercial distress which it was feared would be caused by pestilence, the plan which the bank had in view should have been communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury, as it could not be accomplished without the protracted use of the Government funds, and by delaying the payment of the public debt. The bank should not have coveted the exclusive merit of such an arrangement for the relief of commerce. It would have had the praise of originating it, and it might well have acknowledged its situation would have prevented it from being completed without the aid of the treasury deposits. But it is said that the report of Mr. Toland makes all inquiry unnecessary, and shows that the condition of the bank is better than it has been at any time before. Mr. W. said he would controvert both declarations; but he disclaimed saying that the bank was not a safe depository of the public funds. The bank might be a safe, and yet an improper depository for them. But he would now examine the report of the agent, to show that it did not prove the bank to be a safe depository, and he insisted that the instructions given to the agent had not been complied with. The agent was not in a situation to act them out to the complete intention of the Secretary. Mr. W. did not mean that there had been any dereliction of duty on the part of the agent. His character forbade such an insinuation. But the agent's conclusion is, that the bank has seventy-nine millions to meet thirty-seven millions of debt. It consists of gold and silver, funds in Europe, real estate, amounts due by State banks, and debts due by individuals. The excess of means over debt is represented at forty-two millions. Now, let us see if a single item of suspended debt, amounting to $7,851,281 82, as disclosed in the triennial report of September, 1831, (if the contingent fund to meet this loss, stated in that report, is included in the seventy-nine millions of available means, or has not been actually applied to the extinguishment of the suspended debt,) will not reduce the excess of forty-two millions below the capital of the bank, which is thirty-five millions.

Is any information before us to show that the contingent fund is not included by the agent in his report of available means? Gentlemen are called upon to deny and to prove that it is not. May not also the amount of suspended debt have been increased since 1831, without any increase of the contingent fund? Or, what proof have we that the whole sum of sixty-two millions due by individuals is good, and will be ultimately collected? or, that no per centage of loss upon it should be allowed? If the bank was called upon to say if the whole sum was due by solvent persons, could it say so? And if none of them are known to be insolvent, does not prudence require that some discount should be allowed from the amount, for the vicissitudes of trade and the casualties of fortune, to those who are not in trade? In this instance, it may be said, the report shows the bank's entire indebtedness and the extent of its means for payment. It ought to be remembered, that the first can only be lessened by payment, and that the second may be diminished by losses. Though we have no data from which an amount of loss can be correctly conjectured, we all know some will occur. But, further: the report rates the real estate of all kinds owned by the bank at three millions, or within two or three thousand dollars of it, as available means; the real estate consists of banking houses and lands acquired in payment of debts; the first was stated in May last, at their cost, to be one million one hundred and sixty-nine thousand dollars. Now, no one supposes that sum could be got for them. They are buildings for an exclusive purpose, inconvertible to other uses, but by alterations requiring heavy expenditures; and they were built at times when labor and materials were dear, and when the bank gave more for real estate than it will now bring. From this item of available means the bank will be satisfied if it does not finally lose some three or four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. W. knew that there had been a reserved fund of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars per annum to meet the cost of the banking houses; but does it appear from the report of the agent, that all that accumulation, and such as may have been added since 1831, is not included in the statement of available means? This item, too, of real estate, may be subject to another discount. We now have it stated at its full value; but accruing taxes, expenses of sale, and the time it will take to dispose of it, will reduce the sum which it will bring, unless the rise of property where it is situated has been progressive, or should suddenly occur. That such is not the fact, however, may be inferred from the bank having continued to hold, for more than eleven years, its real estate in Cincinnati, or Ohio, and which, at cost, was, in a previous statement of the bank, put down at one million two hundred and thirteen thousand dollars; and this in the most flourishing town and the most prosperous State in the Union. Will any gentleman here, and particularly some one of them from Ohio, tell us if the landed estate of the bank in Ohio is worth more now than it was in 1820, when the bank became owner of it? Now, sir, though the argument just used may not show that the bank has less available means than is stated by Mr. Toland, it is strong enough to prevent his report from being conclusive against inquiry; and this is the point, Mr. W. said, between himself and gentlemen who were against inquiry. Nor will it or can it be denied, that the approximation of indebtedness to means is not so close, that it would be well to have an examination, to remove all doubt. It matters not how the doubt has been raised, it exists in the public mind; and as the bank is to be the depository of millions of accruing revenue, it should be dispelled, if it can be done by further inquiry. It must not only be safe, but it must be thought safe, by a full development of its management. Of this we have nothing in detail, as relates to the great national interests which the bank was intended to aid and to advance. The President, therefore, and the Secretary, did well in suggesting an inquiry; and they are not answerable for the follies of those who, from the fears of loss, or from party resentments, have converted their suggestions into declarations by both of the bank's insolvency. Neither has said so.

Mr. W. said, his object had been so far to make out a case fit for inquiry, not in any way to give it as his opinion that the bank was insolvent. Mr. W. made no accusation of any kind against the bank, nor would he express any opinion of the ultimate soundness of it on account of its thirty millions of discounts, in the West and Southwest. Its debtors there might be perfectly good or responsible, without constituting any present ability in the bank to pay what it owed. Such large discounts in one quarter of the Union might turn out to be advantageous to the stockholders and to the Government, so far as a dividend was concerned. But such anticipations, however well founded, did not gainsay inquiry; for, it might interfere with other and more important interests which the bank has undertaken to sustain and to discharge for the Government and the country; as, for instance, whether those discounts had not disabled the bank from being in a condition to carry on its ordinary operations on the first of July last without the Government deposits. What was its ability to do so on the first of October? and what will be its condition on the first of January, if Congress should insist upon the application of the Government deposits to the payment of the three per cents, of which the bank has the control; or upon withdrawing the deposits, if the bank shall not allow them to be redeemed?

As to the bank being in a better condition now than it ever had been, as Mr. W. understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DEARBOURN] and others to say, he must differ with them. This Mr. W. knew, that it had in effect to borrow five millions since July last; and this it would have been obliged to do without the apprehensions caused by the cholera. When all fears of pestilence had passed, the bank continued to owe the loan. Mr. W. supposed it would do so as long as it could derive a better interest from its customers upon the use of the deposits which were intended to pay the national debt than it paid upon the loan. This is the secret of the whole arrangement in regard to the three per cents. Because the bank had now eight millions of discounts less than it had six months since, gentlemen said it was in a better condition; and a parade of this was to be made for present effect. Mr. W. would not say it was in a worse condition, or that it was bad: but he would prove that there had been no change in that time which made its condition now a subject of boasting. In May last, the total amount of discounts was seventy millions. The circulation of the bank, at the same time, was twenty-two millions. It owed a debt then of two millions in Europe. Its circulation now is eighteen millions; its discounts sixty-two millions. Four millions of its reduced discounts have been applied to meet the return of so much of its circulation: two millions to its debts in Europe; one million to pay deposits, which were then twenty millions, and are now nineteen. Thus, seven of the eight millions of reduced discounts are accounted for, and a million only is left to sustain the remark of the bank being in a much better condition now than it had ever been. The truth is, the bank stands now as it did then, with this addition to its obligations: that it is paying to Baring, Brothers, & Co. an interest upon five millions, instead of upon a debt of two, which Mr. W. presumed it had to pay before it could negotiate the loan of five, or make the arrangements for withholding so much of the three per cents.

The President's Message.

Gentlemen remonstrated against inquiry, and said it would agitate the public mind, and spread suspicions injurious to the bank, and to the commerce of the country; that the public mind had already been agitated by intimations from the highest source, which had been productive of loss to the stockholders. It is true, Mr. W. said, that suggestions had been made by persons from whom the public would believe they never would have come, unless they could be sustained by facts. To stop inquiry would not remove the impression.

As to loss to the stockholders, Mr. W. remarked, those only could have been losers who were speculators in stocks; though they had rights which were not to be harmed by undue means, they had none such at this time to complain of; and their gains or losses were never a subject of sympathy, as they were made by a never-ceasing rivalry of human sagacity carried to the utmost verge of the boundaries of moral propriety. The aged, the widow, and the orphan, and the man of moderate desires, still continue to hold their stock. It was worth intrinsically what it was before any suggestion of inquiry had been made; and if the bank shall be well administered, it will regain all between its present market price and what it has been, except so much of artificial value as it may have acquired from the hopes of the holders of it that it would be a permanent stock. To make it so, the Government was never committed. As to the committee to which this inquiry was to be referred, Mr. W. felt no solicitude. He should have confidence in any committee the House should appoint. He was very willing the investigation should be confided to the Committee of Ways and Means. He was confident it would be fairly and honorably conducted. Besides, there was no committee of that House which would dare to postpone action on the subject without the very best reasons. It was objected that there was not time, during the residue of this session, to complete such an investigation. Admitting the fact to be so, it furnished no argument against the appointment of a committee, because such committee might put matters in train, by appointing agents who should examine into the affairs of the several branches of the bank, and whose reports would present to the next Congress one general, unbroken view of the whole condition of the institution throughout the country. If Mr. W. had any agency in the affair, he should be in favor of commissioning a number of agents, who would examine on the same day, and report simultaneously.

Mr. W. observed, in conclusion, that he felt he had been forced to do, although not more than he ought, under the circumstances, yet much more than he had wished to do. He had touched only the prominent points; the exposition might be much further extended, but he trusted that he had done enough to show that he had not brought forward the measure he proposed without due consideration.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, observed, that he should not engage at present in a debate on this subject, though he did anticipate that there would be, at some time, a committee raised who would thoroughly investigate the affairs of the bank; but he thought that as much as could be expected to be effected, especially in a short session, would probably be accomplished by the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia. He wished, now, to put a question to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] who seemed to be as well, and a little better, informed as to the affairs of the bank, than any other gentleman present. He wished to know whether that gentleman meant to say that the Government had sanctioned, in any manner, or in any form, the purchase by the bank of stock abroad, and the postponement of the payment of the public debt until October, 1833?

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, that before he replied to this question, he wished to notice what had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE.] That gentleman seemed to consider him the advocate of the bank, as a corporate being, or perhaps as the advocate of the stockholders. He disclaimed such an attitude, in and out of this House.

All Mr. W.'s acts, in relation to it, had arisen from a desire for the preservation of a sound circulating medium, for the benefit of the agricultural and commercial interests of the country. Mr. W. said he was not acquainted with any of those who held stock in the bank; and it was not on account of the loss sustained by the stockholders that he was most concerned. Though that loss was great, he did not feel particularly concerned about it, more than he should feel for the losses of other citizens, in the diminution of the value of their estates; but what occasioned his anxiety was, an apprehension of what was to follow.

It was the state of universal distrust that would speedily pervade the community, and which could not but be followed by the most ruinous consequences. This was what alarmed him; and this must be the inevitable consequence of suddenly calling in the immense debt that was due to the bank in the Western States particularly. Now for the answer to the question of the gentleman from New York. Of any sanction given by the Government to the postponement of the payment of the public debt until October next, or whether such an arrangement in fact was made, he had not spoken. What arrangement, if any, had been made on that subject, he did not know, or how far it met the wishes of the Government. What he had said was this: that the conduct of the bank, in obtaining the control of any part of the three per cent. stock, was done at the instance of the Government itself.

Mr. W. said he understood the state of fact in reference to this question to be this: He wished it understood he did not read from an official document; but the language would be comprehended, and its correctness not disputed here or elsewhere. Previous to the publication of the notice by the Secretary of the Treasury, viz: on the 19th July last, he informed the bank of his intention to pay off two-thirds of the three per cents on the 1st of October, and the remaining third on the 1st of January, 1833. To this information was added the following declaration: "This has been adopted with the understanding had between us, that, if it should happen that the public moneys are insufficient to complete these payments, the bank will delay the presentation of any certificates, of which it may have the control, until the funds are sufficient to meet them; the interest to be paid by the United States during the interval." On the 26th of July the bank replied to this request as follows: "The bank has taken the necessary steps to obtain the control of a considerable portion of those certificates, and will, very cheerfully, employ it in such manner as may best suit the convenience of the Government."

H. or R.]

The President's Message.

I trust I am now understood by the gentleman from New York; and if his question be not answered, he must seek for a solution of it elsewhere.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that he agreed with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] that the public judgment seemed to have decided that the term of the existence of the United States Bank should come to a close. But, so long as it continued in operation, it was important that its credit should be sound, and that it should be rightly judged of by the country. On this subject it was unnecessary and injurious to be too sensitive. The Executive had suggested to Congress the propriety of an inquiry into the condition of the institution; and it was supposed by the gentleman from Kentucky that this suggestion had injuriously affected the credit of the bank; but he believed that an accurate comparison of dates would show that the decline in the stock had been antecedent to the publication of the President's message. The decline had gone to a considerable, if not to the whole extent, before the message was received. But though such was the fact, could any one deny--would the gentleman from Kentucky deny--that the Presidential communication might affect the credit of the bank? and should the House, after such a suggestion, refuse all inquiry into the state of its affairs, would the public mind be satisfied? If the bank was indeed sound, if the vast amount of discount which it had lately granted had not involved its concerns, and the debts due to it were all good, why, then, the sooner this was known the better. Let the public have the facts, that the credit of the bank might be indisputable, and that the holders both of its stock and its bills might rest satisfied in the assurance that it was sound and solvent. But if the fact were otherwise, if there were any thing rotten in the state of its affairs, if it had been extensively engaged in improper transactions, would any gentleman desire that such a state of things should be concealed? After the suggestion had been made, there remained to the House but one course, which was, to enter upon a thorough investigation, and bring the result before the country. If the bank should prove sound, then no injury would result to the interests of commerce; but should the House stifle inquiry, and refuse to take the steps necessary to get at the truth, distrust and jealousy must inevitably ensue; and the House would inflict extensive injury on all the various interests connected with the credit of the bank. Mr. H. did not intend to hazard any opinion as to the soundness of the institution; or whether it was or was not a safe depository for the public funds. It was enough that that question had been made. The exposure of the bank's concerns would not make them bad if they were indeed good. The House was informed that doubts existed, and it was only by evidence that their truth or error could be tested.

Mr. H. said that when he reflected on the vast amount of discounts which the bank had granted within a very short period on the decline of its stock, and the agitation of the public mind connected with the institution, he was not without apprehension that its affairs might be in an unsound state, and, if so, he wished to know it, and he wished to let the public know it. If the bank was to be wound up, as he believed the people had decided; or if it was to be continued in any form, which he hoped it would not; he desired in every case that the truth might be made known. It must be the wish of all that the bank should enjoy as good a repute as it deserved. Let it be proved that public opinion with respect to it may rest on a firm foundation. But should the House shut the door on all inquiry; should they satisfy themselves with such a report as the agent of the Treasury might choose to make, and the ruinous insolvency of the institution should afterwards stare them in the face, must they not stand convicted before the American people? Why incur such a hazard, when the plain, obvious, direct, straight-ahead course lay before them, which could do no harm, and might effect much good?

Mr. WAYNE said he wished to offer a single suggestion which seemed to be called for by the answer of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] to the inquiry proposed to him by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELING.] The gentleman accused the Government of having instructed the bank to do the very act of which it now complained; and he rested this accusation on information derived from a letter, an extract of which he had read to the House, (and which, by the by, was itself a strong presumptive proof that the gentleman was not only very intimate with the affairs of the bank, but was the confidant of the institution.) Now Mr. W. would venture to affirm that when facts came to be investigated, it would be found that the terms employed by the writer of that letter had been much too strong. He meant to convey no imputation against the veracity of the writer, but it would be found that he had gone farther than facts would warrant; but the House would observe that the complaint adduced by the Executive against the bank was not that the bank had obtained control of a part of the three per cent. stock, but that it had violated the tacit arrangement between the bank and the Government, by holding that stock beyond the point of time at which the Government would be able to redeem it. The complaint was, that although the bank was fully apprized both of the wish and of the ability of the Government to redeem the stock within a certain limited time, the bank had, without authority, made an arrangement which transcended that limit, and thus postponed the payment of the public debt for one year.

Mr. BURGESS said that he had hoped this bank question was settled, and that the corporation might have been suffered to pass into its obituary condition, without being farther baited and hunted by its enemies. The House had last year been deeply and anxiously engaged in the investigation of its concerns, and yet, when the result was known, the House had ordered no inquiry before a jury, though that was what it would have done, and ought to have done, had the bank been guilty of a violation of its charter. Did the Secretary of the Treasury now believe that the bank had violated its charter? If he did, then it was the duty of the President to send the inquiry to a jury. Was the House about to take that question from a jury to themselves? If the President had suspicions, why did he not send the bank to a jury? What benefit could result to the House, or to the nation, from this inquiry? It was said that the bank might possibly be in doubtful circumstances; and, if its circumstances were doubtful, would the House, by exciting a panic, and calling all the gold and silver out of its vaults, enable it to pay its debts? What did the House do last session? It examined the bank, and then voted to renew its charter; and would they, the same men, who had voted to renew the charter of the bank, forthwith act on the supposition that the bank was not sound? Was it not most extraordinary that the very Congress which had passed such an act, were now asked to raise a committee for the express and sole purpose of sanctioning the Presidential suggestion, that the bank was not trustworthy.

The gentleman from the interior of New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] had told the House that he was not without his doubts; the bank had discounted, and its stock had fallen. True; and what had reduced the stock? Not the suspicion that the bank was not solvent, but the settled belief that the bank would not be rechartered. Not a doubt existed through the whole commercial community as to the solvency of the bank; and, surely, commercial men ought to be the best judges of such a question; better judges, certainly, than gentlemen from the interior of the country, who had no personal connexion with the bank or its transactions. Was this investigation designed to make men cautious, and to enable the bank to pay its bills? He could believe no such thing. No man could be ignorant that every inquiry into a moneyed institution tended to lower its credit, and unless the people scouted the inquiry, conceiving it to be a mere political scheme, the effect of the measure must, and would be, to produce a run on the bank, to destroy its means, to drain all the specie from its vaults, and thereby occasion the utter and inevitable ruin of millions of people in the course of a few months. No, cried Mr. B., give to the bank what you would give to a common highwayman and robber—a trial by jury. Put it upon the country, and let that country say whether it has, or has not, forfeited its charter.

Mr. POLK said, that the proposition of this inquiry did not involve the question as to the necessity of the present, or of any other national bank. That was not the question before the House; and it was mainly to recal the House to the real question before it, that he had risen. They had been informed by the President in his message, that serious doubt existed whether the public deposits in the Bank of the United States were safe in that institution, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had taken steps to ascertain whether such were the fact; but that the powers of that office might prove incompetent to the task, and the question before the House was, whether such an inquiry should be prosecuted or no? And if it should, then whether it should be conducted by a select, or by a standing committee? This was the question, and the whole question. The gentleman from Rhode Island had informed the House that he had hoped the bank question was settled now, without raising the question whether Congress should recharter the present bank, or should charter a new bank; if the House was informed that doubts existed as to the safety of the public funds, it was beyond question their duty to ascertain whether such doubts were well founded. The reasons offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, in opposition to the inquiry, did not appear to him satisfactory. What are they? Why, that he had offered a resolution with a view to getting the report of the agent of the Treasury as to the bank affairs. Now, it did not occur to Mr. P. that such a report could greatly enlighten the House. At all events, the action of the House need not be suspended to wait for it. The gentleman's second reason was, the delicacy of public credit, and the effect such an inquiry might have upon the stock of the bank in market. But did the gentleman forget that, by the charter, Congress had expressly reserved to itself this power of examination? and the delicacy of public credit was no argument against its exercise; and he fully concurred with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SEXTON,] that if there was to be any inquiry, it ought to be conducted by a select committee.

Mr. WATMOUGH said, that he rose, not for the purpose of entering into the debate, but to move that the committee now rise. He made the motion accordingly, which was carried, ayes 101; whereupon the committee rose, and,

On motion of Mr. WATMOUGH, the resolutions and amendments were ordered to be printed. Whereupon, The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

A petition was presented by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the merchants of Boston, praying for the interposition of Congress to relieve them from the embarrassments occasioned by the construction put upon the late amendment of the revenue laws, by the Secretary of the Treasury. In presenting this memorial, Mr. D. observed that the law provided that goods imported before, as well as after the passage of that act, if, in the original packages, and placed in the custom-house stores, under the care of the officers of the customs, at any time before the 3d of March next, should then be subject to no higher duties than if imported after the 3d of March. The design of Congress unquestionably was, said Mr. D., to extend relief to all persons who owned goods in the original packages, by refunding, or relinquishing the difference between the duties under the old and the new law; but it so happens that the late law is not very clear in its terms, and the Secretary of the Treasury has put a construction upon it which has frustrated the intention of Congress, and does great injustice to many merchants.

The memorialists represent, and in this they are confirmed by the letters of the Secretary, that no goods shall be entitled to the benefit of the act on which the duties were paid, or wholly due at the time of the passage of the act. This decision excludes from the benefit of the act all holders of goods in the original package where the duties were either actually paid, or the bonds had become due, and were unpaid, although the law seems to provide expressly that all goods imported before the passage of the law shall stand on the same footing as those imported after. The injustice visited upon merchants will be apparent, by looking at the credits given at the custom-house by law. On all goods from south of the equator, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, the time of credit is eight, ten, and eighteen months on the custom-house bonds. On all goods from Europe, eight, ten, and twelve months. On all goods from the West Indies, six and nine months. If, therefore, a merchant had imported from Brazil a cargo of coffee within eighteen months before the passage of the act, he would be entitled to its provisions; but if he had imported a like cargo from Cuba only nine months before its passage, he would lose the benefit of it.

The Secretary has further decided that none but importers can have the benefit of the act, and, consequently, that all owners who are not importers of merchandise are excluded, though their goods are in the original package. If, therefore, one merchant imports a cargo, and, before it is landed, sells one-half, the purchaser cannot deposit his portion in the custom-house; and the consequence would be, if the goods pay no duty after the 3d of March, the importer escapes that liability, while the purchaser pays the duty assessed by the old law.

The Secretary has also decided that, in order to get the benefit of this act, the goods must be deposited in the custom-house before the first day of January next, though the law only requires that they should be deposited before the 4th of March next.

Congress, Mr. D. said, never intended to make a law with such provisions as these. The act might be, and he thought was, rather doubtfully expressed in the 18th section, but the design was to treat all citizens alike; to extend its benefits to all holding goods in the original package, that there might be no complaints of injustice; and, as the memorialists could obtain relief in no other way, they sought the interposition of the Legislature to carry into full effect its own intentions. These decisions bore with severity upon many, and called for the speedy action of the House, as the 1st of January was near at hand. Such, he said, were the views of the memorialists, and he believed the Secretary of the Treasury had also invited attention to the subject in his annual report. With these observations, therefore, he would move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It was referred accordingly.

FALLS OF THE OHIO.

On motion of Mr. CARR, of Indiana, the petitions of the citizens of the States of Kentucky and Indiana, praying for an appropriation to be made to improve the Indian Chute, through the falls of the Ohio river, which were referred to the Committee on Internal Improvements at the last session of Congress, and not acted upon, are again referred to said committee. In making this motion,

Mr. CARR remarked, that he presumed the committee to whom this subject had heretofore been referred might have been embarrassed, in consequence of having had reference to a report made by the engineer appointed on the part of the Government some years ago, and who made a report of his examination some time since. That he believed the contemplated improvement differed from that reported by the engineer; that he had conversed with many of the petitioners, and others who felt much interest in the matter, many of whose opinions could be relied upon, who seem to think the best plan to improve the navigation of the Ohio river at the falls, would be to make an excavation at the head of the Indian Chute, about four hundred yards in length, and thirty yards in width, averaging two feet six inches in depth. The greatest depth required at the pitch of the Falls Rapid will be five feet. The surface of the water in the river will be maintained at its present level, by depositing the rock taken from the excavation on each side of the channel at its head, so as to prevent the water when at a low stage from flowing over a flat rock at the head of the falls, in a sheet of at least 600 yards in width, which is now the case. About 200 yards below these rocks there is a cluster of loose rocks directly in the present channel, which are extremely dangerous, and very difficult to pass in safety, and heavy losses have been sustained by boats striking on them. They will require to be removed.

Near a mile lower down there is a point of rock, projecting from Goose Island, about three hundred feet in length, averaging about ninety feet in breadth, and three feet in height above extreme low-water mark, forming an abrupt bend in the channel, which creates a dangerous eddy, through which it is impossible to pass at a medium stage of water; consequently, they are compelled to pass over the top of this point of rock, and through a swell created by the current rolling over it, of from five to ten feet in height. This point of rock will require to be removed at least four feet below low-water mark, by which means the channel will be made straight, and the eddy and the swell destroyed. At the distance of about a half mile below this point of rock there are a number of loose rock which it will be necessary to remove to complete the contemplated improvement. The excavation at the head of the channel will, it is supposed, amount to 10,000 cubic yards; that at the point projecting out from Goose Island, 7,500 cubic yards; amounting in all to 17,500 cubic yards of rock to be excavated, 14,500 yards of which are below low-water mark. The expense of excavation will probably be about one dollar a cubic yard. The other two ledges of rock can be removed for about $7,500, which will complete the whole improvement contemplated at an expense of twenty-five thousand dollars.

The probable benefits arising from the proposed improvement, when completed, would perhaps not fall far short of the following estimates. There are about six hundred trips made by steamboats passing down the river annually, transporting cargoes averaging 200 tons each, from above the falls of the Ohio river to the Wabash river, for the States of Indiana and Illinois; to the Green river, for Kentucky; to Cumberland, for Tennessee river; to Tennessee river, for Alabama; to the Upper Mississippi river, for Missouri; and the Illinois rivers, for the States of Missouri and Illinois; to the Arkansas river, for the Territory of Arkansas; and down the Mississippi river, for Vicksburg, Natchez, and New Orleans. Of that amount of tonnage, one half, perhaps, is drayed over land round the falls, and reshipped in other boats, at an expense of at least one dollar a ton, producing the sum of sixty thousand dollars. It is estimated that about 1,000 flat boats annually dray their cargoes over land round the falls, amounting to forty tons each, at an expense of one dollar per ton, amounting to 40,000 dollars, which sum, added to the average by steamboats, makes the sum of $100,000 for drayage, besides delays, contingent expenses, &c. Another very important advantage will be gained by the completion of the proposed improvements: when the canal is passable, and a steamboat has her cargo on board, she may get under way and pass over the falls in ten minutes, at an expense of perhaps ten dollars pilotage. If the same boat pass through the canal, she will have to pay an average toll of something like eighty dollars. This operation, at the present state of the western trade, would perhaps be brought to bear on about 150 steamboats, exclusive of those estimated at present draying their cargoes; the difference between the toll and pilot is, say seventy dollars on each boat, which amounts to 10,500 dollars. Again: the difference in time required by a boat passing over the falls, or through the canal, is estimated at about six hours; the expense of the boats for this time will average at least twenty-five dollars, amounting on 150 boats to 3,750 dollars, showing an aggregate of 114,250 dollars annually; every dollar of which will be a clear saving to the commerce of the Ohio river, by the completion of the proposed improvement. Besides, flat boats could pass over the falls without the expense of draying, or delay, and, in most cases, even without the expense of pilotage.

Suppose the canal to be complete, and capable of passing every boat that offers, the number of steamboats that would pass, when the water is too low to pass over the falls in the present condition of them, will be about 450 a year, at an average toll of say seventy dollars each, amounting to 31,500 dollars; to that sum add twenty-five dollars for each boat, in time lost, 11,250 dollars, and the difference to steamboats is 42,750 dollars a year. To this add the saving to flat boats of at least fifteen dollars each, and it amounts to 57,750 dollars annually—a much larger amount than it is believed it would take to make the improvements contemplated.

Mr. C. remarked that it was a subject in which a large portion of the commercial and agricultural community of the West felt a deep interest, and hoped that the action of the House might be had upon it during the present session.

The resolution offered by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, on Thursday last, was taken up, and after being modified by adding the words "since September, 1830"—

Mr. EVERETT observed, that he had two objects in view in bringing forward this resolution; one was to complete the publication of a very interesting series of public documents. The papers on this subject down to the year 1825 had been already communicated to Congress; and it would no doubt be highly gratifying to the House and the country to have the series brought down to the present time; inasmuch as the important controversy to which they refer had been brought to an honorable and satisfactory close. His other, and the more important, object in moving the resolution, was one which had been pressed upon his consideration by some of the claimants, under the highly advantageous convention which has lately been concluded with France. It was believed by them, that the papers embraced in the call would throw light on important questions to be considered and adjudicated by the commissioners under the convention. Mr. E. added, that he could state that our late minister to France approved of the communication of these documents, as far as concerned his part of the negotiation; and had expressed to him his willingness, and even wish, that they should be sent to the House without delay. Mr. E. knew of no reason for opposing the resolution, and trusted the House would accept it without a division.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of such portions of the public lands as have been offered at public sale, and have remained unsold for the period of five years and upwards.

Resolved further, That said committee inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the respective States in which they are situated such portions of the public lands as may have been offered at public sale, and, being subject to private entry, have remained unsold for the period of ten years.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, observed that the resolution involved a very important question—perhaps as important a one as had ever been offered to the consideration of Congress; and he wished that its consideration should be postponed to Monday next. Why was this unceasing demand heard for the relinquishment by the United States of all its public lands? For his own part, he was unable to give any good reason for it; and as he desired time to reflect on the subject of the resolution, he moved its postponement till Monday.

Mr. CLAY said that this was a species of opposition, and at a stage of the resolution, which he had not anticipated. The resolution proposed a simple inquiry, and did not go to commit the House. What injury could result from confiding such an inquiry to one of the standing committees of the House? Was the gentleman unwilling that even an inquiry should be instituted? Was he unwilling to hear a report from one of the committees of the House? He would not at present urge the considerations which in his judgment ought to induce Congress to concede to the new States all they asked on this subject. Were this the proper time, he could urge the many and great disadvantages under which the new States labored from having a large part of their territory beyond the reach of their taxation for revenue; and he was prepared to show, from documentary evidence, that for a large portion of the public domain it was impossible that the Government should ever obtain even the minimum price allowed by law. But he should not press those topics now. He hoped the resolution would not be postponed.

Mr. SPEIGHT suggested that his colleague had better move to reconsider the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BOON,] which went in substance to the same object, and which had just been adopted without debate.

Mr. CLAY said that his resolution differed from the other, as being more specific in point of time.

The CHAIR having compared the two resolutions, pronounced that of Mr. CLAY to be sufficiently different from Mr. BOON's to make it in order to consider it.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied to Mr. CLAY, and was proceeding to show that the old States had as great a right to retain, as the new States to claim, the public domain; and should those lands be ceded, the old States would experience as much injury as the new States would obtain benefit; but

The CHAIR arrested the discussion, as going into the merits on a question of postponement.

Mr. WILLIAMS having demanded the yeas and nays on his motion to postpone, they were taken; and stood as follows:—Yeas 106, Nays 78.

So the resolution was postponed.

Mr. HEISTER, of Pennsylvania, then moved to reconsider the resolution offered by Mr. BOON, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, observed, that the inquiry proposed in the resolution had often already been before the Committee on the Public Lands. The resolution proposed merely an inquiry, and covered no ground that was not already covered, by referring a part of the President's message to the Land Committee. It was useless to take up time by taking the vote by yeas and nays, as the resolution neither went to add to, nor to take from, the duties at present confided to the committee.

The question was then taken, and decided by yeas and nays as follows:—Yeas 90, Nays 83.

So the House agreed to reconsider.

The resolution was then postponed to Monday next.

Mr. MARDIS offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the settlers on the public lands of the United States a right of pre-emption to their respective improvements.

And be it further resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of permitting the citizens of the several townships in the United States entitled to section sixteen, for the purpose of schools, where the same is sterile and valueless, to surrender such section to the United States, and select from the unsold lands, within the limits of the State where the section surrendered may be, another in lieu thereof.

Mr. ROOT, of New York, said he had hoped the House would have been suffered to rest, upon this subject of the public lands, until a bill should come up for consideration, which now lay over from the last session, and which provided for the disposition of the avails of the public lands, on the presumption that they should continue to be sold as heretofore. The present resolution was not, he perceived, quite so charming as its predecessor. This proposed to inquire as to disposing of the public domain to a certain description of persons sometimes called in that hall "pioneers," but who were known in his own State by the more humble name of "squatters"—persons who, without law, and against law, had intruded on the lands of the United States, and whom it was proposed to quiet in their possession by conferring upon them a title to the land which they had obtained by trespass. Mr. R. said he would not consent even that a committee should inquire into the propriety of rewarding men for breaking the laws of their country. He was, indeed, well aware that there existed, and had existed for this long time, a strong desire to dispose of the public lands for less than their value, and for nothing at all. But here came a proposition to deprive the "good old thirteen" of that which rightfully belonged to them.

The CHAIR here, at the suggestion of Mr. SPEIGHT, arrested the course of Mr. ROOT's remarks, as going into the merits.

The question was then taken, and the consideration of Mr. MARDIS's resolution was postponed till Monday.

A report was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by the report of the agent employed by the department to examine into the affairs of the Bank of the United States, and which stated all the demands upon the bank to amount to about thirty-six millions, and all the assets of the bank to about seventy-nine millions; which stated entire confidence in the safety of the bank as a depository for the public funds, and, in respect to the debts due the institution in the West, stated the opinion that they were as good as the same amount of debt would ordinarily be estimated at on the seaboard.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to print an extra number of 10,000 copies of this report, and requested that the rule be suspended which requires such a motion to lie one day.

Mr. WAYNE objecting, Mr. WICKLIFFE made the motion, but it failed to obtain the votes of two-thirds of the members present—yeas 91, nays 62. So the motion lies till to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, requesting, for obvious reasons he stated, to be excused from serving on the Committee on Military Affairs. The letter was read, and the request granted by the House.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. CAMBRELENG, came up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the correspondence with the president of the Bank of the United States, and the documents furnished by the latter relative to the arrangement made in Europe, on the part of the bank, for the postponement of the payment of the three per cent. stock of the United States.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed that, on hearing this resolution read yesterday, it had occurred to him that it was not couched in terms sufficiently broad to cover all the documentary information which it was desirable that Congress should possess on this subject of the three per cents, and, on examination, he found that his first impression had been correct. The gentleman's resolution called only for the correspondence of the president of the bank in relation to the arrangement made for the purchase of three per cent. stock abroad. It did not embrace the correspondence between the president of the bank and the Secretary of the Treasury prior to such arrangement, and which correspondence might have been the very inducement which led to the measure itself. Mr. W. therefore moved to amend the resolution by adding a clause embracing all the correspondence between the bank and the Treasury on the subject.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the gentleman from Kentucky had nothing in view but what he (Mr. C.) had also in view; but if the gentleman thought that his amendment would better promote the object, he would adopt it with pleasure as a modification.

Thus, as amended, the resolution was agreed to.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. WICKLIFFE for the printing of 10,000 copies of the report of the agent of the Treasury as to the existing condition of the Bank of the United States having been read—

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed that it would have been more gratifying to him had the gentleman so modified his resolution as to include the printing of the correspondence, to which the last resolution referred. He thought this far more important than the report now mentioned in the resolution. The call just made would probably be answered to-morrow, and if the gentleman would consent to postpone his resolution till then, the whole might be included.

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied, that he did not consider the correspondence referred to as so connected with the report of the agent of the Treasury that both should be included in the same pamphlet. From what he daily heard of the alarm occasioned by the Executive communications as to the safety of the national funds in the bank, he conceived it of the utmost importance that the antidote to that communication, proceeding from the same source as the poison, should be disseminated as speedily and widely as possible. His object was the safety and peace of the country. He desired to show to the people that the Secretary of the Treasury had been mistaken in the suggestion contained in his report, that the bank was not a safe depository for the national funds. He wished to do this by laying before them the report of the Treasury's own agent—a personal friend of the administration—a man of unimpeachable probity and of great intelligence, and who merited that highest of all characters—the character of an honest man; a man well known to the people of the Western country; and respected wherever known.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the gentleman, in his zeal to correct the errors of others, would find that he was leading the public into very dangerous errors, by disseminating the document he was so anxious to get printed; and at a proper time Mr. C. would endeavor to show how far the gentleman was himself mistaken. He should go into the subject with as much candor and fairness as possible, with a desire to do justice to both sides. He was of opinion that the Secretary had had good and sufficient grounds for the suggestion he had made, but he would not press the subject at this time; when the correspondence should come in, he should move for the printing of 10,000 copies of that communication.

Mr. POLK moved to postpone the further consideration of Mr. WICKLIFFE's motion until to-morrow. He thought the public would suffer nothing by so short a delay, but would, on the contrary, be benefited, by having an opportunity of seeing all sides of the question; not that Mr. P. had any objection to the publication of the report; let it go to the world; it was nothing, and professed to be nothing but a compendium of the monthly reports of the bank, which the agent had no possible opportunity or means to verify.

Mr. WATMOUGH opposed the postponement; it could produce nothing but delay. He was anxious that, before the House should go into the debate, it should be in possession of all the facts and documents necessary to its enlightened discussion of the subject.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, saw no force in this, as the House already possessed the ordinary number of copies of this document: the present question had reference only to the printing of an extra number. He demanded the yeas and nays on the question of postponement. They were taken accordingly, and resulted as follows:

Yeas 85, nays 101. So the House refused to postpone, and the resolution was agreed to.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

The House then proceeded to the election of a Chaplain, for which office several gentlemen were nominated. On counting the ballots, it appeared that the Rev. WILLIAM HAMMET, of Virginia, had received 108 votes out of 179, and was of course elected.

BANK UNITED STATES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CORBET in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the resolution proposing to refer so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the Bank of the United States to a select committee. The question being on the following amendment offered by Mr. WAYNE, viz:

“With power to call for persons, and on the bank and its branches for papers, and to examine witnesses generally in reference to the operations of the bank.”

Dec. 12, 1832.]

Bank of the United States.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. SPEIGHT expressed his hope that the gentleman from Georgia would consent to withdraw his amendment. If any such powers as that amendment proposed should be found necessary to the proper discharge of its duty, the committee could at any time apply to the House to obtain them. Mr. S. was sorry the amendment had been introduced at all; as he believed it was the wish of all to avoid, if possible, a renewal of debate on the general subject of the bank. Indeed, he had at first thought of referring the subject by resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means; but, as the President had made it the subject of special observation in his communication to Congress, Mr. S. had concluded it proper and respectful to refer it to a select committee. The mere mention of the subject was always sure to be productive of great excitement in the House, and the friends of the bank complained of the injurious effect of such a debate on the stock of the bank. Were he a friend of the bank, (and he declared himself not to be its enemy,) he should consider the refusal of an investigation as the most injurious thing that could happen to the credit of the institution. He did not believe all the reports that were current; but if the committee needed the powers proposed, let them apply to the House, and they would be given.

Mr. WATMOUGH disclaimed all intention of embarrassing the action of the House, or seeking to thwart any course that might be deemed necessary and proper. But he was of opinion that before the House went into the discussion of the bank subject, it was desirable that it should be possessed of all the facts of the case, and all documentary evidence necessary to its enlightened action. The agitation of such a topic had a great effect not only on the fortunes of individuals, but upon the whole commercial interests of the country. When statements injurious to the credit of the bank came from so high a source as that House, and from sources still higher and equally responsible, such must naturally be the case. He was desirous that all the scrutiny should take place which any gentleman could ask or desire; but accusations of so grave a character should not be met by mere declamatory speeches; the House should be referred to accurate statements of fact. The charges were of a character very painfully to affect the character and feelings of honorable men, and should not lightly be made. What advantage could arise from the appointment of a select committee? Would Government be aided? Would commerce be benefited? Would the alarm which had been excited in our large cities be allayed? If gentlemen thought that the scrutiny gone into by the committee formerly appointed was not a severe one, they were greatly mistaken. Had that examination resulted in showing that the bank was not a safe depository for the funds of the Government, and that the conduct of the gentlemen who presided over the institution had not been upright and honorable, then he would be for the appointment of a select committee. But, as such a species of harassment was very touching to the feelings of upright and honorable men, such as Mr. W. was convinced the directors of the bank would be found to be, he was desirous of putting an end to mere ex parte statements; and his object in rising was to move to amend the resolution proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT,] by striking out the words "select committee," and inserting the Committee of Ways and Means. He had no objection that the latter committee should be clothed with all the power the gentleman from Georgia wished to give them. He hoped that no one would suspect him of the slightest wish to shield the bank, or any individual connected with it, from the strictest scrutiny; but he did wish to shield from premature, unnecessary, and injurious imputations, men who, he was fully persuaded, did not deserve them. The document which had been ordered to be printed he considered as highly honorable to the individual from whom it came; and, with such a document before him, he could not but feel anxious that no party feeling, and no premature action, should be permitted to destroy or injure an institution so necessary to the safety and permanency of our national union as he considered a national bank to be.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman from Pennsylvania that his motion would not be in order until the pending amendment should have been disposed of.

Mr. WATMOUGH then said that he would offer his motion as an amendment to the amendment before the House.

The CHAIR replied that it could not be received as such, because there was nothing in the pending amendment to which the gentleman's motion could adhere.

Mr. WAYNE said he was sorry that he could not comply with the wishes of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT,] by withdrawing his amendment; that it had not been made without due consideration; that the time which had since elapsed had more fully convinced him of its propriety; and had he needed any additional evidence, it would be found in the suggestion of the honorable gentleman. The gentleman wished his proposition to be withdrawn, and the whole subject to go to a select committee, without instructions; and if, in the course of their discussion, the committee should discover that they stood in need of such powers as Mr. W.'s amendment proposed to give them, the gentleman thought that would be time enough for the House to confer them; but this would not be approaching directly to the object on which he wished to move. If there was to be any investigation at all of the concerns of the bank, Mr. W. wanted that it should be known at once. He did not think it was fair; it was not fair to the bank to refer the subject to a select committee, who, at some distant period, were to be left to come to the House and apply for power to send for persons and papers, when the session should be so far advanced that no time would remain for any definitive action on the matter; for the gentleman could not forget that the powers of this Congress would terminate on the 4th of March next. Mr. W. said, that he felt no very strenuous desire that any thing should be done upon the subject this session; but if any thing were to be done, the sooner it was done the better. He had no doubt that the motives and intentions of the gentleman from North Carolina were perfectly fair and upright. The gentleman wished to get rid of the difficulty which he felt to be pressing on the House; but he put it to the gentleman to say, whether the course proposed by him would not lead to a delay that must effectually prevent any efficient action. Mr. W. wished that an investigation should take place, as to the alleged impropriety, on the part of the bank, in reference to the three per cent. stock. He was not prepared to say that any impropriety had taken place; but when the documents should come in, it would probably appear that the directors had pursued a mistaken course, although they might have been actuated by the best possible intentions. Mr. W. was not to be drawn aside from the course he had marked out for himself. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATMOUGH] wished the subject to be postponed; but could the gentleman desire that the state of doubt and anxiety which now agitated the public mind should continue? If there should be no report of a committee, the bank must continue to stand under the accusation which had been brought against it, without any thing to meet or counteract it but the report of a Treasury agent—a report which did not prove that the bank was in any better situation than had been apprehended, and which did not comport with the instructions given to that agent. Of that report he should not now speak farther, though he might hereafter have cause to examine it more particularly; but he asked the friends of the bank whether it was better to leave the institution in its present attitude before the public, or, by investigating its affairs, to test the truth of the allegation against it? Besides, the publication of that report placed those gentlemen who believed an investigation to be necessary in a situation which called upon them to act. The object in despatching that agent had been to ascertain the soundness of the debts due to the bank in the West; and what did his report contain? The agent's opinion as to the solvency of the bank, and a compendium of the monthly statements, put forth by the institution, of its own affairs.

Mr. JENIFER made some remarks, which were very imperfectly heard at the reporter's table. He was understood to say that the subject had come before the House in a manner for which they, as representatives of the people, were not responsible. After reading the communication of the President, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he should have had no hesitation to say that he believed there must be some ground to doubt the solvency of the bank, simply because he never could have believed that such communications would have been officially made to the Legislature without good and substantial reasons; but, since then, the report had been received of an agent appointed by the Treasury itself, to examine into the affairs of the institution. He had done so, and what was the result? It amounted in sum to this: That the liabilities of the bank were for $37,000,000, and its assets to meet them were $79,000,000, leaving an excess of $42,000,000 in the hands of the bank. This surely was sufficient to prove that there could be no danger to the public funds. As to the debts of the West, the report pronounced them to be in a safe and wholesome state, and that no greater loss was to be apprehended in the collection of them than in collecting the same amount of money on the Atlantic seaboard. How, then, did the matter stand? The Secretary, in his report, called for an inquiry into the affairs of the bank; but that call had been made prior to the return of the agent. Had that officer made any call since? Was he not, or ought he not, to be satisfied with the result of his own inquiry? As no call had since been made, and as the investigation was not demanded by any member of the House, Mr. J. moved to lay the resolution and the amendments upon the table.

The CHAIR reminded Mr. J. that the House was in Committee of the Whole, and that his motion could not therefore be received.

He thereupon moved that the committee rise; but at the request of Mr. POLK, he consented to withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPEIGHT said, that he found himself between two extremes. Some gentlemen were for crushing the bank at once, others were for shielding it from all investigation. Mr. S. said he was no bank man, but was inclined to pursue a middle course. His opposition to this bank arose from the hostility he felt to banks generally. For what kind of an investigation had the President asked in his message? For such a one as should satisfy the House, whether the bank was, or was not, a safe depository for the public funds. The report of the agent of the Treasury declared that it was. There ended the question, if that report was to be believed. But he desired to refer the whole matter to a select committee; and if that committee, on farther investigation, should believe an investigation necessary, and if, in the prosecution of it, they should need further power, they would, of course, apply for it. The very reason urged by the gentleman from Georgia why such powers should be conferred on this committee, was, to his mind, the most satisfactory reason why they should not, viz: that the session was too short to allow time for their profitable exercise. He should vote against the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS said, that his own impression was, that the House should proceed in this matter on some principle of law. He was against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, because the gentleman had not made out, to his mind, that the House had any motive for making the investigation he proposed. His amendment went to clothe the committee with power to send for persons, and to demand papers from the bank and its branches, and to collect testimony generally in relation to its affairs. And for what purpose? Yes, for what purpose? The law defined the only purpose, for which the House reserved to itself authority to inquire into the affairs of the bank. The 23d section of the bank law provided—

“That it shall, at all times, be lawful for a committee of either House of Congress, appointed for that purpose, to inspect the books, and to examine into the proceedings of the corporation hereby created, and to report whether the provisions of this charter have been by the same violated or not; and whenever any committee, as aforesaid, shall find and report, or the President of the United States shall have reason to believe, that the charter has been violated, it may be lawful for Congress to direct, or the President to order a scire facias to be sued out of the Circuit Court of the district of Pennsylvania, in the name of the United States, (which shall be executed upon the president of the corporation for the time being, at least fifteen days before the commencement of the term of said court,) calling on the said corporation to show cause wherefore the charter hereby granted shall not be declared forfeited; and it shall be lawful for the said court, upon the return of the said scire facias, to examine into the truth of the alleged violation; and if such violation be made to appear, then to pronounce and adjudge that the said charter is forfeited and annulled: Provided, however, Every issue of fact which may be joined between the United States and the corporation aforesaid shall be tried by jury. And it shall be lawful for the court aforesaid to require the production of such of the books of the corporation as it may deem necessary for the ascertainment of the controverted facts; and the final judgment of the court aforesaid shall be examinable in the Supreme Court of the United States, by writ of error, and may be there reversed or affirmed, according to the usages of law.”

The only purpose of the investigation was, to ascertain whether the bank charter had been violated or not. No charge was made that the bank had done so; no such allegation was to be found, either in the President's message, or in the Secretary's report. So far was this from being the case, that if any credit were due to the report of the special agent of the Treasury, there did not exist the slightest foundation for even the most remote suspicion that the charter of the bank had been violated. And this very section of the law went to show that Congress, in reserving to itself the power of investigation, had no intention that that House, on any light, frivolous, and unfounded suspicion, laid before it by any body, should enter upon so solemn an inquiry; but that the investigation should take place only when a well-founded reason should be shown to exist for believing that the charter of the bank had been violated. No such case was before the House; no such reasons had been presented to it. They were not to be found in the message of the President, nor in the Secretary's report. What had the President intimated in his message? Simply this: that there were suspicions that possibly there might be some hazard in continuing the Government deposits in the Bank of the United States. Admit the fact, and still there would be no need of a committee, because, by another section of the same law, the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever he should entertain any such suspicions, was authorized to withdraw the Government deposits from the bank. The entire responsibility was devolved upon the Secretary; and that officer had no right to call upon the House to institute a committee to engage in an investigation that would occupy a longer time than the Congress itself would last, in order to ascertain whether it would be proper for him to exercise a power given to him or no. What said the law?

"Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank, or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Here was no provision that the exercise of the Secretary's power should be preceded by an investigation on the part of Congress. In the nature of things, this would be improper. It was the duty of the Secretary to know enough of the affairs of the bank to guide him in that matter. It was his duty to know whether the deposits of the Government were safe or not. The responsibility rested by law upon the Secretary himself. He had no right to come to that House to call for the investigation now proposed, and which there was no time to make. Mr. A. said that the inquiry proposed by the amendment would be useless, nugatory, and improper. It would be taking off from the Secretary that responsibility which the law imposed upon him. This, he, for one, was not willing to do. If the Secretary had grounds of suspicion, it was his duty to act upon them, and send his reasons to the House; but, if he had no solid ground for such a step, it would be useless, and worse than useless, for the House to take off his official responsibility. If he had no ground of suspicion, it was his duty not to withdraw the deposits; if he had, it was his duty to withdraw them at once, and tell Congress his reasons for doing so.

Mr. THOMAS, of Md., said, the question now presented, and heretofore elaborately discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] in a report which his friends think does him great credit, is one which ought to be examined before we proceed to dispose of that part of the message now under consideration. If this House has no power to examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States, except to ascertain whether its charter has been forfeited, then, indeed, we are engaged in unprofitable debate. On that question the distinguished gentleman and himself were wide asunder as the poles. He might, perhaps, when adverting to the difference in years, and standing before the nation, of himself and the gentleman, shrink from this open avowal of an uncompromising difference of opinion, but for the fact that the doctrine of the gentleman was not sustained by the past action of Congress, or countenanced by the recorded opinions of some of the most distinguished men of whose fame the country could boast.

To all who doubted the illimitable powers of this House to examine into the transactions of the bank, Mr. T. would say, look to the letter of Mr. Dallas, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in 1816, addressed to Mr. Calhoun, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. That letter was not then before him, but its character was fresh in his recollection, and he maintained that its fair construction proved that the writer never doubted that Congress would have a right to appoint a committee to inquire into the solvency or insolvency of the bank, if the charter recommended by him should be granted. That part of the charter recommended by Mr. T., the proper construction of which is at this late day brought in question, was sanctioned by Congress; and we are now told that it does not confer a most important power, which it must be conceded Mr. Dallas designed should devolve on Congress.

Mr. T. insisted that the action of Congress in 1819 fully justified the construction of the charter for which he was contending. At that time rumors were prevalent like those which now filled the land. The bank was said to be on the verge of insolvency. The Congress of that day did not hesitate. They did not imagine that there was no conservative power by which the revenue of the Government could be preserved from the risk which appeared to await the monetary concerns of the whole country. He believed, almost without opposition, a committee was appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the bank. That committee was not restricted to time, but was given ample time, and clothed, without stint, with full power to meet the emergency, and quiet the public apprehensions. On that committee were Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, the present Secretary of the Treasury, Judge Spencer, of New York, and others, distinguished for their high attainments and elevated patriotism. On looking into this report, the House would find that, without scruple, they examined the accounts of private individuals; they laid bare the secret transactions of the institution; and the course was subsequently sanctioned by Congress and the whole community. Mr. T. said he took particular pleasure in recalling to recollection these facts, as they furnished a precedent of the highest authority, by which he had been much influenced in the discharge of a duty recently devolved on him. This report he had closely examined, and would recommend to all who could doubt on this question, to go and do likewise. The precedent he quoted was entitled to great weight, from the character of the members of the committee. It was entitled to still greater weight, because Congress and the committee of 1819 acted under no party bias or excitement.

Mr. T. recalled to the recollection of the House two prominent features of the report of 1819: that part in which the maladministration of the bank officers was proved by the practice of making large loans or deposits of stock certificates, and of granting accommodations without the consent of the directors. No one would pretend that the charter of the bank would be forfeited by loans being made without personal security, or by others than the board of directors. When, therefore, the committee of 1819 pointed out such transactions as reprehensible, they manifested an entire ignorance of the new-fangled doctrines which would serve to cover enormous abuses of the present day.

Mr. T. said he must be excused for arraying the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURROWS] against that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. At the last session of Congress, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLAYTON] presented his famous bill of indictments against the bank, the gentleman from Rhode Island presented for our adoption a resolution expressly authorizing a committee to examine into transactions not amounting to forfeiture of the charter. The opinions of other members of this House could be quoted, but would only multiply authority. In the nature of the bank itself, Mr. T. maintained, was to be found the propriety of exerting the power in question. The stockholders of all private banks have a right to assemble and revise the proceedings of the directors. At such meetings (who ever heard it doubted?) they had a right to examine whether good security had been given for the repayment of any dollar loaned. The people of the United States are stockholders in the Bank of the United States to the amount of seven millions of dollars. The public revenue paid by the people for the support of the Government is collected by this bank. Of that fund the bank has on deposit seldom less than five millions of dollars, and sometimes fifteen millions at a time. The amount liable to pass through the bank annually is not less than twenty-five millions of dollars. Would it not be extraordinary if the people had no means by which to decide whether these large sums were in safe hands?

They cannot assemble in one body and inspect the books of this institution. They can only act on this great interest by the means of agents. This Congress is too numerous to act as such agents, and hence the propriety of devolving on a committee the power for which he contended.

Mr. T. said, he had refrained from entering at large into the considerations which ought to induce Congress now to exercise the necessary and important power for which he was contending. He had risen solely to lend his aid to vindicate the contested power of the House. He would, however, say, that enough was known, he thought, to justify the investigation recommended by the President. He knew that the bank had failed to pay part of the public debt when required to do so by the Secretary of the Treasury; although it is admitted that the United States has on deposit in the bank money enough due to the United States to meet the demand. We are told by the President and Secretary of the Treasury, on their high responsibility, that these facts, with others, have induced the fear that the public deposits are not safe in this institution.

We are farther told by these high officers that neither of them has power to call for the information necessary to remove or confirm their fears; and we are invited to exercise the power conferred on this House, by the charter of the bank, to direct a full investigation. When he looked to the momentous interests involved in this question, Mr. T. could not but believe that the request of the President and Secretary ought to be promptly complied with.

Mr. ELLSWORTH observed, that he had but a word to say. He thought the House was spending its time unnecessarily in the discussion of questions not strictly before it. An attempt had been made by the gentleman from North Carolina to divide the President's message, and to refer its several parts to appropriate committees. One of the resolutions he had offered went to refer this question of the bank to a select committee. To that resolution a gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WAYNE] had offered an amendment, proposing to clothe the committee with power to send for persons and papers; and, thereupon, a question was now made whether Congress had any power to institute such an inquiry? Could there be any necessity of discussing abstract questions of this kind? Was it doing any kindness to the institution to say we had not power to investigate its affairs? The bank itself had urged no such objection: he trusted it never would. He should greatly regret to see the bank take that ground, and he was persuaded no gentleman on that floor was authorized to do so in its behalf. When the bank should deny the power of the House, it would be time enough for the House to examine its rights. For himself, he cared not whether the subject went to a select or to a standing committee. If the committee to which it should go came to the House for further powers, it would then be time enough to settle the question of granting them. Why should gentlemen lash themselves into a rage on such a question, till they should learn whether the committee found any need of the investigation? It was highly probable that no committee would ever ask for such powers. The only question which need now be settled was, whether the subject should be referred to a select committee. He hoped the House would decide one way or other, and proceed to distribute the message.

Mr. DEARBORN was understood to say, that when the gentleman from North Carolina had drawn up his resolutions distributing the several subjects in the message to appropriate committees of the House, finding that document to contain certain intimations with respect to the bank, which were altogether of a general character, and contained no specific charges against the institution, the gentleman felt himself warranted in referring the whole matter to a select committee. But what had happened since? The House had received from the Secretary of the Treasury the report of his own agent, containing full and plenary evidence that the bank was solvent, and the public funds in not the slightest danger. If the Secretary still entertained apprehensions, such as he had stated in his first communication, he would, no doubt, have made an intimation to that effect in the communication just received from him; but as none such was to be found in it, Mr. D. took it for granted that both the Secretary and the President were now satisfied that the affairs of the bank were in a sound, safe, and healthy condition. He could see, therefore, no reason for adopting either the resolution or the amendment. He thought both should be rejected, and that the subject should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The alarm which had agitated our principal commercial cities would, he presumed, be effectually quieted by the publication of the report from the agent of the Treasury. As the House was now without any complaint against the bank, it was wrong to keep the public mind any longer in a state of excitement, and keep up the belief that there was reason to believe the bank an unsafe depository for the public money. As to abstract questions, relating to the power of the House, there was no need of going into them, since, as he had said, there was no complaint remaining against the bank. According to the statement of the agent, the stock of the bank ought, on mercantile principles, to be twenty per cent. above par. Under such circumstances, Mr. D. could not conceive what imaginable necessity there could be for the appointment of a special committee to investigate its affairs.

Mr. DANIEL said that he greatly regretted that there should have intervened a moment's delay in permitting the gentleman from North Carolina to dissect the body of his deceased patient, and shrouding him as soon as possible in the winding-sheet that had been prepared. As to the investigation that was talked about, it could answer no good or valuable purpose; it would result in the same manner as a similar investigation had done at the last session. An investigating committee had been appointed then, and what had been reported by them? All the facts on both sides, every thing that went to sustain or to condemn the bank. As to the solvency of the institution, Mr. D. said he had evidence of it, which had not been adverted to, and which the gentleman from Georgia himself would not dispute, when he looked at the deep-toned message of the President. He found that officer had told the country that, if the bank should be rechartered, its stock would soon be fifty per cent. above par, and that just so much would go into the pockets of foreigners. Was this not evidence that the bank was solvent? If it was not solvent, its stock would be fifty per cent. below par. Placing the President's veto alongside of his message, what would be the result of the comparison? A pointed contradiction, that was all. Last year the Secretary had sent to the House one of the ablest reports that had ever been made, demonstrating that the bank ought to be rechartered. It was the ablest document Mr. D. had ever seen; so able that it had nearly converted him, though he was opposed to the bank. Now the same man came to the House with a declaration that the bank was in danger, and the public funds not safe. He made this statement the very day before his own agent returned. What for? Why could not he wait a day longer, till the report of his agent came in? Why could he not hasten his agent? As for himself, Mr. D. saw no danger either of the bank or of the public money. The gentleman talked much about unavailable funds, and had insinuated something about bad debts: now, all the bad debts due to the bank in the West had some time since been discharged at five cents and ten cents in the dollar. The insolvent debtor had been invited to make this composition, that the bank might clear its books of them, and the bad debts were not included in the forty-two millions reported by the agent. And what was that agent's report? Was it of a complexion to excite suspicion? What was the result? Why, that the bank, after paying all demands, possessed a balance of forty-two millions of dollars. Did this look like insolvency?

Mr. D. believed that there was infinitely more danger of the United States becoming insolvent than of the bank. The United States were insolvent: on the first of January next they would be 300,000 dollars worse than nothing, and this with an income of 31,000,000 and a large surplus in the treasury. He thought it would be much more appropriate to appoint a Committee of Retrenchment to find out where all this money had gone to. So far from the bank being insolvent, it had always been Mr. D.'s greatest apprehension that it would be too solvent, that it would swallow up every thing else: hence he had always been opposed to it, and should be opposed to it still, if his constituents were opposed to it. When they were against it he was against it; but now they were for the bank, and so was he. It was very well known that, in New York, there was nothing but speculation upon speculation in the funds of the country; it was carried to a most disgraceful extent, and for what? For the benefit of the country? No: to benefit individuals who were the favorites of the administration. For what else were these assaults upon the bank, when no man in his senses doubted its being solvent? Even the gentleman from Georgia would not express a doubt on that point; and the gentleman from North Carolina, who had so ably cut up the President's message, had told the House that he was no enemy to the bank, and that the question of its solvency was at an end. He thought the House had better do some business, and not waste whole days in disputing whether they should examine into a bank that they all knew to be perfectly solvent. Not a man of the House dare deny it: there was not one who could say that he believed that the funds of the bank were in any danger whatever.

Mr. POLK said, that nobody could be more anxious to stop this debate than he had been to prevent it. He had foreseen that it would be of a general and loose character, and tend to no useful end. Gentlemen resisted the inquiry proposed, by setting up the report of the agent of the Treasury against the message of the President and the Secretary's report, and seemed to take it for granted that the highest officers of the Government had thrown out, before the House and the nation, insinuations wholly unfounded in truth. And what was this report of the agent? What did the agent himself say that it was? A mere compendium of the monthly reports of the bank. That report gave the House no such information as it had learned from the gentleman from Georgia, that the bank held eight millions of unavailable funds, and that the amount of this sort of debts had been increasing for these eighteen years past. It was intimated by gentlemen that the arrangement which had been made with foreign stockholders was only to enable the bank to hold up the certificates of the three per cent. stock of which it might get control, in case the Government should not have means to redeem them. How did this matter stand? The Secretary of the Treasury had given public notice that the whole amount of the three per cents would be paid off on the first of July. The bank was apprized of this arrangement, and on its application the Treasury Department consented to suspend the redemption of one-third of this stock until the first of October, the bank paying the interest in the mean while. But, if the condition of the bank was so very prosperous, as has been represented, why did it make so great a sacrifice as to pay interest on that large amount for three months, for the sake of deferring the payment? The Secretary of the Treasury, on the 19th July, determined that two-thirds of the stock should be paid off on the 1st of October; and, on the 18th of July what did the bank do? It despatched an agent to London, without the knowledge of the Treasury, and for what? In effect, to borrow 5,000,000 dollars, for that was the amount of the transaction. From this fact Mr. P. inferred that the bank was unable to go on without the public deposits. They then made a communication to the Treasury, stating that the bank would hold up such certificates as it could control, to suit the convenience of the Government; but was it on this account that they sent their agent to London? Did the president of the bank himself assign this reason? No, he gave a very different account of the matter: he said that the bank apprehended that the spread of the cholera might produce great distress in the country, and that the bank wished to hold itself in an attitude to meet the public exigencies, and that with this view an agent was sent to make an arrangement with the Barings for withholding three millions of the stock.

Mr. WICKLIFFE here explained. The statement he had made was this: that the Secretary's letter to the bank, dated on the 19th, declared that the arrangement was in accordance with an understanding previously had with the bank. Would the gentleman deny that the Secretary wrote this?

Mr. POLK answered yes: and when the papers which have been called for should be received, the issue between himself and the gentleman from Kentucky could be decided. It was possible, and he stated it as mere conjecture, that some conversation might have taken place between the Secretary and the president of the bank in relation to the subject; but, he repeated, that this was mere conjecture. The Secretary knew that the revenue of the United States was constantly flowing into the bank, sometimes at the rate of half a million of dollars in a single week, and he therefore concluded that there might be funds sufficient on the 1st of October to pay off two-thirds of the three per cents. But if, peradventure, there should not be quite funds enough, he might have asked the president of the bank whether he, as the agent of Baring & Co., would agree to hold up certificates to the amount of the deficit, say 2 or 300,000 dollars, for a day or two, that is, to the 2d, or 3d, or 4th of October, until there should be Government funds to meet them. Some such conversation as this might have taken place. But could it ever have been contemplated that the bank, on such a ground as this, would send an agent abroad, without the knowledge of any branch of the Executive Government, to obtain for the bank the means of supplying the place of the public depositors, which it ought to pay over on the 1st of October? The agent was to get Baring & Co. to buy up American three per cent. stock, and place the money paid for it to the debit of the bank, and then the bank was to draw for the deficit in its funds if need should be. If Barings could not purchase to the amount of 5,000,000, the bank was to draw for the deficiency, paying an interest of four per cent. What was this but a direct loan? And, if so, did it not furnish grounds for suspicion at the Treasury that the bank was not a safe depository for the public funds?

If the institution was compelled to resort to such means to meet its engagements, did the fact furnish no ground of suspicion? Mr. P. said he apprehended that the instructions given to the agent were general and unlimited; but after the stock was bought, it was seen by the directors that to hold it would be a violation of the charter; and, accordingly, the act of the agent was disavowed. But still the great fact stared them in the face, that owing to an arrangement made by the bank, without the knowledge of Government, a portion of three per cent.

stock was actually withheld from the hands of the Government; so that it could not be redeemed though there were funds to meet it. To be sure, it was said that the bank paid the interest, and that, therefore, the Government sustained no loss. Very true; but still, the Government was liable; and the bank had, in effect, loaned out the Government deposits at six per cent., and borrowed money to replace them at four per cent., making a clear profit of two per cent. on the whole amount. This statement was uncontradicted by Mr. Toland, and it was, in itself, quite enough to raise a doubt as to the soundness of the institution. Something had been said about the Secretary's change of opinion; with that, Mr. P. had nothing to do. The Secretary may have been in favor of the bank upon principle, and still might have been induced to change his opinion from facts which had since come to his knowledge. On the whole, Mr. P. thought that there was abundant evidence that the House ought to go into the inquiry proposed. It was due to the bank itself; it was due to the Executive and to the country. If all that had been said was mere false clamor, none would be so much benefited by the exposure of its falsehood as the bank. Mr. P. apologized for having detained the House. There might be other grounds of suspicion in the minds of the President and of the Secretary with which he was unacquainted; but he thought those that had been stated were abundantly sufficient to warrant the action of the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, that before the final vote should be taken, he would endeavor to probe this matter of accusation a little further. At present, however, he rose for the purpose of putting himself right as to a matter of fact. His statement had been that, on the 19th of July the Secretary of the Treasury had written to the president of the bank, that he intended to pay off the whole of the three per cent. stock, two-thirds on the first of October, and the remaining one-third on the first of January. But anticipating the possibility that there might not be funds in the treasury to meet the whole amount, he requested, in accordance with a previous understanding between him and the president of the bank, the latter would withhold so much of the three per cent. certificates as the bank could get control of. Mr. W. had said that this was in the Secretary's letter; the gentleman from Tennessee denied it.

Mr. POLK explained, and said that this was not the issue which he had intended to make with the gentleman. He had meant to deny a different proposition.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, in support of what he had said, read from a newspaper what purported to be a copy of the Secretary's letter. When the returns came in, the House would know whether it was so or not.

Mr. POLK said the proposition he meant to deny was, that the measure of the bank, in sending its agent to London, was not based on this communication or understanding between its president and the Secretary. He understood the gentleman to say that the instructions to the agent were dated on the 19th of July. This he denied; the instructions were dated on the 17th, whereas the Secretary's letter was not received till the 19th. The Secretary had intended that the bank should hold up a few hundred thousand dollars of the stock for a few days, and on this the bank had proceeded to make a loan of millions; and now the gentleman sought to represent the Government as having warranted that transaction. The Government had done no such thing. It was an affair of the bank alone.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he had not intended to enter this debate, but the conversation which had passed between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] and the gentleman upon his right [Mr. POLK] obliged him to say that in defending the president of the bank the gentleman from Kentucky had taken ground which the president of the bank himself could not and would not take. That officer possessed too much candor, too high a sense of honor, too strong a sense of justice, to put this negotiation with the Barings on such a ground as the letter from the Treasury. He did not pretend to do so. The bank, as was well known, was itself the agent for the foreign holders of the three per cent. stock, and it could of course present the certificates of that stock or withhold their presentation, at pleasure. The Secretary of the Treasury had said to the bank, Congress is now in session; I cannot tell how much money they will appropriate, and therefore I am not certain whether I shall have funds to meet the whole of this three per cent. stock or no. If it shall turn out that there is a deficit, will not you, as agents of the foreign stockholders, withhold the presentation of their stock until I shall be able to meet it? To this the president of the bank assented. At the close of the session the Secretary discovered that he would be in funds to pay two-thirds of the stock, and he wrote the president of the bank to that effect.

This was a simple statement of the affair. Would any man pretend to place a five million loan on such grounds? Whoever made the attempt did little favor either to the bank or its president. That officer himself took no such ground. He placed the transaction on the ground of the general distress of the country occasioned by the cholera. When the letters should be communicated to the House, it would appear that the one was not an answer to the other.

Mr. INGERSOLL thought that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] had fallen into an important error in point of fact. From his statement, it would appear that the Secretary of the Treasury had sent to Mr. Biddle, and entered into a solemn negotiation on behalf of the United States for the advance of 1 or 200,000, for which the Government professed itself ready to allow interest for a few days! Could any one believe that this was the whole transaction? The object of the negotiation was to relieve the Treasury, in case it should be embarrassed. The Secretary told the bank that if the whole stock should be paid off, the Treasury would be left with only 1,600,000 dollars in its favor, of which 1,400,000 dollars were mere trash—mere rags—the evidence of claims against some of those private banks where the Government formerly invested its funds. The Government would then possess a balance of only 200,000 dollars, and if 600,000 dollars, the amount of money to be distributed to claimants under the Danish treaty were deducted, the Treasury would be minus 400,000 dollars. Besides this, as much as five millions were appropriated by Congress: not all, indeed, to be paid within the year, but the Secretary did not know how much of it would be needed. If he did, (as he heard the gentleman from Tennessee, near him, say,) there was no evidence of it in the report before the House. He could not, therefore, believe that the representation given had been strictly correct.

The question being now taken on Mr. WAYNE'S amendment, it was negatived without a count.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the fourth resolution, as moved by Mr. SEIGER,

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he wished to call the attention of the committee to one point in the report of the Secretary in relation to this same subject of the three per cents, which he considered worthy of the action of Congress. It was very true that the Secretary was warranted to withdraw the public deposits from the bank, but the gentleman from Massachusetts would perceive that the charter left the power to do this in the hands of Congress, unless during the recess of its session. The Secretary was required to report his reasons for what he had done to Congress, and Congress was to have the final action in the matter. In regard to the manifold arrangements of the bank with the house of Barings, they were of a nature which called for the action of the House. Those transactions had been communicated to the Government shortly before the meeting of Congress; and though the Secretary might have withdrawn the public deposits on his own responsibility, he chose rather to submit the question to that House. Mr. C. thought it was at least due to the country, if the bank might intervene at any time between the Government and its creditors, and put it out of the power of the Government to pay its debts when it had the means, that the country should know it. The law had ordered the stock to be redeemed; the Secretary of the Treasury had directed it to be redeemed; yet an agent of the bank thought proper to interfere and postpone the payment, against the will of both. Possibly the bank might have strong reasons to justify its course; if it had, no doubt it would give them. But the subject, as it stood, was worthy at least of the appointment of a committee of investigation.

Mr. WATMOUGH now moved to amend the resolution of Mr. SREIGHT, by striking out the words "select committee," and substituting therefor the words "Committee of Ways and Means."

The committee thereupon rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13.

THE CHICKASAW TREATY.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, said it would be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, a report had been made by a committee, of which he was a member, touching the provision in a treaty concluded with the Chickasaw Indians, concerning a certain salt reservation; which report recommended that the report, with the original papers concerning the transaction, should be transmitted to the Senate of the United States, as the treaty-making branch of Congress. Circumstances now induced him to present this proposition more directly to the House. Mr. W. then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report, with the original documents accompanying the same, made by the Committee on the Public Lands, upon the subject of the Chickasaw treaty, and the reservation of four miles square in said treaty.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said he should be sorry to throw any obstacle in the way of this proposition, if there were not principle involved in it. He presumed that no doubt could be entertained that all the information contained in the report referred to was either already in the possession, or within the reach of the Senate; so that concealment of it from the Senate could not be supposed to be any part of his objection to the resolution now under consideration. But his objection to it was, that it proposed an interference with the exclusive duties of the Senate, in regard to the ratification or non-ratification of a treaty. On that ground, solely, but decidedly, he opposed the resolution.

Mr. WICKLIFFE disclaimed entirely any disposition to invade the constitutional prerogatives of the Senate. His object was only to place before them information which might have an important bearing on business before them. It was true, he said, that the Senate, or some member of that body, might have seen or heard of the report which had been made to this body, and of the evidence connected with it; but it was not in any manner officially before them; for the original papers were now in possession of this House, although they might be of importance to the Senate in its action. He was not to know here what was before the Senate, acting in its executive capacity; but he was at liberty to suppose a case. He then supposed a case, which, as the reporter understood him, was, that the treaty heretofore referred to had never been placed before the Senate for confirmation; but that, failing to obtain, in violation of law, a sanction of the grant of ten miles square of the public domain (the Salt Spring tract) to particular individuals, the same commissioners had made a new treaty, which had been placed before the Senate for confirmation, by which the United States were to be required to pay money at the rate of a dollar and a quarter per acre for this very reservation, instead of granting the land itself. Now, he said, suppose such a case, and the information contained in the report of the committee of last session was necessary to enable the Government to act understandingly upon it, in reference to the interest of the Government. If the committee of this House were right in their report, this land was public domain, and not private property of the Indians, or any one else. And, if the Senate were not in possession of the fact, was it not the duty of the House to place it before them?

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that he had an objection to the resolution, which had not been taken by the gentleman from Tennessee. The proposition was, to refer to the Senate a report of a committee of this House. The proposition was an extraordinary one, in any view, but extremely so, inasmuch as the report in question had not undergone investigation by this House. Such a thing had never before, he presumed, occurred in the Government. Besides, said he, have we heard that any treaty on this subject is before the Senate? Would it not be at least proper to wait until we are called upon by that body for these papers, before we offer to send them? But the first objection which he had stated to the resolution was sufficient. The proper course for the gentleman would have been first to move for the consideration of his report, upon which the House could then act understandingly.

The question on agreeing to the resolution was then decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Allison, Archer, Armstrong, Arnold, Babcock, Banks, Barber, Barnwell, Barstow, Bates, Branch, Briggs, Bucher, Bullard, Burd, Burges, Cahoun, Choate, Collier, Condict, Condit, Cooke, Cooper, Corwin, Crane, Creighton, Dearborn, Dewart, Dickson, Ellsworth, Evans, E. So the motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE was decided in the negative.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the correspondence between the Treasury Department and the president of the Bank of the United States, and the papers relative to the arrangement entered into by the agent of the bank, for the postponement of the redemption of the three per cent. stock, called for by the resolution adopted by the House on yesterday.

H. or R.]

Bank of the United States.

[Dec. 13, 1832.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved that 10,000 copies of it be printed; which having been agreed to,

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, that it was obviously desirable that the public should have the best opportunities afforded them of forming a correct opinion of the bank, and suggested that the document received to-day should be appended to the one previously ordered to be printed, so that they might go forth in conjunction. Would the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] oppose a proposition to that effect?

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought the documents should be separate. One of them was intended for the information of the business part of the community, and the other was to suit the purposes of a knot of politicians. His (Mr. W.'s) part was to forward the information to his constituents, who were men of business.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would then move to append the documents now received to the former ones. The gentleman from Kentucky talks about the business portion of the nation. Sir, I am anxious that the business men of this country should see in what difficulty the bank was involved in July and August last, when it sent out a commissioner to negotiate a loan in England for five millions of dollars; not for the benefit of the commercial community; not for the benefit of the Government; but for the benefit of the bank: to meet its own wants in its widely extended concerns, not only throughout this country, but throughout all Europe.

If the bank did not make this loan on its own account, then its friends are driven to the hard necessity of admitting that the bank speculated on the deposits of the Government, and was concerned in the poorest and most petty stock-jobbing speculation under the sun, to gain some one or two per cent. on the loan. It would be doing injustice to the character of the president of the bank to admit such a supposition. What! a dignified and extensive institution like the Bank of the United States make a loan like this, and get the payment of the three per cents deferred for the sake of realizing the difference of interest! The bank had no such object. They borrowed because it could not pay the stock, although it had the deposits of the Government in its hands. No, sir, it could not pay in May, nor in January or July, nor in September, nor in October neither. And I here predict that in October, 1833, there will be another negotiation of the same kind. To tell business men that the bank would engage in such a loan, except from sheer necessity, is to tell us what we cannot believe. The country never will believe that the bank would engage in such an operation merely as a stock-jobbing scheme.

Mr. WICKLIFFE: I have heard so much said of the inability of the bank to pay for this three per cent. stock, and especially from a particular quarter of this House, and a particular quarter of the Union, that I have been led within the last three or four months to look a little into this primer, (holding up a large volume of the report of the Bank Committee of last session,) that I might see for myself how far the facts collected by a select committee of this House corresponded with the newspaper statements I had read. I had designed to advert to this in Committee of the Whole yesterday. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] appears now as a "premonitory symptom," and to announce to the stockholders in Wall street the probability of the failure of this national bank. If the gentleman will turn to this volume, he will there find the evidence of a man whose honor he will not impugn, and whose testimony was procured at his own instance. He will find it at page 520 of this document; and will the gentleman, in the face of this evidence, state, in his place, that the bank was not able to meet the engagements of the Government? Will he say so in contradiction of this testimony reported to this House by himself? Sir, as we are debating this question, not so much to enlighten our own judgment, as to get a pretext for doing that which it has been determined shall be done—yes, sir, determined shall be done; not in this House, but out of this House—I mean that the deposits of the Government shall be withdrawn from this bank to be placed elsewhere—the gentleman knows—let me call the House to the facts in reference to this subject of the three per cent. stock.

After all that has been written, published, and spoken here and elsewhere by those opposed to the continuance of the bank, said Mr. W., not a newspaper, not a writer or a speaker has ever once furnished to the public the evidence embodied by the gentleman himself upon this subject, and which contradicts flatly the statements made. Would the House allow him to read it, that the public might in this form obtain correct information?

Question to the president of the bank.

"Question. Will you please give a copy of the correspondence connected with your application, in March last, requesting a suspension by the Government of the payment of a portion of its debt intended to have been made on the 1st of July next, or a statement of the arrangement made in relation to that subject?

"Answer. I have made no application to the Government, nor have I requested any suspension of the payment of any portion of the public debt.

"The inquiry, I presume, relates to this circumstance: I received a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 24th of March, 1832, informing me that the Government was about to issue a notice on the 1st of April, of their intention to pay, on the 1st of July next, one half of the three per cent. stock, and to do it by paying to each stockholder one-half the amount of his certificate. He added, 'If any objection occurs to you, either as to the amount, or as to the mode of payment, I will thank you to suggest it.'

"Thus invited by the Government, in a communication marked 'confidential,' to give my opinion on a measure contemplated by the Government, I felt it my duty to express my views of its probable operation. In my reply, therefore, dated the 29th of March, I stated 'that so far as the bank is concerned, no objection occurs to me, it being sufficient that the Government has the necessary amount of funds in the bank to make the contemplated payment.' I then proceeded to observe, that in the present situation of the mercantile community, and with a very large amount of revenue [amounting to nine millions] to be paid before the 1st of July, the debtors of the Government would require all the forbearance and all the aid which could be given to them; and that the payment proposed, by creating a demand for the remittance of several millions of dollars to the European stockholders, would tend to diminish the usual facilities afforded to the debtors of the Government, and might endanger the punctual payment. For this reason, I thought it for the interest of the Government to postpone the payment till the next quarter. I further stated, that the plan of paying to each stockholder only one-half of his loan would not be so acceptable as if his whole loan were repaid at once.

"Having thus performed my duty, in giving the opinion asked, I left it, of course, to the Government to decide. On the part of the bank, I sought nothing, and requested nothing. After weighing the circumstances, the Government were desirous of adopting the measure; but the difficulty I understood to be this, that the sinking fund would lose the quarter's interest, from July to October, of the sum intended to be paid in July, and that the Government did not feel itself justified in making the postponement, unless that interest could be saved; but that it would be made, provided the bank would make the sinking fund whole on the 1st of October. To this I said, that, as the bank would have the use of the fund during the three months, it would consent to save the sinking fund harmless, by paying the three months' interest itself. And so the matter stands.

"Now, it will be seen that, in all this, the bank has had not the least agency, except to offer its opinion, when it was asked, in regard to a measure proposed by the Government, and then to offer its aid in carrying that measure into operation."

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

"March 24, 1832.

"DEAR SIR: It is believed that the means of the Treasury will be sufficient to discharge one-half of the three per cents on the 1st of July next; and it is proposed to give notice accordingly on the 1st of April. It is not intended to determine by lot the certificates that are to be paid, but simply to pay one-half of each certificate, on presentation at the proper loan office.

"If any objection occurs to you, either as to the amount, or as to the mode of payment, I will thank you to suggest it.

"I shall be glad to be informed of the amount purchased under your direction, though I am not aware that it can have any influence upon the proposed measure. As the purchases will cease on the appearance of the notice, it may be as well for you to direct the account to be closed with the termination of the present month, and rendered to the Treasury for settlement.

"I am, dear sir, very sincerely and respectfully yours,

"N. BIDDLE, Esq."

"ASBURY DICKENS,

"Acting Secretary.

Did not this very gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] acting as the friend of the commercial community, interpose his own request to the Treasury, that it would stop the payment of this three per cent. stock? And was he the only gentleman unfriendly to the cause of the bank who pressed such a measure on the head of the Treasury? [After waiting for a reply, Mr. W. proceeded.] Yet we are told, and told, that the bank was unable to meet the payment of the stock on the 1st of July. I will now inquire what amount of the public debt the Government proposed to pay in 1832? According to my recollection, not 15,000,000. Probably about 10,000,000. It might be well enough, too, to inquire why, about three days after the adjournment of Congress, the Government engaged to pay 15,000,000, when they knew there would not be money enough in the treasury to meet it? It will not, of course, do for me to say that it was done purposely to embarrass the bank, and to add to the weight thrown against it by a certain very popular document. So much for the postponement of the three per cents.

As to the negotiations of the bank in Europe, I shall look into that subject when I shall have had time to examine the documents now submitted to us upon the call of the gentleman from New York. I cannot consent to append his document to mine, because I consider the one as peculiarly fitted for the use of political stock-jobbers, but the other adapted to enlighten and satisfy the commercial community in this country. The gentleman seems to fear the effect of having this document put into their hands, lest they should become satisfied as to the safety of their funds as at present deposited, and the Treasury should hear their voice thundering back a prohibition against their removal.

Mr. CAMBRELENG: There are many diseases in our land, besides the cholera; there are many kinds of fever; and among the rest there are political fevers, which have their premonitory symptoms in like manner. There is a disease which has been very prevalent in this country, and which has been remarked to rage most violently in those particular cities where the national bank has its branches established; it is called by some the bank fever. I do not myself know whether any gentleman of this House is or is not affected by this species of fever; but I have heard of one case of the bank running against a gentleman of this House, who found it a most formidable opponent indeed; so much so, that he was heard to express the hope that the Bank of the United States would not be set up as a candidate for the Presidency. This bank fever is said to prevail in certain other portions of the United States, and some symptoms of it are even said to have appeared in a certain gentleman—I do not know exactly where, but I believe somewhere beyond the mountains. I should like to be as much benefited by my premonitory, as I understand that that gentleman was.

Sir, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] talked about "stock-jobbing," and about "Wall street." I thank God that no one has yet been able to bring any imputation on me as a man of business. Whoever aims the blow, "our withers are unwrung;" but if the gentleman shall push the inquiry, he may perhaps discover that some of his own friends have been concerned in that business in a manner which deserves the censure of this House, and the reprobation of the country. I will give the gentleman facts, from the document published by his own authority, and yesterday brought into this House; and now to put aside at once the whole of what the gentleman from Kentucky has said, I ask the House to hear what the president of the bank himself says concerning the causes of the foreign negotiation of the bank for a loan of 5,000,000 dollars. It is true that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is lugged in; but, unluckily, the truth has displayed itself, in spite of all the ingenuity of the writer to conceal it, whoever he was.

"It is easy for the Government, when it has fifteen millions of revenue scattered over the whole country, to direct that, on a given day, so many millions shall be paid at a given place. But as in our moneyed system these millions are not accumulated in the bank, but lent out to be used by the citizens until they are wanted, the detail of thus withdrawing them from business requires the greatest precaution, or infinite injustice may be done to the community. It was with this view, and with this view exclusively, that the bank, in order to weaken the pressure of so exhausting a drain upon the country, at a period of general dismay, thought it would be useful to obtain the control of from three to five millions held in Europe, of most of which the bank was the agent, until the business of the country should have time to resume its usual course, and the community might recover from its confusion."

Now, men of business understand perfectly well what the means of the bank are in a time of public distress, though, unhappily, others do not. The means of a bank are, and must be, greater when there is a stagnation of business than when money is in rapid circulation. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, every bank will have surplus capital at such times. Now, if the Bank of the United States, at a time when the Western notes were not pressing upon it, was unable to meet the demands of the Government, and pay up the three per cents, when can it do so? Gentlemen may rely upon it, that the difficulties experienced by the bank next October, will, unless some efficient means shall be taken by this House to prevent it, be greater than they are now.

The world is now at peace; but within the next three months war may be lighted up, not only in Europe, but here also. May God, in his mercy, prevent it! May Heaven,

H. OF R.]

Bank of the United States.

in its infinite mercy, spare the blood of my countrymen! How will the bank be able to meet its engagements then, when it is unable to do it in a time of profound peace?

The gentleman referred to a transaction which happened at the time I was in Philadelphia. The president of the bank urged my colleague on the Bank Committee, the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McDuffie,] to write to the Secretary, requesting him to postpone the payment of the three per cents until October. That gentleman asked me whether I concurred in the request, and requested that I would also write. I did so, but I acted on the same ground which I take now. The bank had loaned out the deposits of the Government to the commercial community. As the evil was done, and the bank had overtraded, I did write to the Secretary in favor of the proposition; but I also stated my reasons, and they were the same which I now state to this House. I advised the postponement, in order that the commercial community might not be thrown into embarrassment on account of the mismanagement of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. WICKLIFFE: Before I proceed to make a few remarks in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman on the other side, I should like to know from that gentleman whether I am the individual west of the mountains to whom he alludes.

Mr. CAMBRELENG: I believe it was the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WICKLIFFE: Then I am happy to have this occasion of compelling the editor of the Government newspaper in this city of admitting into his columns, by a faithful report of this debate, a contradiction to his own propagated falsehood. I could not ask him to do it, and have not done so, because he refused, on a former occasion, to publish a contradiction, in respectful language, and by positive proof, of a falsehood published in the same paper against me. The gentleman from New York alluded in his remarks to an article which had its origin in that great national foundry of slander and calumny, which has been established within these ten miles square, called "The Globe." Upon inquiry, he will be unable to find that I have ever received, in any shape, favors from the Bank of the United States. I wish I could say the same of the gentleman, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] He, I believe, was employed by the bank to select a suitable site for a new branch of this bank in New York. What he received for the job, he best knows. A gentleman near me says $1,000. It is very true, that, having preferred principles to men, the interest of country to the mandate of party, or the advancement of unhallowed purposes, I differed from my party on the question of rechartering the Bank of the United States, and probably in that fact the motive must be found for assailing me in the article alluded to. Perhaps the gentleman may know more about this than I do. He who operates on a machine may usually be expected to be best acquainted with the reasons for its movements. The article reads as follows: I find it transferred into a kindred print, accredited to the Globe.

"Charles A. Wickliffe, of Louisville, Ky., has been appointed by the bank agent for collecting in Kentucky, with a compensation which will amount to at least $10,000 a year."

Allow me to say, here in my place, (and I say it in order that the declaration may find its place, through the report of debates, in the same place where the slander had its origin,) that the assertion here contained is utterly false in every part and particular. I never had any contract with the bank, in any form; I never had a moment's conversation with its directors, or its officers, or agents, on the subject of collecting the bank debts. Will the gentleman now withdraw his endorsement of the slander?

Mr. CAMBRELENG: I am very happy to hear that the gentleman has no connexion whatever with the Bank of the United States, and that what has been alleged against him is unfounded in truth.

Mr. WICKLIFFE: The gentleman wants an account of my election campaign. I could, were he in Kentucky, instruct him how we in the West ascertain public sentiment and enlighten its judgment. We do not do it there by force of committees and party discipline. We meet the falsehoods of a corrupt press, and their supporters, if they have any, openly, before an honest, intelligent people, discuss them, and put them down. That is the way we do things in Kentucky. It is very true that, in 1831, many of those who were opposed to my election urged that because I was friendly to General Jackson, and that he was against the bank, it would not be safe to elect me; and what said the friends of the administration then? General Jackson is not opposed to the bank. He is in favor of the bank; he will recharter it with proper modifications. Sir, we once met there very much as the "Hickory Club" did the other night in this city, (I have got a list of them here before me,) and we drank toasts too. I soon saw what the game was going to be—I saw the bill of sale which was to transfer the Jackson party in my district—the gentleman knows to whom. I did not like the bill of sale; I chose to have a privilege which every slaveholder in our country allows to the slave he is going to sell—the privilege of choosing his own master.

In answer to the allusion made to myself on one of these occasions, I said, jocularly, that I hoped the bank would not run for Congress. Is the gentleman satisfied now?

Mr. CAMBRELENG: Not entirely.

Mr. WICKLIFFE: So much for the gentleman's allusion to myself; and I am glad that the refutation will find its way into those papers where, save in reports of the debates of the day, it never else would find a place.

I have nothing more against appending the two reports to each other, than what I have already said. I think the gentleman's document better suited to politicians than to the sober business part of the community. I am not myself in the habit of bringing forward newspaper slang against gentlemen in this House. I made no imputation against the gentleman on the subject of stock-jobbing, though the materials are before me. I leave that subject between him and his constituent, who has preferred the accusation. I only said that one of these documents would convince the really reflecting business men of the country that the national bank was a safe depository for the national funds, at least safer than certain State banks; while the other was more suited to the political part of the community.

I remarked, at first, that this whole affair had been got up as a pretext for withdrawing the Government deposits from the existing bank. I do not believe that there is a member of this House who will rise in his place and say that he believes the bank has manifested any inability to

Mr. WICKLIFFE was misunderstood by the reporter, as it would appear from the article in the Globe. He did not say that the editor of the Globe had refused to do him justice, by admitting a contradiction of the statements above in his paper, but said that on a former occasion, when injustice had been done him in the columns of that paper, he had been denied the privilege of self-defence. meet the demands and wants of the Government, or that he is satisfied it is no longer a safe depository for the national funds. No man has yet said that; and I am confident no honorable man will say it. As to this document, I will give the gentleman from New York all the benefit he can make out of it. I shall send to my constituents that which I believe they will have time to read. I do not want another such document as the Bank Committee's report of last year—a volume so formidable in its outside appearance, that no man will have the courage to attempt to get through it; the consequence was, that each man believed the account of the matter which he found in his own paper; insomuch, that it is doubtful whether the whole truth of this matter had ever been published at all. One thing is certain, that no administration paper in the country has ever published this testimony of Mr. Biddle, or the proof that the gentleman from New York himself applied to the Treasury to have the payment of the three per cent. stock suspended. I, myself, knew long ago that the action of the bank was in perfect accordance with the wishes of the Treasury, and thought it was the gentleman himself, and his friends, who pressed the Secretary to suspend the payment of the stock; yet the gentleman stands here and says that the bank begged for time.

Mr. CAMBRELENG: As the gentleman from Kentucky appears so desirous of showing one side only of this question to his constituents, and keeping back the other, with a view to the gentleman's accommodation, I will withdraw the motion I made for connecting the two documents, and consent that they shall be printed separately.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SPEIGHT, went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TAYLOR in the chair; and the question being on Mr. WATMOUGH's motion to amend the resolution of Mr. SPEIGHT, so as to refer so much of the President's message as related to the Bank of the United States to the Committee of Ways and Means—

Mr. WATMOUGH said he felt himself bound to adhere to the amendment he had proposed, and at the same time must express his regret at the continuance of this debate. He had yesterday refrained from stating his views to the committee, from a consideration that no good could result from retarding the action of the House, and delaying thereby the many important matters of public business which were before it, and which must be acted on in a short session of Congress. He repeated his conviction that no desirable result was to be obtained by the debate. Statements were made on one side, which were necessary to be rebutted on the other; and a feeling of excitement was originated which had no natural connexion with the matter under consideration. He earnestly urged the committee to come to a decision on the subject, and to have the whole of the document before the House. His own course in the business was plain: he was there as the organ of his constituents, and their opinions had not only been expressed to him individually, but promulgated to the world. Mr. W. here alluded to a remark made on a former day, that he was the advocate of the bank; and observed that, although he was anxious not to offend either the personal or party feelings of any one, yet he must disclaim the imputation which the terms conveyed. On the subject of the bank he had formed his own opinions, as he had an undoubted right to do; and, in accordance with these opinions, he had always acted, and always should act. But he appeared in that House not as the advocate of the bank, but as one of the representatives of the people; as a representative more immediately of the people among whom the bank is situated, with whom most of the directors of that institution were brought up and resided, and to whom those directors were personally known. He concluded by repeating that he could not withdraw the amendment which he had proposed.

Mr. WAYNE, of Georgia, explained, in a very urbane manner, the sense in which he had used the words alluded to. He disclaimed all idea of using them in an invidious sense, as he trusted all who knew both him and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATMOUGH] must be aware.

Mr. WATMOUGH was fully satisfied with the explanation, and, indeed, should not have adverted to the circumstance but from a sense of what might be thought due to his constituents.

Mr. SPEIGHT was sorry that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATMOUGH] had deemed it necessary to make another bank speech this morning; but to avoid a prolongation of the discussion, he would accept the proposed amendment. He (Mr. S.) had, indeed, been of opinion, when he adopted the series of resolutions, that the subject should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; but the consideration which he had formerly stated, of the extent and importance of the business which would come before that committee, had induced him to change its reference, and move for a select committee, which would have full time to devote to the matter.

The resolution was then modified, so as to read, that so much of the message as relates to the Bank of the United States be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The twelfth resolution was that it be

Resolved, That so much of said message as recommends an amendment of the constitution in relation to the election of President and Vice President, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. ROOT observed that, upon this subject, the President had, during four successive years, expressed an opinion in his annual communication to Congress. Their attention had been repeatedly called to this important question by the Executive; and he (Mr. R.) had, on the 2d of March last, submitted to the House a series of resolutions in relation to it. At that time he had made a proposition, for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendation of the President. The resolutions were committed to a Committee of the Whole House, which was ultimately discharged from their consideration, and the subject was referred to a select committee. That committee presented a report, and the report and the subject were sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The whole question, therefore, stood at present within the control of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and he wished the House to understand that it was his intention to call their attention to the report and resolutions. As it was unnecessary for him to dwell further upon the subject now, he should conclude the few remarks he had deemed it necessary to offer, by submitting an amendment to refer that part of the President's message which adverted to the election of President and Vice President, and also an amendment to the tenure of their offices, to the same Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to which the resolutions offered on the subject, on the 2d of March, 1832, had been committed.

Mr. SPEIGHT accepted the amendment as a modification of the original resolution, and it was agreed to by the committee.

The other resolutions, as annexed, were then agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL offered a resolution, that so much of the message as relates to the exercise of doubtful powers, be referred to a select committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. SPEIGHT, the committee then rose and reported the resolutions to the House.

In the House, Mr. POLK moved to amend by striking out the words "bank stock," and inserting, so as to include all stocks held by the Government in incorporated companies, to the Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. P. shortly stated the reasons which had induced him to move the amendment; and contended that though the bill for subscribing the stock in question originated in the Committee of Internal Improvement or the Committee of Ways and Means, yet the subject was one strictly of revenue; and its proper distribution, therefore, was to the Finance Committee.

Mr. MERCER said he felt it his duty to repeat the remarks he had made on a former day. That part of the President's message, to which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee had offered an amendment, was a suggestion that an undue influence might arise from the possession of shares of stock in incorporated companies. It was not a suggestion that the revenue was wanted which would arise from the sale of the shares then held by the Government. If this had been the case, nothing would have been more appropriate than the reference of the subject to the Finance Committee: but the inquiry was of a different character, and the Committee of Ways and Means had not the opportunity of answering it. Might not that committee, which was acquainted with the nature of this kind of property, and of the influence arising out of it, as well as what it would be worth if brought into the market; ought not such a committee, he would ask, be supposed to be best qualified to decide as to the expediency of continuing the Government investments in such property? He hoped it would be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the paramount question appeared to him to be whether the funds of the Government should be invested in the kind of property alluded to. It did not relate to the value of the present stock it held in incorporated companies, nor had it any reference to roads and canals: it was formally a question of finance, a question as to the employment of the funds of the Government. For his own part, he thought the principle on which they were applied to the purchase of shares of stock in any incorporated companies was a bad one, and that the Government ought not so to apply its funds: but be that as it might, it was evidently a question of finance, and therefore should go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MERCER said the gentleman from New York did not apparently see that there might be reasons for selling bank stock held by the Government, wholly inapplicable to the stock it had in roads and canals. The influence derived from the one was altogether different from that which was derived from the other. The power of promoting works of improvement and public utility, by subscription for shares of stock, was a circumstance which rendered it entirely distinct from the purchase of bank stock. But the gentleman had evidently prejudged the question, for he had declared his opinion that Government should not have any shares of stock in incorporated companies. He (Mr. M.) thought, under all the considerations which he had suggested, there was a peculiar propriety in referring the subject to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CAMBRELENG briefly replied, after which,

Mr. ELLSWORTH said, it appeared to him that the disposition of this question was intimately connected with that of another question; namely, whether the Government should make any further investments of its funds for the improvement of the country. It could hardly be supposed, if they came to the determination to sell the stock they then held, that they would, in future, make any new investments of this character. For this reason, he thought the subject should be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. He should not then say whether he thought this employment of the Government funds politic or impolitic; but if an examination was to take place, with a view to an ultimate decision of the question, he thought the committee he had just named was particularly qualified to carry on the examination, and to lay before the House all the information which could be obtained on the subject. If he could regard it as a mere question of finance, it might as well, perhaps better, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. But he looked upon it in a different light, and should, therefore, support its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The debate was further continued by Mr. POLK, who pursued his former argument, that the stocks subscribed for by the United States were matters of revenue, and, as such, the consideration of them appertained to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MERCER replied; and the yeas and nays being taken on the call of Mr. JARVIS, the motion was agreed to by a vote of 91 to 77.

Mr. STEWART asked if it would be in order to insert the words, "except canal stock," so as to except that description of stock.

The amendment was decided to be out of order.

Upon the seventh resolution, a question of order arose as to whether the decision of the House, on the fourth resolution, had not fixed the destination of the subject.

After some remarks from Mr. MARSHALL, Mr. MERCER, and Mr. POLK,

Mr. POLK moved to strike it out of the series; but before a decision was arrived at, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14.

COIN AND BULLION.

Mr. ROOT offered the following:

Whereas, by the act of the 2d of April, 1792, establishing a mint, and regulating the coins of the United States, the American dollar, of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, was required to contain 371.25 grains of pure, and 416 grains of standard silver; and the American eagle, of the value of ten dollars, was required to contain 247.5 grains of pure, and 270 grains of standard gold: and, by the same act, the relative value between silver and gold was fixed at 15 to one: "that is to say, every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value, in all payments, with one pound weight of pure gold."

And whereas, the relative value of gold and silver bullion has, since that time, materially varied in the principal commercial countries of Europe and in the United States, and it being desirable that Congress be advised of the extent of that variation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the director of the mint do report to this House, as far as it is in his power, the present relative value of gold and silver bullion, in the principal countries of Europe and the United States; that is to say, if 371.25 grains of pure silver is worth one dollar, what is the value of the same weight of pure gold?

Resolved, That the said director do report to this House his opinion of the degree of fineness, or proportion of alloy, the best fitted, in gold coins, to give durability and continued brightness to the metal; and, also, his opinion what is the most suitable metal for that alloy.

Mr. R. supported the resolutions, by stating a number of facts in relation to the past and present quality of our coins in point of fineness, and of their relative value to each other. That of gold to silver had formerly been as fifteen to one, but it had now got to be as sixteen to one. The intended effect of the measure he proposed would be to prevent the gold coins of the United States from being more valuable as bullion than as coin, and consequently ceasing to be a part of the circulating medium of the country.

The resolutions were agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House having resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the reference of various parts of the President's message.

The question being on an additional resolution, (the fifteenth,) moved by Mr. DANIEL, in committee, which referred so much of the message as related to the exercise of doubtful powers by Congress to a select committee—

Mr. SPEIGHT suggested that the gentleman had better insert his proposition as an amendment to the seventh resolution, so as to make that resolution read:

Resolved, That so much of the said message as recommends an amendment of the constitution in relation to internal improvements, and the reducing the same to some fixed and certain rule, and the exercise by Congress of doubtful powers, be referred to a select committee."

Mr. DANIEL replied, with good-humored irony, that, as the gentleman's views were usually sound and wholesome, he would take his advice.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he did not know that the President had recommended the exercise of doubtful powers by Congress.

Mr. DANIEL then modified the resolution so as to read "and so much as relates to the exercise," &c.

Mr. MERCER thought it would be best to strike out the clause. He had thought, at first, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] had been intending only the indulgence of a vein of humor; but he perceived that it was otherwise, and he thought that the subject was a very proper subject of reference. The question whether, before any power is exercised by Congress, which some gentlemen considered as doubtful, resort must be had to a convention of three-fourths of all the people of the United States, was certainly a subject that might very properly be referred to a committee of that House. It furnished a subject of serious consideration. Yet its seriousness arose more from the high source from which such a suggestion had proceeded, than from any thing else. He apprehended that if Congress were never to exercise any power which had been doubted until two-thirds of the people of the Union had been called upon to decide the question, their path from darkness to day would be long and difficult, and would be very seldom travelled. Mr. M. objected to coupling this clause with that in relation to internal improvements; it seemed to imply an affinity between the two subjects which he was disposed to dissolve.

Mr. POLK moved to strike out the words "and the exercise by Congress of doubtful powers." The President's message suggested the propriety of dissipating all doubt about the constitutionality of works of improvements as conducted by the General Government. When the gentleman from Kentucky moved his resolution about doubtful powers, Mr. P. had supposed, as other gentlemen seemed to have done, that it had been done merely in sport: if he had not, he should have opposed the resolution.

[Here some desultory discussion arose on the question, whether it would be in order to receive Mr. POLK's amendment, and the Chair was understood as pronouncing it to be in order.]

Mr. DANIEL said he could assure the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] that in making the motion he had done, he had been entirely in earnest. The gentleman was mistaken, if he supposed Mr. D. came to that House for the purpose of making sport with so important a part of the message of the Executive. His object had been to ascertain what powers the President considered as "doubtful powers," and what not, in order that Congress might not exercise them against his will. It had been his desire, if he could be so fortunate as to get upon the committee, to hunt out the President's opinion, if it were possible to discover what that opinion was, on points of constitutional law. That had been his wish, and that was his purpose in offering the resolution. Was this sporting with the House? He was now, however, apprehensive that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPEIGHT] had got his resolution into a state that he would be unable to do what he intended. He wanted to have examined the various communications of the Executive to that House at different times, and also the expressions of his opinions out of doors; because he was well aware that the expression of an opinion by the President that he doubted the constitutionality of any particular power rendered that a "doubtful power," and that power ought not, therefore, to be exercised by Congress. For example, he desired particularly to know what was the opinion of the President on the repeal of the 25th section of the Judiciary act; this he hoped to get from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] who was said to be very intimate at the White House. He wished farther to know how far a State might act in regard to its own internal police. He wished to get at these Executive opinions, as they were to be gathered from declarations public or private, and, among other things, from the proclamation of the Executive. He thought that if this could be ascertained, the Union, instead of being dissolved, might be preserved, if the House would only declare how far a State might go. His wish was to save this Union from civil war, and from foreign war also, which was not unlikely to be excited by the course the President was pursuing. He would have desired to make a report upon this subject—upon the subject of internal improvements also. He wished it settled exactly how far the House might go, so that vetoes should cease. The House must not run counter to the President's opinions on constitutional law, provided it could discover what those opinions were. That which Mr. D. had thought to be perfectly constitutional, he now found to be "doubtful." He wanted to find out just how far Congress might go. The President had declared in his message that no power ought to be exercised if one-fourth part of the States believed it to be unconstitutional; all such were "doubtful powers," and should by no means be exercised. Mr. D. said that in this he fully accorded with the President. All such questions ought to be referred to the people. It was the exercise of these "doubtful powers" which had occasioned so much excitement in some of the States. It was the people who were the proper members of the constitution: they were its authors, and they could modify it at pleasure. Mr. D. was anxious to obtain a report which should show how far the exercise of "doubtful powers" had produced the public discontents. The people would never complain of having these questions submitted to them; especially questions which were in danger of dissolving the Union. Mr. D., however, said, that he was as much opposed to the exercise of "doubtful powers" by the Executive as by Congress. He thought the question ought to be referred to the people, when a large portion of the country was dissatisfied with the exercise of even constitutional powers. These were his motives for offering the resolution he had offered. This was not sporting with the President's message. He believed it was a most important subject for reference. The powers of the States ought to be investigated.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said that he believed the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DANIEL] had been more candid in his exposé than he had intended to be. The resolution, it seemed, was intended as a cut at the President. Now, Mr. F. considered it as looking just the other way. To him it appeared as containing a severe reflection on the conduct of both Houses of Congress in the exercise of doubtful powers. If the gentleman wished to examine what were the opinions of the President; if the House of Representatives was to be occupied in the very becoming and dignified employment of sending about in all quarters to pick up declarations of the Executive opinions, he thought the most suitable course would be to appoint a committee, not of the members of this House, but of the editors of newspapers, as that class of persons was usually very busy in a similar way. This was no part of the Executive message. How would such a resolution look? Or how would the report appear, which the gentleman wished to produce by it? A committee gravely reporting to the House that they had discovered that, at such a certain time, the President had expressed one opinion, and, at another time, that he had expressed such and such other opinions. Did the gentleman wish to give the committee power to send for persons and papers? Or did he propose to employ a corps of spies, or of those letter writers who were swarming in this city? This would be dignified indeed! The gentleman had told the House that if he should be so fortunate as to get upon the select committee, this would be what he should do. If this was to be the business of the committee, Mr. F. (though not apprehensive of being selected) begged in advance to be excused from serving upon it. He hoped the object in view would be stated a little more definitely.

The President's Message.

As to the other part of the gentleman's designs, he joined heartily in it. He should wish to see what were the powers possessed by different branches of this Government. He wished to see a report which should point out those doubtful powers, the exercise of which was bearing on this Government with accelerated velocity to ruin; powers, the exercise of which the States would not much longer brook. There were far too many doubtful powers exercised by Congress. He hoped the House would stop in a course which was the downward course to ruin.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, said that, with a view of putting an end to this discussion, which he considered as premature, he would move to strike out so much of the resolution as related to the subject of internal improvement, which had already been referred to the committee charged with the subject.

The CHAIR replied that this would not be in order, as the House had adopted one part of the resolution.

Mr. STEWART said there was no need of referring any part of the message to a select committee, with a view of getting at the opinions of the President, as to doubtful powers. Whoever read the proclamation recently put forth by the Executive could have no doubt as to what were the President's opinions on the constitutional powers of this Government; that document left no room for any man to doubt. The views there given were perfectly sound and orthodox. He considered the whole paper as one of the most able, lucid, sound arguments he had ever seen. On those principles alone could this Government ever be preserved. The gentleman from Georgia had told the House that the exercise of doubtful powers had brought this Government to the brink of ruin. Mr. S. thought, on the contrary, that it was the doctrines held by that gentleman himself, and by those who agreed with him, and which were triumphantly refuted in the proclamation, which had brought the Government into danger. It was the doctrine of State rights, a doctrine which left the General Government powerless and useless, which had brought the Government to the brink of ruin. These doctrines had been widely diffused over the country; and wherever they came, they operated like poison on the body politic. The doctrine was impracticable; it was a doctrine under which this Government could never get along. It was the doctrine alone put forth in the Executive proclamation, which could save the Government, and enable it to continue its functions. He was rejoiced to see that doctrine promulgated under the great seal. He trusted it would be sustained by the nation, and would furnish a text-book for aftertimes. He trusted that the people, of all parties, would rally as one man round the President, and sustain him in all constitutional measures to enforce the laws, and preserve the Union. He then moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

On this question Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, demanded the yeas and nays. They were taken accordingly, and stood as follows: Yeas, 59; nays, 118.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. POLK said that he had not anticipated such a debate as now seemed likely to arise on a mere incidental question. The clause of the message, which had reference to the exercise of doubtful powers, only spoke of those powers as connected with the subject of internal improvement. Mr. P. was unwilling to be responsible for the debate, and, therefore, consented to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DANIEL said as the motion had been withdrawn, he had nothing to say but to express his astonishment that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] should express his approbation of the proclamation of the President. Had that gentleman reflected whether the constitution was established by the people of the United States, or by those of the States? That proclamation contained the very essence of the doctrine of consolidation. He was anxious to know whether the House approved of the principles set forth in that paper, in which an individual was singled out for martyrdom. He wished to learn whether the House were disposed to bring on a civil war. Why should the nation involve itself in a civil war? If any State wished to quit the Union, why, in God's name, shall she not be permitted to go in peace?

Mr. POLK called Mr. DANIEL to order. He was proceeding to remark on a paper not before the House, and which had no connexion with the subject before the House.

The CHAIR read the resolution before the House, and said that he could not decide whether the gentleman from Kentucky was in order until he proceeded farther in his remarks.

Mr. POLK said the gentleman was going to discuss the President's proclamation.

The CHAIR said that that would not be in order.

Mr. DANIEL said that he regretted that he should be found transcending the boundaries of order, in the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee, who was, he knew, a great judge of order, and himself a very orderly member of the House. He regretted that such a gentleman should consider him out of order. He was about to express his regret that any member of that House should declare himself satisfied with all the sentiments contained in that proclamation—a proclamation that declares that a Representative was not the Representative of his own constituents, but of—

The CHAIR decided the gentleman to be out of order. The proclamation was not before the House, and the discussion of it was irrelevant to the subject proposed for the action of the House.

Mr. DANIEL said he had intended to discuss the subject of doubtful powers; and was going to bring in to his aid the opinions of the President, as expressed in a certain paper. He had been going to ask, whether the doctrine that a Representative was a Representative, not of his own constituents, but of the whole people of the United States, was a doctrine that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would contend for? and whether the gentleman approved the doctrine that the constitution was formed by the people, not in separate communities, but as an aggregate? If the gentleman from Pennsylvania agreed to such sentiments, then Mr. D. disagreed with him in toto. He regretted that any member of the House should agree to such notions; to him they appeared to be the very essence of consolidation. They had been so considered, and so represented by all the republicans who figured on the theatre at the time the constitution was adopted. Mr. D. said he was in favor of a resolution that would bring these questions up; that if these were doubtful powers, they might be stated; especially (if the Chair pleased) on the subject of internal improvement.

He said he had been arguing in favor of the reference he had moved. The message laid down the general position that no power should be exercised by Congress whenever one-fourth of the people of the Union were opposed to it. He was desirous of having a report on this doctrine, in order to prevent civil war and disunion. He hoped Congress would take up the subject, and settle it. He had seen a paper purporting to be a proclamation, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania said he approved. He supposed the gentleman approved, too, that a single individual should be singled out for martyrdom; and that an endeavor should be made to excite one part of the Union against another part of it: It was high time, indeed, that Congress should act.

So far as the President recommended peace and harmony, Mr. D. went with him. But if any one of the States chose to go off from the confederacy, in God's name let it go in peace. He would not be for whipping it in. Let them part in harmony, and with good feeling. These were his opinions.

The CHAIR said he could not permit such a discussion to proceed; it was entirely out of order.

Mr. DANIEL said he was discussing the subject of internal improvement, and discussing it as calmly as he could.

The CHAIR pronounced Mr. D. to be out of order. He was discussing subjects not before the House.

Mr. D. said he had no disposition to transcend the limits of order; and as he was contradicted, by the Chair, he supposed he must submit. He would, however, say to the honorable Speaker, that he understood what was the question before the House; he stood in need of no information on that subject. He was in favor of the reference of this part of the message to a select committee, because he thought it would bring up the whole subject of doubtful powers generally. To get at that subject, he had acceded to the proposal of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPENCER], to offer his resolution in the form of an amendment. He was now told he could not go on to discuss the subject of doubtful powers, though the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] had done the same, and was not called to order for it. It seemed, however, that he could not be permitted to refer to the opinions of distinguished individuals, by way of illustration of his opinions. The gentleman from Georgia had said that discontent and disunion followed the exercise of doubtful powers. He had followed in the gentleman's wake, and believed as that gentleman did, that the exercise of these powers would lead to bad consequences. In illustration of this sentiment, he had referred to the proclamation of the President, and had been about to discuss that document with this view.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to do so.

Mr. D. then observed that, if he was declared out of order by the Chair, he would take his seat. And he sat down.

Mr. STEWART observed, he had not said that he approved of every thing that was contained in the proclamation; he had only said that he approved of all the constitutional doctrines there set forth—he approved of the doctrine of the proclamation as to the powers of the Government.

The CHAIR said it was not in order now to discuss that document.

Mr. STEWART said he was only explaining to the House and to the nation what he had declared, what he meant to declare, and what he was ready to stand by and defend here and elsewhere.

Mr. VINTON called Mr. STEWART to order.

After some explanations between those gentlemen and the Chair, Mr. McDUFFIE said that there was, no doubt, some misapprehension of the question of order. He regretted that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been deprived of the opportunity of pronouncing an eulogium on a document which, in Mr. McD's opinion, laid low the liberties of the country.

The CHAIR said the subject of the proclamation could not now be discussed, save by special leave of the House.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he was not going into the discussion, but he must be permitted to say a single word. He rejoiced that the doctrines of that instrument had not received the ratification of that House; if they had, he should regard the liberties of the country as at an end.

Mr. ARCHER said the gentleman from South Carolina would have, before long, an opportunity of discussing the subject.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied, that he had not sought the occasion of doing so.

The resolution was then agreed to, and the select committee ordered to consist of seven members.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15.

This day was spent in disposing of resolutions and acting on private bills.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 17.

FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. VERPLANCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report what law or other regulation may be necessary for diminishing the annual expenses of holding the Supreme, Circuit, and District Courts of the United States, &c. including the contingent charges of the Judiciary establishment, and the expenses of suits and prosecutions chargeable to the United States.

Mr. V. said that this resolution was offered in consequence of an item in the bill just reported by himself. That bill contained an additional appropriation for the various expenses of the courts of the United States, and of suits and prosecutions chargeable to Government during the present year, in addition to the annual appropriation made for that purpose at the last session. As that appropriation was now exhausted, and as a further grant seemed absolutely necessary for the ordinary operation of the courts, the committee had no hesitation in now recommending the allowance of the sum requested by the department. But in examining the causes of the deficiency, and comparing the expenses of several years last past, they had perceived that for several years there has been a large and continual increase of these expenses; and this, so far as they could ascertain from circumstances, on which the Treasury Department could have little or no control. One large item of this increase was in the District of Columbia. The special committee who had prepared, and were about to report a code for the government of this district, (as the Committee of Ways and Means were informed,) were about to propose a remedy for this evil. The committee, in the hope that a similar remedy might be extended to the general judicial system, had determined to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the subject in a special manner.

The resolution was agreed to.

LIEN LAWS.

French and Spanish Land Claims.

Mr. WASHINGTON said that the bill had been brought forward last session. The measure which it advocated was one which had met with the universal approbation of the mechanics and tradesmen of the city of Washington. It was a bill projected for the purpose of protecting those persons and others of the city from a species of fraud which had been frequently practised upon them by persons, whose affairs were in a state of bankruptcy, purchasing land on mortgage, building upon it, and then selling the property, leaving the workmen and those who supplied the building materials unpaid. The bill had been prepared with great care and attention, at the unanimous request of the people of Washington city; and, in the framing of it, it was endeavored so to do it that every class might be provided for; and it was done at the instance of men of respectability. The city had been liable to great impositions. Owing to the circumstances of its being the seat of Government, and other causes, persons had come to it from all parts of the globe; adventurers had undertaken contracts which they were unable to fulfil, and thus brought ruin upon themselves and others. For the injury done the adventurers cared but little; many of them had no characters to lose; and all they had to do was to try their fortunes elsewhere; but, whilst speculators might come to the city, and undertake work, frequently absconding and leaving the demands of both the tradesman and the mechanic unsatisfied, it seemed to him to be requisite that the mechanic and tradesman should have security against this species of fraud.

Mr. SPEIGHT said the object of the bill met his concurrence. It had been well known that persons in this city, who were bankrupts, had employed honest, hard-working mechanics upon buildings, which, when completed, had been disposed of in a manner which deprived those who had done the labor and furnished the materials of all means of obtaining compensation.

Mr. SEMMES said the bill had been drawn by the late Mr. Doddridge, with great care and pains, after examining similar provisions made by the laws of several of the States. Among the honest citizens of this city there probably was not a dissenting voice as to the necessity of such a law. This city had attracted adventurers from every quarter, who had neither character nor property at stake: after building houses, they had disposed of them, and left the mechanics and those who furnished the materials to suffer. Mr. S. thought if gentlemen would examine the bill as amended, no dissenting voice would be heard as to the propriety of its becoming a law.

Mr. ROOT said he believed the gentleman was mistaken as to one fact in what he had said relative to the operation and extent of the lien laws. The gentleman had said that the law proposed in the bill, then offered to the House, was the same as those of New York and Philadelphia. Of the existence of such a law in Philadelphia, he (Mr. R.) had heard; he did not know if it was so; but as to the State of New York, he did know that application had been made for the passage of such a law, and to apply it to the cities and villages, as well as to the city of New York; but the applicants failed of success. With the details of the present bill he was unacquainted; nor had he been able to ascertain precisely what they were, although the bill had been read by the clerk. As far as he understood, however, it was proposed to give to the laborers, as well as to those who furnished the materials, a lien on the houses which they built; which mortgage was to remain for a definite time—for two or three years; and whosoever purchased the house was bound to pay up all this variety of mortgages, from the pane of glass in the windows to the hob-nail driven into the wall. Such a law would not be for the interest either of the mechanic or the proprietor, whilst it would injure the purchaser, and stop the growth of the city, if property should be thus encumbered. Other laborers had no such security. He believed the lots of the city were sufficiently mortgaged already to admonish purchasers, without superadding mortgages on the nails, glass, and hinges, as well as the shingles and timber, with which the houses were erected. And how were the purchasers to know how many mortgages a house was encumbered with? He did not know that any provision was made in the bill for registering these mortgages. If there was not, how were purchasers to be advised as to the responsibilities they had to assume? The mortgages on the lots might be ascertained from the city registry, or the records of the courts. He did not know what provision, or if any, was made in the present bill, on this subject. He was sure that the bill was unnecessary. Public expediency did not require it. He knew it was said that the people of the District, at least of one part, had made application for the bill to pass. But it should be recollected that, in other parts of the District, the people had voted that they would have no self-government; no voice in the management of their own affairs; that they would not have a Representative on that floor; neither would they go back again to the States; but would keep in a state of incapacity to manage their own affairs, and let Congress have the entire management. He should suppose, therefore, after such a vote, that the suggestion concerning the will of the people of this District themselves ought not to be regarded, but that the subject ought to be taken up on the general view, whether or not the measure could be beneficial to the District. He (Mr. R.) thought it would be an incumbrance to builders, and an objection to purchasing any house until after the lapse of the time when the purchaser might come in, secure from a mortgage on his purchase, for a pane of glass or a hundred four-penny nails.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said that, so far as his constituents were concerned, the bill before the House, creating a lien in the District of Columbia in favor of mechanics and persons furnishing building materials, was of little importance: it went, however, to establish the principle that he most cordially approved; and in support of the bill gave the following, among other reasons, why it ought to be passed:

1. It was a scriptural precept that the laborer was worthy of his hire; and, by giving him the benefit of a lien law, we furnish him with the most certain means of obtaining a sure return for his industry.

2. He was an advocate for the bill because it had been tried, and found so beneficial to the working class in the city of Philadelphia, that its provisions had been extended by the Legislature of Pennsylvania to the interior cities and most of the boroughs of that commonwealth.

3. He contended, also, that the passage of such a law did not sanction a novel project, but went to sustain one that had been adopted in many of the States, and had, therefore, an enlightened experience to rest its well-attested claims on.

4. He said the bill, if it should receive the sanction of Congress, would add greatly to the growth and prosperity of the District of Columbia, as it would encourage lumber merchants and other individuals having the materials on hand, and mechanics who wished to be employed in a safe business, to make contracts for improving the city, by building without delay.

5. This bill, he contended, would put it out of the power of the speculator to take advantage of the mechanics; and instead of reposing, as they have to do now, upon the faith of the contractors, they will have the protection of the lien law for their safety.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for its third reading.

FRENCH AND SPANISH LAND CLAIMS.

A bill reported last session from the Committee on the Public Lands, to prevent the confirmation of fraudulent French and Spanish land claims, coming up in course, Mr. WHITE, of Florida, moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WICKLIFFE opposed the motion, and was desirous that it might be at once ordered to a third reading. He insisted on the necessity of such a bill to the protection of the public domain, and the propriety of its being passed as early as practicable, as the grants to which it related were now in a course of adjudication. He repudiated the doctrine that the written grant for land by a Spanish sub-delegate or Governor was per se, and on its face, prima facie evidence of the right of such Governor to make the grant. This must be shown by the claimant.

Mr. WHITE insisted on his motion to commit the bill, which he considered as involving the validity of treaties, and of the decisions of the Supreme Court; as the bill concerned the rights of American citizens claiming under treaties with foreign Governments, the question involved pertained to the Judiciary Committee, and not to the Committee on the Public Lands. The bill was misnamed: it was not to prevent fraudulent grants, but to prevent the confirmation of good and bona fide claims. The principle objected to by the gentleman from Kentucky had been solemnly decided on by the Supreme Court, and the bill went in fact to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WICKLIFFE insisted that the bill was a bill to nullify private speculation. It could not overturn grants already confirmed, but prevent the confirmation of unfounded claims in future. He further insisted on the principles he had before advanced, and stated the danger of admitting grants for millions of acres as valid, when there was no law of Spain giving the Governors power to make such grants.

Mr. PLUMMER said he had never heard of the bill, though he was a member of the Committee on Public Lands, until it had been reported by the gentleman from Kentucky. He expressed his views as coinciding with those stated by Mr. WHITE, and agreed with him that the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, took a similar view of the subject, and dwelt on the hardship of requiring a claimant to prove what no claimant ever could prove, and thus deprive him of his land.

Mr. IRVIN replied to Mr. PLUMMER's remarks as to the bill's being new to him. The subject of this bill had often been a matter of discussion before the committee, though the gentleman might not have been present.

Mr. WICKLIFFE repelled what he considered as an insinuation that he had brought the bill surreptitiously into the House, and still farther insisted on the propriety and necessity of requiring claimants to show the power of the Governor from the laws of Spain, called "the Laws of the Indies."

The debate was further continued by Messrs. WHITE and PLUMMER, the Chair several times interposing to prevent its being turned aside upon the merits of the bill; when, the question being taken, Mr. WHITE's motion prevailed, and the bill was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 18.

SESSION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. BOON, of Indiana, having been read—

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing and graduating the price of such of the public lands of the United States as shall or may have been five years subject to sale at private entry; and also to inquire into the expediency of surrendering the refuse public lands, after a given period, to the States respectively in which they are situated.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, offered the following amendment, viz: to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert—

"That it is not expedient for the Government of the United States to surrender the right which all the States have to an equal share of the public lands; and that until some equal mode of distribution shall have been adopted, it is not expedient to modify or change the present system for disposing of the public lands in any manner so as to deprive all the States of their just proportion of the same."

Mr. BOON observed that, as the object he had in view, in offering the resolution, had been substantially accomplished by the reference of the subject generally to the Committee on the Public Lands, he would withdraw the resolution. Of course, the amendment fell with it.

The following resolutions, offered by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, were then read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of such portion of the public lands as have been offered at public sale, and have remained unsold for the period of five years and upwards.

Resolved, further, That said committee inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the respective States, in which they are situated, such portions of the public lands as may have been offered at public sale, and, being subject to private entry, have remained unsold for the period of ten years.

Mr. WILLIAMS thereupon offered the same amendment he had before proposed to the resolution offered by Mr. BOON.

Mr. CLAY said, that as the gentleman who had offered the amendment evinced no disposition to sustain it by argument, he felt himself called on, instead of following the example of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOON] by withdrawing his resolution, to offer a few words in its explanation and support. He was aware that the general subject to which the resolution referred had been, by the House, committed to the Committee on the Public Lands. But, the message of the President, as he understood that document, went to recommend a reduction of the price at which the public domain was now held, and the ultimate surrender of the same to the States in which it was situated; in addition to which he had had the honor of presenting to the House a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Alabama, asserting the propriety of the policy recommended by the Executive; and he had thought it proper, in pursuance of the object of both these recommendations, to draw up the resolution he had offered, and which differed from that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BOON,] chiefly, in that it was more specific. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] had asked, when this resolution had first been offered, why this unceasing demand was heard that the United States should surrender the public lands to the new States? Mr. C. was not aware that any unceasing demand had been made on the subject. It was true that the people and the Legislatures of the new States had again and again called upon the Government to mitigate the existing system in the disposal of the public domain. But this was the first time, within the last three years, that a proposition had been brought forward for a relinquishment of that domain to the States in which it lay. When Mr. C. had presented the resolution, he had observed that it would not be difficult to show reasons why the policy proposed as the object of inquiry should not only be inquired into, but adopted. He had then alluded to the disadvantages under which the new States labored, from having so large a portion of their soil held without the reach of their power of taxation. He would now add, that the policy recommended by the Executive, and by the Legislature of Alabama, would not only be highly advantageous to the new States, but of equal benefit to the General Government. The land held up by the present system was land which not only would not command the minimum price demanded by the Government, but which remained unsold, although it had been for ten years offered to settlers at private sale. Would the United States persevere ad infinitum in keeping up such a system? Mr. C. insisted that it would be better to sell the lands for what they were worth. He would now show, from documents which, he believed, few members of the House had examined, that a very large proportion of this land was not only not worth the minimum asked for it by the Government, but was wholly unfit for cultivation. When this was shown, could gentlemen be in favor of still holding up this land, at the very heavy cost annually incurred by the keeping up of the public land offices, none of which cost the Government less than 1,000 dollars a year, and many of which did not sell land to the amount of 100 dollars a year? He trusted not. He insisted it would be better to graduate the price of the land according to the time it had remained in market unsold, to the end that it might be purchased by individual settlers.

The same gentleman who now so strenuously resisted the present inquiry, had, with equal zeal, opposed various laws brought forward at a former session for the benefit of settlers; particularly the law extending the right of pre-emption, and the law allowing settlers who had forfeited their lands to purchase the same at a graduated value; both which laws had been attended with the most beneficial consequences, inasmuch that, although previously to the passage of those laws the annual amount of money derived from the sale of the public lands had rarely exceeded one million of dollars, it had during the first year since increased to two millions, and during the last year had risen to upwards of three millions. The gentleman would probably say, that the effect of those bills had been, that the land had sold at a less price than it otherwise would, and that the Government had received less money in proportion to the land sold. But such had not been the fact. There were documents on file which would disprove the assertion. The land sold within the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, during the three years previous to the session of 1829-30, had not averaged half a mill over the minimum price established by law. In the State of Alabama, even in the heart of the State, and in the most thickly settled part of the country, the average price had been $1 39 3-10ths; and during the year commencing the 29th of October, the average price in Ohio had been $1 26; in Indiana, the same; and in Missouri, Illinois, Mississippi, and Alabama, it had been just $1 25. Not one average had gone higher than $1 26 24-100. In Florida, where only 50,000 acres had been sold, the average had risen to $1 34 35-100. The price, since the passage of the bills he had referred to, had remained as before, but more money had been received into the treasury. Yet the gentleman from North Carolina had then told the House, that if those bills should pass, the whole landed system of the country would be broken up. The gentleman was as far wrong now, as he had been then. Could it be the true policy of this Government to keep up the lands from the hands of purchasers at the present high minimums, and with all the expenses of the existing system? Would the trifling excess of six mills be sufficient to compensate the whole expense of employing registers, receivers, and auctioneers? It would not. Therefore, the present land system was attended with a positive loss to the Union.

In regard to the right of the new States to the lands within their chartered limits, Mr. C. thought they had some claim, not to the whole amount of the lands, but to such of them as had been offered for sale at auction, and afterwards exposed at private sale, but still remained without a purchaser. The terms on which new States were received into the Union were declared to be, that they should be placed on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. It had been added, by way of condition, that they should not interfere with the primary disposition of the soil, nor tax it until five years after the time of sale. It had been maintained by more than one of the ablest men of the country, that the new States had a right to these lands—to the whole of them.

But without insisting on the whole length of that doctrine, Mr. C. would only ask, whether the new States could be said to be placed on "an equal footing in all respects" with the old, while they were cut off from the same source of revenue which the others enjoyed? He would not insist that the new States could claim a right to the soil; but he insisted that it was the true policy to enable them to sell the land to actual settlers. They did not ask the Government to give them these lands without receiving any money for them; but only that when all the fertile land had been exhausted by sales on Government account, the residue might be ceded to the States within which it lay; or, at least, that a graduated value should be placed upon the whole. Mr. C. then referred to a report made four years ago, and laid on the table of the Senate, containing a tabular view of the quantity and quality of the public lands, and stating how long it had been in the market. From this he quoted the total quantity in various States, and the small comparative amount of land of the first quality. Very much of it was so bad as to be returned unfit for cultivation. The examination which had taken place since the time this report had been made went to show a still larger proportion of bad land. There was much mountain, much pine barren. Ought this to be kept at a minimum price of a dollar and a quarter? The lands in Indiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida, had been offered by foreign Governments as a free gift to any one that would settle on and improve them. This offer had been open to every body for fifty years; since which they had been exposed to private sale for twenty or thirty years longer, and still they lay uncultivated. Could it be sound policy to hold this land at the existing price? To him, the reverse was evident. He had invited the attention of the House to these questions, that a report might be submitted as to the policy of abandoning a system so injurious to the best interests of the Union, and as to the propriety of ceding to the new States such land as could not be sold after being in market for so long a course of years. He could not see the utility of opposing such an inquiry, even in its incipient stage. The subject had already been referred in general terms to the Land Committee. All Mr. C. wished was, to present the inquiry in a somewhat more definite and specific shape. When the House remembered that the expense of selling 926,000 acres had amounted to 121,000 dollars, and in another year the cost of disposing of 341,000 acres had been 47,750 dollars, he trusted that they would at least agree to the expediency of an inquiry upon the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose in reply. He said it had been far from his intention to go, at this time, into the subject of the amendment or the resolution. His object had been not to provoke, but to prevent, debate. But, as the gentleman from Alabama had not followed the example set him by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Booz,] but had deemed it necessary to address the House at some length, he trusted the House would excuse him for troubling them with a word or two in reply.

The gentleman had labored hard to prove that a great proportion of the lands which he was desirous of having ceded to the new States was so bad as to be unfit for cultivation. Now, Mr. W. could scarcely express his surprise that, if these lands were so bad as to be absolutely unfit for use, those States should exhibit so eager an anxiety to get hold of them.

The gentleman from Alabama could not possibly be more surprised at his course than he was at the course pursued by that gentleman. The gentleman offered a resolution modestly asking the Union to cede to the new States all their public lands, and then was greatly surprised that Mr. W. should oppose the proposal. He had told the House that Mr. W. had opposed certain bills which the gentleman represented as highly beneficial to the settlers of our new lands. Mr. W. had at all times, so far as he had participated in the councils of the Union, been opposed to the profuse waste of the public property of the States. He had resisted all laws that tended to such a result; and so long as he held a seat on that floor, should continue to oppose them. The gentleman would have hereafter as much cause of surprise as he had at present. He could not consent to sit quietly by, and see the domain in which his constituents had an equal right with the other States of the Union, taken from them to be given to a few States of this confederacy. What right had the new States to demand such a thing? Had they purchased these lands? He believed not. They might have aided in preserving or even in conquering this domain; but that gave them no right to that which was the common property of all the States. He never would consent that the share belonging to his constituents should be taken from them without their consent. He always had resisted, and always would resist, such a measure by whomsoever brought forward. Nor did he consider this as furnishing any ground of reproach or of wonder. But the gentleman professed to be thus anxious to get possession of the public domain purely with a view to relieve the Union from the expenses attending the sale of it; and he thought that the Government was bound to accord its thanks to the honorable gentleman for his truly benevolent and perfectly disinterested feelings and purposes.

But, as far as Mr. W. was concerned, he preferred to retain the management of this property in the Government's own hands. He believed that the proceeds would more than compensate for any expense that might accompany it. He would call the minds of the members of the House to one fact: it was that the (now) old State of Ohio, one of the greatest and most powerful States of the West, had been settled, and that with unexampled rapidity, when the public lands were held at two dollars. This solitary fact was, in itself, a full and satisfactory answer to the gentleman's whole argument. That argument was, that the present price of land was the efficient obstacle in retarding the settlement of the new States. The settlement of Ohio, at a higher price, was an unanswerable refutation of that argument. He insisted that the price of the land was no impediment to its sale. The true reason why the lands were not sold was precisely this, that there was more in market than there was a demand for. It was just the same with regard to land as it was with all other commodities exposed for sale; if so great a quantity were thrown into the market at once as to overwhelm the demand, that commodity would find a slow sale. The total amount of the public land owned by the United States was, if he correctly remembered, about one thousand millions of acres. Of this, the quantity surveyed and offered for sale was about two hundred millions; and the total quantity sold within the forty-five years the land had been in market was twenty-five millions. Now, was it surprising that the sale of land was slow? And did any one seriously believe that reducing the price would advance the settlement of the new States, when Ohio had been settled with the land at two dollars?

Suppose the country should be engaged in another war—it was not impossible, though he hoped it was very improbable, and that the country would enjoy the sunshine of peace for many years to come; what fund would the gentleman provide on which the Government would be able to borrow the money it would need? The funds for the last war had been obtained on a pledge of the public domain; and with the proceeds of that domain the public debt had been, in part, extinguished. What substitute had the gentleman in readiness when his favorite scheme should have been carried?

[At this point, Mr. W. was reminded that the hour allotted to resolutions had expired, and the debate was consequently suspended for the present.]

CHICKASAW TREATY.

The House then, on motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, proceeded to consider a report made by the Committee on Public Lands, on the 6th day of June, 1832, on the subject of a "lease of Indian reservation under treaty with the Chickasaws."

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he understood that a new treaty had been concluded, which was likely to be submitted to the Senate; by which, according to his understanding, the United States were likely to be deprived of their public domain. He would, therefore, offer to the House the following amendment:

Resolved, That a copy of this report, and the evidence taken, be transmitted to the President of the United States; and he is hereby requested to lay the same before the Senate of the United States, whenever he shall submit to that body for their advice and ratification any treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw Indians, in which may be contained any stipulation relating to the said reservation of four miles square.

Mr. CLAY said it appeared to him that this was only renewing the same proposition that had been disposed of the other day. As he believed the time of the House could be better employed than in the discussion of this subject, he would move to lay the resolution, with the amendment, on the table; and on this question he asked the ayes and noes.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he wished to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it was not his intention to redeem the pledge he had given the other day, that discussion should take place on the subject, when the report of the last session came before the House?

Mr. CLAY said he gave no such pledge. He had merely said it would be time enough to send the report to the Senate when that body should ask for it.

The vote was then taken by yeas and nays, when the motion was agreed to, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 19.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, on the subject of the public lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS resumed the course of his remarks, (in reply to Mr. CLAY, of Alabama,) which had been suspended yesterday by the expiration of the hour allotted to reports and resolutions.

He said that when he had suspended his remarks yesterday, he had been endeavoring to show that the public lands were a common fund, owned alike by all the States, to be appropriated only to common purposes, and for the benefit of all the States collectively. Since then, he had had an opportunity of examining the various cession acts of the several States who had relinquished their uncultivated lands to the General Government. He found that New York had ceded in 1781, Virginia in 1784, Massachusetts in 1785, Connecticut in 1786, South Carolina in 1787, North Carolina in 1790, and Georgia in 1802. In all these instruments of cession he found one uniform provision to this effect:

"That the lands they ceded to the United States shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States of America, (the ceding State included,) according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure; and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

This clause, found in every act of cession, clearly showed what had been the object of the ceding States in giving up their unsettled lands. By the very terms of the deed, these lands were to constitute a common fund, faithfully to be applied to the general benefit. One of the arguments he had been urging in favor of retaining the public domain in the possession of the General Government had been drawn from the possible contingency of a state of war. It was not reasonable to hope that this country would enjoy a state of uninterrupted peace; and should war arrive, these lands would constitute a good and valuable pledge on which to borrow the money which might be demanded by the public exigencies. Until the gentleman and those who acted with him should point out some other fund which might be substituted for such a purpose, Mr. W. thought it manifestly incumbent upon the Government to hold on upon the public domain.

Another general purpose to which the public lands might be applied was found in the payment of soldiers enlisted by the United States. In the late war with Great Britain, the country, being deprived of its ordinary pecuniary resources, had been obliged to resort to this common fund to sustain itself in the struggle, and the soldiers enlisted were promised a bounty in land as well as in money. Many were induced to enlist by an offer of this kind who would have been moved by no other. The same thing might occur again, when this landed fund would be found very convenient, and highly important to the public defence. Mr. W. knew it to be a fact that many had been tempted to enlist by the prospect of possessing a permanent home after the toils and dangers of the war were past. Now, unless the gentleman was able to point out some other means of paying our troops in such an emergency, Mr. W. was in favor of retaining this. But this domain furnished the means not only of increasing our army, but of augmenting our naval force: it would enable the Government to add to that arm of its strength which bore the national flag over every sea, and sent it to the very ends of the earth.

Another general purpose, common to all the States, which would be met by this common fund, was the support of the Government—the payment of the civil list.

If this public property of the Union should be surrendered, then, (admitting the proceeds of the sales to amount to three millions of dollars,) his own State of North Carolina would have to pay from one hundred and fifty thousand to two hundred thousand more than if the Government retained it, in the shape of bounty to soldiers, augmentation of the navy, and paying the current charges of the Government.

If these lands should not be equally divided among the States, then North Carolina would lose that amount of revenue entirely; but if, on the contrary, the proceeds were to be equally divided, she would gain that amount. He asked, therefore, whether it was reasonable in the new States to call for the setting apart of the whole of this public property for their benefit exclusively? Were not the old States asked to do for them what they would be far from doing for the old States? Suppose he should put in a similar claim in behalf of the old States of this Union; would the gentleman from Alabama yield the motion his support? The gentleman, he perceived, shook his head. He knew it must be so. Then, by what rule of equity could the gentleman ask him to do what that gentleman publicly, in his place, declared himself to be unwilling to do for him? The gentleman wanted North Carolina to give up all the share she owned in the public domain; while he frankly admitted that Alabama would do no such thing. Was this reciprocal legislation? He thought not. Until the gentleman was willing himself to do for others what he very modestly asked others to do for him, Mr. W. was for holding on upon the public property of the nation. Now, if the law of retaliation should take place, where would the gentleman and his friends be found? Congress would take from them what they had sought to take from others, and the new States would lose all share in the public domain. And would not Congress be justified in measuring out to these States what they had prepared for the other States? But Mr. W. was far from proposing any measure of such a character. Let all the States continue to enjoy an equal share in that which was the common property of all.

The gentleman had said that the new States did not ask these lands for nothing; but the gentleman had not told the House what the new States would give for them. He took it for granted they would not give one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, which is now the minimum price established by law. Would they give fifty cents per acre? If they did, then the old States would lose seventy-five cents per acre; if they would not give more than twenty-five cents, then the old States would lose one dollar per acre; and if they would not give more than ten cents, then the old States would lose one dollar and fifteen cents on every acre. In whatever ratio the new States were to gain by the bargain, the old States were to lose. Mr. W., for one, was not prepared to negotiate until he had fully heard the terms proposed.

But, admitting that Congress must sell the public domain to the new States, what security were they to receive for the payment of the money? He was willing to trust the new States as far as he would trust any body; yet he rather concluded that if the Government once gave up the land, the affair would end in giving up the money too. He thought they had better keep possession while they had it. There was something permanent, something real, something undestructible, connected with the idea of land; but if the Government should be compelled to give up its claim to the land, it was much more likely to abandon its claim upon money.

The gentleman had said that the people of the new States had augmented the value of the public lands. Mr. W. did not know how. The truth was, they had added nothing to their value. Had they cleared these lands? Had they erected houses upon them, or barns? Had they planted orchards? He believed not. Had they communicated one additional degree to the fertility of their soil? He had never heard so. The gentleman might as well tell the House that his constituents had improved the value of grain, if wheat should sell next year at two dollars per bushel. The same universal law of depreciation and appreciation applied to land which applied to wheat. Unless the gentleman could prove his doctrine true in relation to wheat, Mr. W. could not believe it in relation to land. It was true the people of the new States had improved their own lands; but they had all the benefit arising from such improvement in the production and sale of their own crops. If any benefit had accrued, it had accrued to themselves. The Government surely was not bound to pay them for this improvement of their own fortunes.

The gentleman had said, further, that the lands which he wished to have ceded to the new States were of no value; and, in proof of the position, had read a statement going to show that out of ten millions of acres of land in Mississippi, eight millions were reported as unfit for cultivation. Now it struck Mr. W. with great surprise, that the gentleman, as representing the new States in this matter, should be so extraordinarily solicitous to get possession of lands, which, according to his own showing, were of no value! The very fact of the gentleman's solicitude went far to show that those lands were, at least by the people of the new States themselves, considered as of some value. He could not bring himself to believe that those States would be so anxious to get hold of lands which were of no use or value. And it was precisely for this reason that he was equally desirous that the Government should hold on upon their land. He knew that it was of value. The conduct of gentlemen proved that it was, and that they knew it. If the land was of no value to the Government of the United States, would it be appreciated by being transferred to the new States?

If the land was of no value to the whole Union, would it be of any value to the State of Alabama? Would the transfer improve its fertility? He thought not. If it was of no value to the United States as an aggregate, it could be of none to the State of Alabama separately. Every body knew what was the usual progress of settling vacant lands. The lands of the best quality were selected first; and when these were all taken up, then that of inferior quality was brought into market; and it often happened that this, owing to the advanced settlement of the country, sold for a higher price than far better land had brought at first. What had the experience of all the old States proved on this subject? In Virginia, for example, the good soil had been first taken up; but when this had been disforested, the adjoining land, though of inferior quality, commanded a better price than the good land had been sold for. In one of the adjoining counties of that State, I am told, said Mr. W., that land which, in 1790, sold for one dollar an acre, had, during the late war, brought sixty dollars. The same thing was taking place every day in North Carolina. Inferior lands will be brought into cultivation as soon as those of better quality have been occupied. The same results will also follow in the progress of the new States. How, then, could gentlemen contend that the land of less than the first quality was of no value? The lands which were now too poor to command immediate settlement would hereafter become valuable for the timber they contained. This happened in Europe; it happened all the world over.

The gentleman had said that the land was refuse and valueless. Mr. W. was unable to comprehend this. He did not believe that nature had ever designed any land on the face of the earth to be refuse, and of no use. The highest mountain land was of some use; it was not wholly refuse, if it would grow grass, or the smallest shrub. Possibly the summit of the Andes might be considered as useless, and, with respect to the purposes of man, as refuse. But there was very little land of which this could be said with truth.

But, Mr. W. said, he was now desirous of calling the attention of the House to a fact which was of importance in this argument. The gentleman from Alabama had produced and read to the House, with great emphasis, a document said to contain a report from the Registers and Receivers of all the Land Offices, from which he stated the large proportion of the unsettled lands which were unfit for cultivation. Now, he had since learned that these documents were not worthy of being received by the House as evidence. He had reason to believe that the officers who had made this report had not, in one case out of a hundred, seen an acre of the land they undertook to describe; and how could they testify that it was unfit for cultivation?

Mr. CLAY here explained, stating that their reports had been founded, in part, upon the plats of the surveyors, as well as on personal observation. He had not said that all the land to be transferred was valueless, but that much of it was pine barren.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied, that pine barrens were often the most valuable description of land; not on account of the soil, but of the timber. Much of the trade of both the Carolinas was carried on in this sort of timber. The lofty, long-leaved pine, was one of the most stately and valuable trees of the forest. The time was approaching when the pine forests of Alabama would be among the most valuable possessions of the State. This was the case in North Carolina; and he had been told by intelligent gentlemen from South Carolina that the same thing held good in that State. As to the mountain lands in Alabama, if they would grow grass, they were the most valuable lands they had; the higher the ground lay, the better for crops of that sort. But the gentleman had laid great stress on the condition expressed in the constitution, receiving the new States into the Union, that they should be admitted in all respects on the same footing with the original States. Now, Mr. W. could not understand how the sovereignty of the new States was impaired by the fact that the General Government held lands within their chartered limits. The right of property was one thing; the right of jurisdiction was another. The jurisdiction of the State of Alabama was as complete, throughout her limits, as if the State owned all the soil. The gentleman was too good a lawyer not to perceive, and perfectly to understand, this distinction. One independent Government might hold land within the limits of another. The Government of the United States held at this very time a house and lot at the Hague; and if the United States could hold land in Holland, without disturbing the sovereignty of that Government, surely they might hold land in the limits of Alabama without interfering with her sovereignty.

Again: the gentleman could not deny that our Government might declare war whenever it was necessary to preserve the safety or vindicate the honor of the nation. For the purpose of carrying on war, it might be necesnary to resort to direct taxation; and if the tax should not be paid, might not the United States purchase the land and hold it till the tax is paid, or the land redeemed in some other way? Surely this course would be perfectly constitutional and proper; but, according to the gentleman's doctrine, the Government of the United States never could become the purchaser. In short, the argument on which he laid so much stress would go to strip the General Government of every attribute of sovereignty it possessed, and prostrate the whole of its powers. There was another view: The old States had ceded their vacant territory to the General Government, and provided that these Territories, so soon as their population would warrant it, should be admitted into the Union on the same footing with themselves; and they had also provided that the land thus ceded should be a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States. How were these two provisions to be reconciled? Both must be complied with. The only way was to admit the new States, but still retain the land as a common fund. Yet the gentleman would have the House believe that, admitting the new States did, ipso facto, take from the General Government all right of applying the public lands to the common benefit of the Union; and, consequently, the United States was to be stripped of all title in the land, and it must be surrendered to the new States. Such was the consequence of the gentleman's doctrine. The gentleman shook his head; but Mr. W. could see no other. The gentleman would not shake his head at the proposition that the lands were to be a common fund for the benefit of the Union; yet he maintained that it became the property of the new States as soon as admitted, because they were to be placed on an equal footing with the old States.

[Mr. CLAY explained. He had stated that it had been at least plausibly maintained that the new States were not on an equal footing with the old ones, so long as they were deprived of the disposition of the soil within their limits; but he had not himself taken that view of the subject.]

Mr. W. said he was happy to hear the gentleman's explanation; he was glad to find that he had been mistaken in his apprehension of the gentleman's opinion. Mr. W. knew that it had been maintained by some that the public lands belonged to the States where they lay; but he denied that it had been ever "plausibly" maintained. He denied the doctrine in toto. It had been maintained sophistically, illogically, inconclusively. The argument never had any influence on his mind. The whole affair was the merest sophistry he had ever seen in print. The claim seemed to be now renewedly urged by the gentleman from Alabama, in utter repugnance with the terms voluntarily accepted by his State, and by all the other new States. Various propositions had been tendered to the convention of the States. Mr. W. had them before him; but there was no need of reading them all. He would, however, read one or two to the House. They were in the following terms:

"And provided always, That the said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable, without the consent of the United States, that the people inhabiting the said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States: and, moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by the United States, after the first day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by the order, or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sale thereof: and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States, residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein: and that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States," &c.—[Laws of the United States, vol. vi. p. 333.]

Here the States expressly covenanted to renounce all claims to the waste and unoccupied lands belonging to the General Government, and not to tax them during a period of five years after their sale. The claim now set up by the new States was directly in the teeth of this solemn covenant—a compact coeval with the political existence of those States.

How was it that, after those States had enjoyed all the benefit of the compact, on their side, they turned about and asked of the General Government to relinquish all the benefits on its side of the bargain? If they wished the Government to be faithful to its pledges, let them be faithful to theirs. Alabama was one of the parties to this contract; and Mr. W. contended that she was still fully holden by it; and so were all the other new States, received in like manner. He trusted the gentleman would not persist in seeking to engross all the benefits to himself, and leave none to the rest of the Union. He hoped the gentleman would let the public domain remain in its present condition. If not, in what condition would the country be placed? The Government had received more than twenty millions of dollars from the State of Ohio for these very lands.

[Here his remarks were cut short by the expiration of the hour allotted to resolutions. On the next day he resumed as follows:]

Mr. WILLIAMS resumed the course of his remarks, by observing that he had not sought the present discussion; it had been forced upon him by the gentleman from Alabama. That gentleman had chosen to discuss his resolution, and Mr. W. hoped the House would excuse him for proceeding in the discussion of the amendment he had offered.

When the debate had been cut off by the expiration of the hour yesterday, he had been endeavoring to show that if the United States should consent to relinquish to the new States the public domain, they would be required, by every consideration of equity and justice, to refund to the State of Ohio all the money paid for public lands within the limits of that State. If the public lands were to be relinquished to Alabama, Missouri, and the other States, where the land lay, it must be on the principle that the Government had no right to hold them, and could not, under the constitution, rightfully enjoy the benefit of the consideration money received for them. If this were a just and sound principle, then it applied with equal force to the past, as to the present, or the future; and the Government must refund the whole amount they had received. Now, they had been paid, by settlers in the State of Ohio, more than twenty millions of dollars. He asked whether the House would adopt a policy which would render it necessary to refund the money? He hoped not. Again: If the Government refunded to Ohio, they would be obliged to do the same to other States. When the public domain had been disposed of, must they not reimburse the State of Virginia for all the loss she would sustain from the adoption of this line of policy? Unquestionably. Suppose this should require twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty millions of dollars; must not the whole be paid? Undoubtedly.

Mr. W. now proceeded to inquire what had been done by the United States' Government for the new States, admitted into this Union, in consequence of their population having settled portions of the public domain. On this subject much misapprehension existed in the country. Congress had made very liberal grants to the new States.

I. They had been allowed every 16th section in each township for the support of common schools.

II. They had been allowed five per cent. on all the sales of public lands, to be applied to the construction of roads, (three per cent. by the State Legislatures, and two per cent. by Congress.)

III. All salt springs, within their limits, had been given them, together with all the land requisite for the working of them in the manufacture of salt.

IV. Seventy-two sections in each new State had been granted to endow seminaries of learning. And to the State of Alabama there had been given 1,620 acres of land for the seat of Government. Were not, then, great advantages enjoyed solely and exclusively by the new States? All these were over and above the share due to those States, on an equality with all the others, in the proceeds of the public domain. Ought not those States to be satisfied? Ought they not gladly, thankfully, to receive what had been granted them, and to be contented with the exclusive privileges they enjoyed? It seemed to him that they ought.

The gentleman, however, maintained that the new States were injured, because they did not enjoy the right of taxing all the lands within their limits. He thought that the advantages enjoyed by those States were a full equivalent for this privation. The restriction was confined to five years. But, supposing the lands did belong to those States, would they tax wild land not appropriated? Did the State of Virginia tax all the lands within her limits? Would the State of Alabama attempt such a thing? Who would pay the taxes if they should be laid? Who would pay the tax of land that had no owner but the public? How was it to be taxed unless it should be sold? And how, then, was Alabama injured, seeing that if she owned the land she could not collect the tax?

The gentleman from Alabama had expressed his surprise that a proposal for a mere inquiry should meet with such decided opposition; especially as the subject had been recommended to the consideration of the House, in the message of the President. If that gentleman was surprised at the opposition, Mr. W. was equally surprised at the introduction of the resolution. The subject of the message had been referred, according to the uniform usage of the House, to appropriate committees. This was a thing of course. But Mr. W. hoped it was not a thing of course that the House should originate every measure recommended by the Executive. The President acted upon his own responsibility; the House upon its responsibility. Each department of Government must act according to its own sense of duty. On this ground the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOON] had consented to withdraw his resolution. But the gentleman from Alabama had persisted in his, and had gone into a lengthy discussion of it. What was the obvious inference from the gentleman's conduct? That this project of giving up the public lands would gain additional strength, should his resolution be adopted. If the gentleman did not believe this, why had he pressed his resolution? He must have thought that it would further the object he had so much at heart. Well, it was for that very reason that Mr. W. had opposed the resolution. He was unwilling that even an inquiry should be entertained upon the subject. The measure appeared to him so wholly inexpedient that he would not even consent it should be taken up at all. Suppose a gentleman should get up and move a resolution that it was inexpedient longer to continue the present Government of the United States; would it be entertained? Mr. W. thought the present resolution much of the same kind. He was opposed to all projects of this kind. He was aware, indeed, that the subject would be brought up before the House by the report of a committee. He trusted that committee would take the course which he approved; and he trusted also that the gentleman from Alabama would follow the example of the gentleman from Indiana. The Government had no right to give up the public domain. It would be an unconstitutional act. Where was the word or syllable in the constitution which empowered Congress to make such a surrender? It was true that there might have been some acts of cession previous to the adoption of the constitution; but that instrument recognised all the obligations which bound the Government at the time of its adoption, and this Government was bound to fulfil them. Congress were bound to use this public domain as a common fund, for the common benefit of the people of all the States. Where was the right of the House to divert this fund to a different purpose? It was true the constitution empowered Congress, generally, to dispose of the property of the Union. But in this case their duty was specifically declared, and they could not evade it.

He was opposed to the relinquishment of the public fund, because it operated, in effect, as a cement to the union of the States. All such bonds ought to be cherished and guarded. Whatever tended to weaken them ought to be deprecated and promptly put down. It was a dictate of sound philosophy and universal experience, that mankind would always act in accordance with what they believed to be their interest. If it was the interest of the people of the United States to support the General Government, and that the existing union of the States should flourish forever in immortal youth, then a measure could not be wise that tended to destroy the Government and obliterate the attachment of the people to the Union. Were it for this reason alone, Mr. W. would never consent to part with the public domain. It constituted an inexhaustible fund for the good of all. It would meet all the exigencies of the nation; it would pay the public debt; it would enable the nation to borrow money whenever it might need to do so; it would raise her army; it would equip her navy; it would pay the expenses of Government. Why should the Government give it up? He trusted such a measure would never succeed. The nation possessed a Government unrivalled in the annals of human history. Would they do a deed that must blast all the fair hopes of its perpetuity? He trusted not.

[After Mr. W. had concluded his remarks, the whole subject was, on motion of another member, ordered to lie on the table.]

SOUTHERN ASSAY OFFICES.

On the motion of Mr. CARSON, the House then went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in the chair, and took up the bill to establish assay offices in the gold regions of the South.

Mr. CARSON, who had reported the bill, moved to fill the blank for the salary of the assayer with the sum of $1,500; and that appropriating money for the whole expense of the four assay offices to be created, with the sum of $20,000. He proposed that the compensation of the commissioners to be appointed for the selecting of the several sites for the assay offices should be four dollars per day.

Mr. ROOT said, it would really afford him great satisfaction, if the gentlemen from the South, who were always found to be so sedulously careful to guard against all infringement of the constitution, would be so obliging as to inform him from what clause or part of the constitution they derived the power to pass such an act of Congress. He well remembered that the gentleman who had reported this bill [Mr. CARSON] was always extremely careful as to the exercise of any implied or assumed powers. Even the encouragement of an agricultural production of great interest proposed by a bill at the last session [Mr. R. alluded to the silk bill] had been successfully opposed by that gentleman and others from the same quarter, on the ground that Congress possessed no power to pass such an act. What was the object of the present bill? It was simply to assay gold for exportation. It was not intended that the gold assayed should go to the mint, and come under the power given by the constitution to coin money. Its value was to be fixed upon the scientific principles to be furnished by the director of the mint, for the purpose of ascertaining its fineness for the jeweller or the exporter, and to save them the trouble and expense of assaying it. He hoped the time was not far distant when it would become profitable to take gold to the mint. Whenever the bill reported by his colleague should come up, he trusted a decision would be had upon it which would render the mint useful for other purposes than stamping gold for exportation. The advantages to be derived from this bill be regarded as of little importance compared with that, to say nothing of the constitutional question. Under his present views of constitutional power, he moved to strike the enacting clause from the bill.

Mr. CARSON said he was never in his life less prepared to go into the discussion of any question. He had arrived in the city but this morning, and had not had the opportunity of looking into a single paper. If the gentleman wished an explanation, he hoped he would waive his motion for the present, and suffer the bill to go through the committee, and be postponed for a day or two. He could only answer his question now, by asking another—where was the constitutional power for establishing a mint derived?

Mr. ROOT thought it would be better for the committee to rise and report progress. As to the gentleman's question, it was easily answered. Congress had power to create a mint, as a necessary instrument or tool for the coining of money. If it had power to plough a field, it had power to make a plough to do it with. But these subordinate assay officers were no help towards coining; they only stamped the gold for sale or exportation.

Mr. CARSON said the assay was the first step in the process of giving coin its established value. His constituents wished to avoid the risk of transporting their gold all the way to Philadelphia to have its value fixed.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, expressed his hope that the gentleman from New York would consent to the bill's passing the committee. It was of great importance to the State from which he came. Gold was fast becoming to the South a subject of greater interest than any other product except the staples of those States, inasmuch that the citizens of the State of Georgia had resolved on sending a deputation to Congress upon the subject. As to the constitutional question, the gentleman from New York would himself admit that the people of the Southern States were as little disposed to violate the constitution as any citizens of the Union. In order to carry into effect the provision of the constitution giving Congress power to coin money, an assay office had been established at Philadelphia. All they asked was, that branches of that office might be established, for greater public convenience, within their own States. Mr. C. said he was well acquainted with the frauds and speculations practised on the owners of gold, and would, at a proper time, present to the committee many facts on that subject.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the wishes of the gentleman would be complied with. His colleague had himself lately offered a resolution, proposing, as well as he recollected, something about the assay of foreign coins. That involved the same constitutional difficulty with the present bill.

Mr. ROOT stated the reasons why he could not consent to suffer this bill to pass without opposition from the committee into the House. The committee was the proper place to collect the requisite information, and to discuss the constitutional question before the gag should be imposed upon them in the shape of the previous question. Possibly the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] as to the constitutional difficulty attending a resolution calling upon the director of the mint to state to the House the relative value of gold and silver coins, was correct; the gentleman might find some constitutional question even in such inquiry; some solemn invasion of the constitution might be involved in it. But here was a bill appropriating money, creating new offices and new salaries; and a Committee of the Whole was the proper place to discuss it. Gentlemen pretended that these assay offices were required in connexion with the mint. No doubt, if the mint coined gold, and silver, and copper, it must have gold, silver, and copper to coin; but it must also have iron to use in the coining. But if the argument was a good one, he supposed that wherever there was a forge or an iron foundry, there must be an assay office to stamp the iron as of the first, second, or third quality. He must insist upon his motion.

Mr. PENDLETON said that he understood the objection of his colleague to this bill to be, that the operation of an assay would be performed at the expense of the public, instead of being paid for by the individuals concerned. But as no seigniorage was required at the mint, the objection of his respected colleague did not lie. The assay of the metal was the initiatory operation in the process of coining; and if it was constitutional to coin, it was, therefore, constitutional to assay; and if it was constitutional to assay at Philadelphia, it was equally constitutional to assay in Georgia, Virginia, or the Carolinas.

Mr. FOSTER said he had himself anticipated some constitutional difficulty, and, with a view to obviate it, he proposed to amend the bill by adding the words "as branches of the United States mint."

Mr. ARCHER thought there was no necessity of deciding the constitutional question whether the United States mint could rightfully extend its branches into the different States. He wanted to know, first, what necessity there was for creating the establishment proposed. The bill went to erect four assaying establishments—one in Virginia, one in North, and another in South Carolina, and a fourth in Georgia. Now, he was very sure there was no want of any such office in his own State. All the gold that had been, or was likely to be found there, was not of sufficient amount to authorize such a measure; nor had the committee any evidence before them to show the necessity of erecting these offices in the other States named. He should therefore vote for striking out.

Mr. CARSON asked the gentleman whether he had read the report and documents?

Mr. ARCHER replied that he had.

Mr. CARSON expressed surprise at his opposition, but was willing to strike out the State of Virginia from the bill. The greatest difficulty of the gold proprietors was to have its value ascertained. They had a scientific gentleman at the South who had assayed the metal, and stamped it in pieces of different sizes, of the value of one dollar, five dollars, ten dollars, &c.; but this assay was destitute of official authority, and speculators availed themselves of this state of things to defraud the gold proprietors. The gentleman was not probably aware of the amount of gold produced. The year before last it had amounted to 204,000 dollars in North Carolina alone, and last year that amount had been doubled.

Mr. CLAYTON said that they only asked that advantage for their gold which was enjoyed in the gentleman's own State by the tobacco of Virginia, viz: having its value increased from being officially ascertained. Mr. C. insisted that the practical effect of the bill would be, not to prevent American gold from reaching the mint, but rather to give it that direction. At present, much of the gold went into the hands of a jeweller, and thence found its way to Europe.

Mr. BOULDIN said that, from the first time he had heard of the proposition in this bill, he had been reflecting much on the subject, and was unable to make any distinction between the inspection of flour, beef, or tobacco, and the assay office, now desired to stamp the degree of fineness upon this article of commerce. The Government of the United States had no power to pass such a bill. The regulation of inspection laws was adverted to by the constitution in terms, and was expressly declared to be within the control of the States alone. Nor was the accidental fact that the gold of North Carolina or Georgia would thereby find its way to the mint any reason why this inspection should take place under a law of the United States. Every valuable object proposed by this bill might be attained by a State taking precisely the same measures in relation to gold as it did in respect to flour, fish, or tobacco. It was said, indeed, that the owners of the gold were cheated by sharpers; but Mr. B. thought that the United States' Government had gone quite far enough in the effort to set themselves up as regulators of the local concerns, not only of States, but of individuals. He trusted that no such things as inspection laws would be attempted by the General Government, whether as to gold, brass, iron, or lead. Mr. B. had not examined the reasons which might or might not induce the States concerned to pass such laws as should prevent either the dealers from cheating the buyers of gold, or the buyers from cheating the dealers.

Mr. ROOT having withdrawn his motion to strike out,

Mr. FOSTER proposed the amendment he had before mentioned, viz: to add the words "as branches of the United States mint." Mr. F. professed as great delicacy as any other member could feel in relation to the powers of the General Government; a subject on which he hoped never to slumber, whether his own interests or those of others were concerned. He held the erection of these assay offices to be perfectly constitutional, under that clause which empowers the General Government to coin money. If it was constitutional to create a mint, and to erect, as its auxiliary, an assay office at Philadelphia, why was it not equally so to establish similar offices elsewhere? Soon after the gold mine had been discovered, the assayer had marked the pieces of metal, of various value, from one dollar upwards. The difficulty had been suggested at that time as to the constitutional right; but the difficulty had been met by the consideration that such pieces could not be made a legal tender but by the authority of Congress. If the General Government should stamp them, they would then pass into circulation as coin. If these offices were merely for inspection, he should admit the force of the objection which had been urged by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOULDIN]; but they were for a different purpose, and would be nothing more than branches of the mint.

Mr. ELLSWORTH inquired whether there had been any communication with the officers of the mint as to the measure of extending it by branches. Mr. E. was desirous of knowing both the necessity of such a measure and its consequences. It might be proper to inquire whether further guards were not necessary before such a measure should be adopted. Mr. E. was entirely uninformed upon the subject, and desired further preliminary information.

Mr. DEARBORN suggested that the difficulty might be obviated by inserting the words "as branches of the assay office."

Mr. HOWARD observed that the effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FOSTER], would be such as that gentleman did not anticipate, unless further provisions were added to the bill. As it stood at present, the bill left the mint to be regulated as by the existing laws. If these offices were to be branches of the mint, they would be subject to the same rules with the mint; and one of those was, not to assay bullion unless for the purpose of converting it into coin. All bullion brought to the mint was required by law to be left there until it should be coined. To introduce a regulation like this into the assay offices would defeat the very object of creating them; which object, as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina, was to enable the owners of gold to sell it in the form of bullion: the law, however, clothed the director of the mint with power to contract with the owners of bullion to exchange it for an equal weight of coin. But the director could not transfer this power to the proposed offices, unless the law should authorize him so to do. If an individual purchased coin with bullion, the ordinary rule was to deduct one-half per cent. as seigniorage. This would have to be paid by the people of Georgia and the Carolinas; nor would even this regulation take effect without farther provision in the bill. The object of the measure was to enable the holder of gold to receive its value as quickly as possible, and the bill might be so constructed as to enable him to receive it at once.

Mr. FOSTER quoted the law establishing and regulating the mint, to show that the Secretary of the Treasury had a discretionary power as to the rules of assay, and he could obviate the difficulty suggested when he should lay down rules for those offices. Mr. F. dwelt upon the great convenience of having a branch of the mint established in the region where gold was produced: it would be a benefit, not only to the parties immediately concerned, but to the whole community, by introducing a small gold coinage instead of the small bills at present so much objected to.

Mr. HOWARD reminded the gentleman from Georgia that, though the Secretary could make regulations under the law, he could not make regulations inconsistent with the law; and, as the law confined the power in question to the director of the mint, the Secretary could make no rule giving that power to any one else.

Mr. COKE said it would give him much pleasure to vote for both bill and amendment, if his principles did not oppose both. But believing that the General Government did not possess the power to do what the bill proposed, he would not consent to exercise a power indirectly, which could not be done in a direct manner. If he was compelled to vote at present, he should be obliged to vote in the negative: he therefore moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; but

At the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, the motion was withdrawn, and the bill for the present laid aside.

ASYLUMS FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB, AND BLIND.

The committee then proceeded to consider the bill granting a township of land to the New England Asylum for the Blind, and the New York Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the bill by making a similar grant to the Asylum for the Blind in New York.

Mr. WARD said he was in favor of the bill as it had been reported by the committee to whom it had been referred, and he hoped his honorable colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] would withdraw the amendment which he had proposed in favor of the institution for the blind in New York, because, he said, that he should deeply lament the rejection of this bill, which, he said, might be the consequence if such a proposition should prevail; for if one amendment should be admitted, no one could predict, with any degree of certainty, where we should stop. Besides, (said Mr. W.) it is not usual to amend a bill in this manner, when in Committee of the Whole, by tacking a similar application to it: such amendments have heretofore been invariably rejected. The application (said Mr. W.) ought to have been referred, in the first instance, to one of the standing committees, or to a committee raised expressly for the purpose. Mr. W. said that the committee had not been informed whether a foundation had as yet been laid for the institution for the blind in that city. He hoped the bill under consideration would not be embarrassed by the amendment proposed; and he promised his colleague [Mr. CAMBRELENG] that should the bill be reported in favor of that institution, he would give it his cordial support. Mr. W. stated that he had done himself the honor to submit to the House the memorial from the Deaf and Dumb Institution in New York, which was referred to a select committee, and this bill was reported for its relief from the said committee, by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT;] and he therefore felt interested in the success of the application. He said it was proper to remark that, in the year 1830, a bill passed the Senate granting a township of land to this institution, which he regretted to say was lost in the House for want of time to act upon it. Mr. W. said he would take this occasion to observe that this institution was first opened as a charity school in May, 1818, and has been fourteen years in operation, during which time its founders have had to contend with very many difficulties, which have been in a great measure surmounted. The directors have completed a building sufficiently large to contain all the deaf mutes who may be disposed to attend the institution from that and the adjoining States. The building will accommodate at least two hundred, the aggregate cost of which, including other buildings connected with it, and the improvements made in ornamenting the grounds about it, was something like $37,000. The State of New York contributed, by an act of the Legislature, passed in 1827, $10,000 to that laudable object; and the sum of $16,000, or thereabouts, was contributed by the benevolent citizens of the city of New York; and the balance was raised by a loan, the greater part of which is now due. To meet this debt, as also to enable the directors to extend the benefits of the institution to a larger number of deaf mutes, is the object of the prayer of the directors. They have not asked that the bounty of this nation should be extended to them without showing, in the first place, that private charity has done something for the creation of an institution: they have shown that a foundation has been laid, and that the institution is in full operation, and extending the benefits of instruction, so far as its means will enable it to do. Private benevolence has done much, and should the public bounty conspire, a beneficial result will be produced. Sir, the individuals who have laudably undertaken to superintend that institution, acting from humane and benevolent motives, have not only contributed liberally in money, but have devoted their time, their attention, and their labor to the object, without which no institution can flourish, and without which it is not at all probable that the bounty of the nation would call private charity into action. That institution is now in a flourishing condition, and the patronage of the Government is only required to render it one of the most useful in the country. The directors have taken unwearied pains to procure competent assistants from the Royal Institute, where the principle and practice of the Abbé Sicard are pursued. Indeed, sir, they have proceeded thus far with a full determination that the institution should stand among the first for the instruction of mutes in this country, and all they now ask is additional means. Thirty-two indigent mutes have heretofore been annually admitted at the expense of the State of New York: the Legislature of that State having appropriated the necessary means for that object. The State provides for no more, although there are now at least 1,000 deaf mutes within its limits; and it is to be regretted that there are numerous applicants, who cannot be admitted for want of further means. It has been estimated, doubtless by those well acquainted with the subject, that this unfortunate class exists in the ratio of one in every 2,000; consequently, there are upwards of 7,000 in the United States: of that number the State of New York contains at least the one-seventh part. In the New York institution, those mutes who are not able to pay any part of their expenses, are admitted as charity scholars; but in all cases where the parents are able to pay a part, then a part only is required. Sir, it is a lamentable fact, that, until within a few years, the deaf mutes throughout the world have been looked upon as outcasts in society, and that, with the best efforts of the friends of humanity, only a small number of them have as yet been raised from darkness, ignorance, and barbarism. Let us not be unmindful that they are a part of the human family; that they labor under deprivations brought upon them without their own agency, and most generally in the period of childhood; they are, therefore, peculiarly entitled to the sympathy of the community, to the liberal beneficence of the nation. The means to raise them to the state of human understanding is no longer unknown; the veil is now withdrawn; methods have been discovered to compensate, in a great measure, for the privations they have suffered in the loss of hearing. Charity rejoices at the efforts made for their relief, and religion will lend its benign influence to consummate the noble work.

Congress has been bountiful to similar institutions. Grants of land have heretofore been made to the deaf and dumb institutions in Connecticut, and in the State of Kentucky. The population of the whole of the Eastern States exceeds but little (if any) that of the population of the State of New York; and he said if it were just to grant relief to the institutions in Connecticut and Kentucky, he would ask whether it was not equally just to grant relief to the deaf and dumb institution in the city of New York? Besides, said Mr. W., as large tracts of land have been granted for literary purposes in all of the Western States, and as we are daily told in this House that these lands belong to the States after the payment of the national debt, he thought that the claim now before the committee was paramount to any such consideration. The benevolent citizens of New York city, who have erected this institution, and who feel a deep and lively interest in its prosperity, are entitled to all praise for what they have already done; and when the fact is taken into consideration that those citizens have many calls upon their charity from every section of our country to aid in erecting churches, colleges, and other seminaries of learning and religion, as also for the relief of sufferers by fire and flood, and that in every instance they contribute to those objects cheerfully and with an unsparing hand, it seemed, he said, to him, that they were now entitled to some consideration. Mr. W. said, that as he was not one of the Representatives for that city, but as he had the honor to represent the adjoining congressional district, he considered himself at liberty thus to speak; as no motives of delicacy restrained him in this respect, he could speak, he said, of things as they were, without the imputation of making an improper compliment. He conceded to merit only its due, and he congratulated himself that the occasion had been offered him, and that the House had it in its power to extend a suitable reward to this institution, consistent alike with the policy of the nation and the dictates of humanity. But, he said, he did not wish to be understood as urging to this House that that State had claims upon this nation for its bounty; but he asked the relief solicited as an act of public charity, and he trusted it would be granted, in view of the motives which have guided the institution in all its measures, and more especially in this application. He begged, in conclusion, that a bill so laudable in its object might not be embarrassed by the amendment proposed by his honorable colleague, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had offered his amendment only in consequence of the absence of the gentleman [Mr. VERPLANCE] who had presented a memorial in favor of that institution, and who was absent from his place on leave. All these institutions stood on the same common ground of humanity; but as the gentleman [Mr. WARD] seemed so solicitous, he would gratify him by withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, moved an amendment, granting the same quantity of land to the institution in Ohio.

Mr. EVERETT expressed his hope that the gentleman from Ohio would follow the praiseworthy example of the gentleman near him, [Mr. CAMBRELENG], and consent to withdraw his amendment, lest, by overloading the bill, its safety might be endangered. Two institutions for the deaf and dumb had been already endowed; but this was the first institution for the blind. He pledged himself to lend all the aid in his power towards a separate bill for the benefit of Ohio.

Mr. IRVIN could not consent to withdraw the amendment. The report of a standing committee had recommended a donation to the institution in his State; and, though it was situated beyond the mountains, that furnished no reason why it was not as worthy of patronage as if it was on this side. That State had paid into the treasury 18,000,000 dollars from the public lands, besides 13,000,000 more, which had gone to satisfy military warrants. All the expenses of the State were raised by direct taxation on the landed property; and was it just that the landholders of Ohio should be taxed to sustain this institution, and the General Government, so great a landholder, contribute nothing towards it? He thought the claim rested on considerations of justice, as well as humanity.

Before any question was taken, the committee rose, and reported the bills to the House, and asked and obtained leave to sit again on them.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20.

Mr. WILLIAMS resumed, and concluded his remarks in support of the amendment offered by him to the resolution of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, on the subject of a cession of the public lands to the new States, [as given above.]

This incidental debate was ended by a motion of Mr. SPEIGHT to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table.

Both Mr. CLAY and Mr. WILLIAMS expressed their assent to this arrangement.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. WICKLIFFE, next came up:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following be proposed to the States as an amendment to the constitution of the United States, to take effect from and after the ratification of the same by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, viz: No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office of trust or profit under the authority of the United States.

Mr. WICKLIFFE repeated the wish expressed by him on a former occasion, that a vote should be taken on this subject during the present session of Congress. It was not his desire to press the question upon the House at this time, and he would therefore move to postpone it until this day week, and to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. SPEIGHT suggested that perhaps the preferable reference would be to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; a resolution on an analogous subject had been committed to that committee, and a recommendation in respect to it, contained in the President's message, likewise had been subjected to its action.

Mr. WICKLIFFE regretted that he should differ in opinion with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT], as to the proper destination of the subject which he had deemed it his duty to bring under their consideration. He should object to a reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because he was fully satisfied, from his experience in that House, of one fact; and that was, that one of the most successful modes of disposing of a question, without deliberating upon it, was to send it, in a short session of Congress, to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and thus, perhaps, to prevent an opportunity of taking a vote upon it. He should, therefore, propose to keep the bill upon the Speaker's table, if it were only to occupy as much of the time of the House as would suffice for the taking of the yeas and nays. He was satisfied that this could not be effected if the subject should be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. His (Mr. W.'s) mind had long been made up, at least as to the propriety of proposing such an amendment to the constitution. Upon that point he did not stand alone, but was supported by high authority. He might be permitted to say, that there had been chiding in some quarters as to why this question had not been considered by the last Congress, or the present one. He concluded by asking for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPEIGHT shortly replied, and observed that his sole object in moving the reference of the resolutions to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, was, that the whole subject might be brought up in connexion.

Mr. WICKLIFFE withdrew his motion to postpone till this day week, in order that the sense of the House might be evinced by yeas and nays on the proposition to commit to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He intimated that it was his intention to renew the motion to postpone, and make the resolutions the special order for this day week, in the event of the motion for commitment being negatived.

The yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. SPEIGHT's motion, and it was negatived—Yeas 83, noes 91.

The resolution was then postponed to Monday next.

ASSAY OFFICES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the same bills as yesterday; when "the bill for establishing assay offices in the gold region" was resumed.

Mr. ROOT asked, whether that seemed now to be constitutional, which, on another occasion, in the estimation of some gentlemen, at least, was not so? Here was an attempt made to establish offices for the inspection of a commodity for exportation, and to render the measure constitutional by appending it to the mint. The right of inspection was one which the United States had always reserved and exercised, and still should hold and exercise. But would the assaying of gold belong to the mint by the provisions of the present bill as now amended? and four new assay offices, connected with the mint, were asked for. Would it be for these establishments to ascertain the fineness of an ingot of gold, stamp the value upon it, and then let it pass for money? It might, indeed, practically pass as coin, because the coin of this country being worth more than its specified value, persons receiving these ingots might dispose of them advantageously. But would this stamped ingot pass as a legal tender in payment of debts? This attempt to establish the constitutionality of the measure, by appending the proposed assay offices to the mint, was getting round the constitution in a way, ingenious, indeed, but not novel. But would these offices belong to the mint? They would not. And if they should actually belong to it, then the House ought to pause before it passed the bill. To have four assay offices at a distance from the mint would not give the gold a tendency towards the mint, it would rather give it another direction. Last year, gold to the value of half a million of dollars was taken to the mint to be refined, assayed, and stamped; but it was not for the purpose of circulation. It was taken there for cheapness, and because this was done at the United States' expense. The mint must mix one-twelfth alloy with the gold, and fine gold would sell for more than gold so alloyed. But such were the powers of chemistry, that, if the gold was alloyed with silver alone, the silver could be extracted without expense; the silver obtained in the process being looked upon as an equivalent for the labor of the process. It ought to be alloyed with copper. It was evidently the interest of the proprietor of bullion to take it elsewhere than to the mint, because the mint not only assays, but must alloy the metal. These offices would, therefore, direct the gold elsewhere; it would drive bullion from the mint, whilst it was assayed and stamped at the national expense, for the purpose of being sent out of the country. If a law were passed to regulate the value of gold, gold enough would be taken to the mint to be coined; there would be no occasion for district assay offices for that purpose; it would make gold coin current in the country for what it was worth. Until then, the assay offices would not attract gold to the mint; they would give it a different direction. The law ought to be allowed to remain as it was. There was no necessity for putting the United States to the expense of twenty thousand dollars a year for no national purposes or use whatever. The mint was only of use to the United States in the coining of silver and copper. It was of no use to the States that two hundred thousand eagles, or that amount in eagles and half eagles, were coined at the mint last year. The nation was at twenty or thirty thousand dollars expense, but it was for the benefit of the proprietor of the gold, and for the jeweller, who, knowing the quantity of alloy contained in the gold so assayed and coined, could add more, and reduce the metal to the goldsmith's standard. The only advantage that could arise from the proposed assay offices was, that dealers would not be so liable to be imposed upon by Jews and sharpers as they used to be. If the law were made as it should be, there would be no occasion to invite gold to the mint. He hoped the amendment would be stricken out. It made the bill worse than it was in its first form, inasmuch as it made it appear to be a constitutional measure, when he could not conceive that to be the fact.

On motion of Mr. E. EVERETT, the further consideration of the bill was postponed.

LAND TO DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUMS.

The committee then resumed the consideration of the bill granting a township of land to the New England institution for the blind, and another to the New York asylum for the deaf and dumb. The question being on an amendment offered by Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, proposing a similar donation to the asylum in Ohio,

Mr. VINTON offered, by way of substitute, an amendment for the same object, but so worded as to put the donation on the same footing as the school-fund was placed by the laws of Ohio.

Mr. IRVIN accepted the amendment as a modification of his own.

Mr. VINTON observed, that two donations of a similar quantity of land had been heretofore granted by Congress; one to the institution for the deaf and dumb, in Connecticut, and the other for that in Kentucky. The State of Ohio had also a school for the indigent deaf and dumb, but it had been incorporated and endowed by the State.

This building had cost twenty-seven or thirty thousand dollars. The Legislature had been encouraged by the hope that the General Government would extend the same liberality (he might say justice) towards that State which it had towards others. Being without funds, the Legislature had appropriated a small fund derived from auction sales for the aid of the institution; it might amount, in all, to about three thousand dollars. In support of the amendment, Mr. V. sent to the Clerk's table a message from the Governor of Ohio to the Legislature, detailing the present condition of the institution; which was read, and the amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT proposed an amendment, by way of substitute, for part of the first section of the bill. The amendment was rendered necessary by the fact that the bill, as it stood, made the grant conformable to the grants made to Connecticut and Kentucky: but these grants were not alike; and as the grant in the bill could not be like both, some difficulty would arise in interpreting the law.

Mr. WICKLIFFE suggested the propriety of placing the same limit to this grant as had been done in the case of Kentucky, viz: that the whole quantity of land should be located in one tract. To allow it to be located in small quantities made the grant of much greater value.

Mr. EVERETT admitted this, and said that that was its recommendation to him. As the object was beneficent, the ampler the grant the more good would be done. Though the grant to Kentucky had originally required the whole to be in one body, the law, he believed, had afterwards received a different construction, and the location had been made in the same manner as that of the land given to the Connecticut Asylum.

Mr. BELL thought it would be better for gentlemen to wait until they should see what would be the fate of the proposition to adopt a uniform rule as to the distribution of the public domain. He did not doubt the sincerity of the manifestation which had been made on this subject at the last session. Since then, they had had what seemed to be a counter-proposition. Did gentlemen, by urging the present bill, think to get the start of any final arrangement which should take place in relation to the public lands? How could those gentlemen, who were in favor of giving the lands to settlers at a price which should do no more than cover the expense of survey, consent to put so large a portion of the public domain into the hands of corporations who might hold it up at a high price? This donation was pressed on the ground that a similar one had been made to the States of Connecticut and Kentucky. But if this argument were valid, they would have to go round the Union, and give to all the States. All the States contained deaf and dumb, and blind; and if no asylum had been established in some, it was because their means of public charity were less. And if there were to be distinctions and partiality in legislation, he thought the weak ought first to be relieved. They, in the Southwest portion of the Union, needed such aid more than their brethren in the North and East. He thought some uniformity should be observed. Let these partial donations be suspended until a general rule could be agreed upon. As a test of the sense of the committee, he would move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, [i. e. to destroy it.]

Mr. VINTON expressed great surprise at the objection, as coming from the gentleman from Tennessee, on the ground of inequality. The gentleman had inquired whether Ohio wished to get the start in a distribution of the public lands? This was a very pertinent inquiry. How stood the fact? The State that gentleman represented had received from the General Government, out of the public domain, 100,000 acres for colleges, and 100,000 acres more for academies; amounting, in all, to nine or ten townships; while none of the new States had obtained as much, and Ohio not a foot. He would ask that gentleman, in turn, whether, if a uniform rule should be adopted, he was willing to disgorge before a distribution should be made? He believed the gentleman would say no. It was singular that the gentleman from Tennessee and himself should always be found acting diametrically opposite on subjects relating to the public domain. When bills were proposed granting gratuities to individuals who had no other claim upon the Government than what arose from a trespass on the public land; when bills were proposed to grant (without any one's being aware of it) ten times as much as was given by this bill, the gentleman had always been in favor, and himself always opposed to them. Mr. V. went on the principle that as the public lands constituted a common fund, it was to be used just as the revenues of the treasury were to be used; and, therefore, while he should refuse to grant them for the benefit of individuals, he would go as far as any gentleman in appropriating them for useful public purposes. What was the objection to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts? Why, that the grantees in the bill were allowed to go, as all other purchasers of the public land went, and select tracts where they liked best. In the case of Kentucky, the land was required to be located in one entire township; and in that of Connecticut, it might not be in less tracts than of four sections. The objection urged, and with some force, against those bills had been, that they enabled the grantees to hold up large quantities of land from settlement, in order to avail themselves of the increased value arising from the settlements around. This objection was met and removed by the amendment. The practice of permitting locations in small quantities was so far from being a novelty, that it might be considered now as the established policy of the House. Mr. V. quoted various acts in confirmation of this remark. The gentleman from Tennessee had spoken about granting away a very large share of the public lands. Indeed! Should the amendment be adopted, the bill would grant away three townships of land; and what did that amount to? Not the hundredth part, not the three hundredth part, of one million of acres, out of the thousands of millions which had been given away to any who would take them. He had nothing further to say, than that what was now proposed was no more than had been granted for the benefit of colleges.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said he was opposed to all special grants of the public lands; but, if any grant of this character was to be made, it ought to be equally enjoyed by all the States. He, therefore, moved an amendment.

But it was pronounced by the CHAIR not now to be in order.

Mr. EVERETT suggested that the motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill was not in order, until the friends of the bill had had an opportunity of rendering it as perfect as they could.

The CHAIR replied that a motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill was, at all times, in order.

Mr. BELL said that some of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] were such as demanded a reply. The gentleman had observed that he and Mr. B. were always opposed to each other on subjects of this kind; but he could remind the gentleman, if it were worth while, that he had been opposed to many of his own friends in relation to the bills granting land to private settlers, to which the gentleman had also been opposed. When he had asked whether the gentleman from Ohio wished to get the start of any general provision for disposing of the public lands, he had intended nothing invidious by the remark; far from it. He had only called gentlemen to the fact that it might be supposed they had such an intention. However himself and the gentleman from Ohio might differ on some matters, in relation to this general subject they did not differ at all. On one, however, they differed most essentially. He never had permitted himself to be governed by feelings of an invidious character, or indulged in remarks which went to draw comparisons between the States as to what they had received from the General Government. Yet it had been his fate to endure this tirade of abuse from the gentleman from Ohio, whenever his State was adverted to. Mr. B. wished to disabuse the committee as to what they had heard. It was not true that the State of Tennessee had received what the gentleman had stated. In 1806 she had received a donation of 206,000 acres of land for colleges; but it was of land which did not rightfully belong to the United States, but was sold over the heads of settlers who had been upon it all their lives, and who had a pre-emption right to the land they held; and the State had never been able to make the land available to one-fourth part of the minimum price established by law.

It was true that the Legislature of the State had laid claim to another portion of lands to which they maintained that the United States had no just right. Of the prudence of this step, on the part of the Legislature, he should express no opinion. But he disclaimed utterly all imputations of selfishness on this subject. He had been opposed to many projects in that House, which would have been for the benefit of his own State, and had sacrificed largely to what he believed would tend to the peace and harmony of all the States. He had never governed his votes by any consideration of what the State of Ohio got, or did not get. He was in favor of the adoption of any rule that would give general satisfaction; and he trusted that Congress would express its sentiment as to the impropriety of proceeding in the present course of partial legislation.

Mr. B. denied having intended to say that the land now proposed to be appropriated formed a large proportion of the public domain. What he meant had been this: that, if Congress should proceed in the course proposed by this bill, and others of a similar character, a large portion of the public lands would have to be given away in such donations; and that they would interfere with the adoption of any general and equitable rule of distribution.

Mr. CLAY said that the proposition in this bill, as it had been originally reported, was of sufficient importance to deserve the consideration of the House, but the adoption of the amendment had given it a much more important aspect. In fact, the whole character of the bill had been changed. At first, it had been proposed to make a donation only of such lands as had been exposed for sale at private entry; but as the bill now stood, land might be selected which had never been offered at sale at all, and in tracts as small as eighty acres. This went beyond what had ever been done even by the new States where the lands lay. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] had given notice that he should offer an amendment extending a similar donation to all the States of the Union. In conducting the discussion, subjects had been introduced which he considered as wholly irrelevant—the propriety of granting pre-emption rights, and the character and merits of the settlers of land. He would, therefore, move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. EVERETT said that, out of respect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] and in compliance with the wishes of some of his friends, he would modify his amendment, so as to insert, after the word "land," the words "subject to entry at private sale."

Mr. IRVIN said he believed the Government did not own a single foot of land in Ohio, which had not been offered for entry.

The question was now taken on Mr. BELL's motion

H. OF R.]

Relations with Buenos Ayres.

[Dec. 21, 1832.]

to strike out the enacting clause, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurring on Mr. EVERETT'S amendment,

Mr. CLAY wished him to modify it so as to limit the time of sale to five years.

Mr. EVERETT expressed his regret that he was unable to comply with the suggestion. It was the interest of the grantees to sell as soon as possible; the land was of no value to them until it was sold; to limit a time, within which the land must be sold, would compel the holders to sacrifice the land.

Mr. EVERETT'S amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS now offered his amendment in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That there is hereby granted to each and every State which has not heretofore received such grant, one entire township of land, on the same terms and conditions as are contained in the first section of this act, to be appropriated by said States for the support and maintenance of schools or asylums for the education of the deaf and dumb, and blind, in said States respectively.

Mr. SEMMES suggested the propriety of modifying the amendment, so as to allow States where there was no institution for the deaf and dumb, to send them abroad into other States. This was done by the State of Maryland, notwithstanding large appropriations had been made by the Legislature for the deaf and dumb of the State, who were, nevertheless, sent to the institution in Philadelphia.

Mr. SLADE offered an amendment to the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, as follows:

"Or in case any State shall have no such school or asylum within its limits, for the support and maintenance of its deaf and dumb, at such schools or asylums as it may direct."

Mr. WILLIAMS accepted it as a modification.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, observed that there was a principle contained in the amendment, which was of the greatest importance. It had been suggested, with a view of carrying out the idea advanced by the same gentleman who had offered the amendment, viz: that the public lands were a common fund for the benefit of all the States of the Union; hence it was proposed to make the same grant to every State. The principle to which he alluded was, that the United States might rightfully prescribe to the States the purposes to which they should apply their own property. He trusted the committee were not prepared to establish such a principle as this. If gentlemen looked at the principles of this grant, and at the gross and palpable inequality in which it must result, they must be sensible that the advantages to be gained would not be sufficient to compensate for the monstrous principle that would be established. If the object was uniformity, this measure would effectually prevent it; but if, as had been asserted, the public lands were to be viewed in the same light as so much money in the treasury, then he utterly denied the right of Congress to make any such application of it. He was gratified at witnessing the position taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, and hoped to see a more unequivocal expression of the opinions of the House in its favor. He was opposed to the amendment, as involving the right of Congress to distribute the public lands unequally among the States, and to dictate to the States how they must dispose of their own property. His original opposition to the bill had been greatly strengthened and confirmed by the amendment which had been offered.

Mr. BATES, of Maine, inquired of the gentleman from North Carolina whether he would modify his amendment, so as to add after "deaf and dumb" the words "or blind."

Mr. WILLIAMS consented.

The question was then taken on the amendment as thus modified, and decided as follows: Yeas, 78; noes, 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, moved a further amendment, so as to allow the land appropriated to be taken out of any land belonging to the States not otherwise appropriated. The grants, hitherto, had all been located in the Territories.

This amendment was also agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER moved to add after the word "States" the words "and Territories;" but it was negatived.

Mr. McKENNAN (to cover the possibility of the rejection of Mr. WILLIAMS'S amendment, when the bill should come into the House) moved an amendment, granting a township to the Pennsylvania institution; but it was negatived.

As was also an amendment proposed by Mr. WICKLIFFE, to include the District of Columbia.

Mr. JENIFER offered an amendment, giving power to the States receiving the land to apply it to any purpose of education they might prefer.

This was negatived.

Mr. CLAY moved a proviso, limiting the period of sale to five years.

Mr. EVERETT accepted this as a modification.

The committee then rose, and reported.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21.

RELATIONS WITH BUENOS AYRES.

The following resolution, offered some days since by Mr. ADAMS, came up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, so far as in his opinion may comport with the public interest, the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of the republic of Buenos Ayres, which has resulted in the departure of the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States from that city.

Mr. ADAMS modified the resolution, by adding the words "and instructions to said Chargé d'Affaires."

He said that he did not know that there would be any opposition to this resolution. It related to the question between the United States and the Government of Buenos Ayres. [Mr. A. here quoted the message of the President at the opening of the last session, in which the difficulty with the Government of Buenos Ayres is stated, and the intention of sending out a Chargé d'Affaires to settle it.] The minister had been sent accordingly; but, after some negotiation, he had returned without effecting an adjustment of our difficulties with that Government. Before his return, the Executive had declared in his message of this year—

"I refrain from making any communication on the subject of our affairs with Buenos Ayres, because the negotiation communicated to you in my last annual message was, at the date of our last advices, still pending, and in a state that would render a publication of the details inexpedient."

Since the date of this communication, the negotiation referred to had terminated, and the Chargé had returned. It appeared to Mr. A. that the subject was one which deserved the attention of Congress. The country seemed to be, towards one of the Governments of South America, in a condition approaching to a state of war. It was the duty of Congress to ascertain what was the nature of our difference with that Government, and whether any measures were necessary for the protection of the commerce of the people of the United States. There was an additional reason for the adoption of the resolution. Since the rupture of the negotiation the Government of Buenos Ayres had published in the Spanish language the correspondence between the two Governments, together with a communication from the Buenos Ayrean Minister of Foreign Affairs to that republic, in which it was represented that that Government had cause of complaint against the Government of the United States; and there was reason to believe that the impression existing there was strongly against the United States. The minister there stated that his Government had a claim for indemnity on this country for outrages committed against its citizens, and for which they should rely upon the justice of the United States. Under these circumstances he had deemed it his duty to present this resolution.

Mr. ARCHER (chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations) observed that there was no ground to fear a war with Buenos Ayres. It was true that the negotiations between the two Governments had been suspended; but that of Buenos Ayres had since then manifested a disposition to renew it at this place. He presumed there could not be the least objection to a full disclosure of all the resolution called for.

The resolution was then agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. WICKLIFFE, next came up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House a list of all appointments made by the Executive since the 13th of April, 1826, from the members of Congress during their term of service, and for twelve months thereafter; stating the names of the persons appointed; the State or Territory by them represented; the time when they were appointed; the nature of the appointment conferred; and the amount of salary or their emoluments received by virtue of such appointment.

Mr. FOSTER said that he had never opposed any call for information in that House, provided he considered the information sought by it to be useful and important. Since he had first heard the present resolution read, he had thought seriously upon the subject of it, and was wholly unable to imagine one single useful purpose that would be effected by the call, if it should be sent. It seemed a strange proceeding to call upon the President for what every member could obtain for himself; to call upon him for appointments made long before he came into office; to call on him for what could at any time be obtained by taking a walk to the other end of this building, and applying to the Secretary of the Senate. He presumed that all the appointments the gentleman wished to inquire about had passed through the Senate. The President would have to go back six or seven years, and compare all the appointments of the Government with lists of the members of different Congresses; and all to what purpose? From the source whence this resolution proceeded, and the resolution offered yesterday by the same gentleman on the subject of an amendment of the constitution, he should conjecture that the resolution had respect to such a measure. This object could be answered without any call upon the President.

He was with the gentleman in his proposed amendment of the constitution; but until such amendment should have actually been made, no resolution on that subject could have any binding effect. Could the resolution be designed as a reflection upon the President? Why, if the President had filled all the offices in the country from out of the two halls of Congress, no censure could affix itself to the measure so long as no clause in the constitution prohibited it. If the President was to be censured, the censure would light equally on all who had applied to him for office. Was it a greater crime to give an office to a member, than for a member to ask that office? The censure would go still further; it would touch not only all who had received office; but all who had asked it and been refused. There was no stopping place. He presumed there was hardly a gentleman in that House who had not been willing, at some time, to have received an office. He was sure he should. The censure, therefore, would reach from the President downward. It argued disrespect to the President to call upon him for information which every member could give in fifteen minutes. It implied a censure upon him which was wholly undeserved. It could lead to no good result; it could contribute no aid toward the adoption of the gentleman's amendment of the constitution, (which Mr. F. hoped soon to see inserted in that instrument;) and for all these reasons he should move to lay the resolution on the table. He would, however, withdraw the motion in favor of the mover, if he desired to submit any remarks in reply.

The motion having been withdrawn,

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, in reply, that he was afraid the gentleman had served his resolution very much as the pious Quaker was said to have done a dog that had offended him; he would not hurt the animal, but would give it a bad name; by which means he set all the boys of the neighborhood to pelt the poor beast to death. The gentleman had given his resolution a bad name; he had thrown out the fatal idea that it was disrespectful to the President. The gentleman could not certainly infer this from the language of the resolution; and if he inferred it from the source from whence the resolution proceeded, he was equally mistaken. That the resolution conveyed any censure against the President did not appear upon the face of it, nor could it be argued from the source whence the resolution had emanated. Mr. W. did not conceive it to be in any way disrespectful to the Chief Magistrate to call upon him for information which might become necessary to enlighten the House in its deliberations upon the public concerns. He was well aware, however, that if that was the character given to his resolution, or if it was even feared that such an inference might be drawn from it, his resolution was destined to share the fate of other matters which had been ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. W. denied that his resolution implied any censure either upon the appointed or the disappointed members of the House; nor was the information sought by it so easily obtained as the gentleman supposed. Even into the archives of the Senate, members of that House had no right to dive so long as the seal of secrecy remained on its executive proceedings. But were this otherwise, they must go further than the journals of the Senate. Some of the appointments might have to do with the Post Office Department; and for others it might become necessary to traverse the almost boundless regions of the Indian Department. It might be requisite to go to the books of the custom-house. There were some books in the bureaus that might possibly furnish much of this information in a condensed form. To all these sources the President had ready access, though the members of that House had not.

Mr. W. said he had offered a resolution containing a proposition for the amendment of the constitution in relation to the subject of appointments. Such an amendment he believed was desired by the great body of the people of this Union, but it could not originate with the people of the States unless it should first come from that House, except resort should be had to the tedious process of a convention of all the States. He thought it the duty of Congress to submit such a proposition to the Legislatures of the several States, and let them dispose of it.

He might be called upon to point out where was the great and alarming evil which called for remedy, and where was the danger of the growth of the evil? He might, to be sure, have recourse to newspaper statements; but then his faith would be regulated by the estimation in which they might chance to hold the integrity of the editors. There were many difficulties which he did not wish to encounter, in relying on any other but an official statement.

If this call was called disrespectful to the present incumbent of the Presidential Chair, other Presidents had been subjected to the like disrespect. The call was not without precedent. [Here Mr. W. referred to a similar call in Mr. Monroe's time.] As to applying to the President for what had transpired before he came into office, that was not very unusual, he believed. But he had a precedent directly in point. On the 26th of April, 1826, the House having under consideration a proposition to amend the constitution, called upon the President in these words: [here he quoted a call similar to his own.]

This resolution had passed without any imputation of censure on the mover of it, and it had been promptly answered. Thus a list was already furnished down to 1826. He now wished that list extended to the present time, so that the country might be satisfied either that such appointments were no evil, or, if they were, that the evil was rapidly increasing. Mr. W. concluded by expressing himself happy to find that the gentleman from Georgia was favorable to the amendment of the constitution he had proposed.

Mr. FOSTER said the reasons he had heard did not satisfy him that the resolution ought to pass, and he therefore renewed his motion to lay it upon the table; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. CLAYTON, who obtained the floor just as the hour allotted to resolutions expired.

The House, on motion, passed to the orders of the day; which embraced only private bills.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The resolution of Mr. WICKLIFFE, under discussion yesterday, coming up again this morning—

Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, (who had obtained the floor yesterday, but having been prevented by the expiration of the hour from addressing the House,) observed that he had not yesterday intended to occupy the attention of the House for a long time; nor should he have spoken at all, but that he found himself differing in opinion from his colleague, [Mr. FOSTER,] for whose opinions he cherished at all times the highest respect. He could not consider the call contained in this resolution, nor any call made by Congress for information from any other department of Government, as having been dictated by improper motives. He took it for granted that all calls proposed by members of Congress were designed to answer some useful purpose. Few propositions could be of greater importance or utility than the amendments of the constitution proposed by the gentleman who had offered the present resolution. It was an object which the people of Georgia had long been very anxious to see accomplished, in proof of which it would only be necessary to refer to the journals of that House. It would there appear that one of the most patriotic and talented of her sons had advocated a measure of the same character, and, he was under the impression, had preceded it by a resolution containing a similar call. Of that, however, he would not be positive. There was certainly precedent for it, as the honorable mover had yesterday satisfactorily shown. But Mr. C. was fully satisfied that neither the amendment desired by that gentleman, nor any other amendment of the constitution, would ever pass in that House, unless it was first known and thoroughly approved by the people of the Union. The only way of reaching and influencing public opinion was to put facts before the public mind. Mr. C.'s object was to enlighten the community, by presenting to it a condensed view of the mischief growing out of the existing state of things; and with this view he wished them to see a complete list of all the members of Congress who had been appointed to office by the Executive recommendation, with the amount of salary attached to the offices conferred on them. He had not the least expectation that such a statement would have any material effect before that House; what he wanted was, to spread it before the people. The trouble that such a call might occasion to the officers of Government formed no objection to the adoption of the resolution, and he hoped no such argument would ever be advocated in that House. If the officers were not well enough paid, he would engage to find applicants in abundance to fill the places they might resign. It was to prevent members the trouble of culling out from all the records of Government the facts they might have occasion to refer to in the discharge of their official duties, that members of the House were clothed with the right of making calls upon the departments. Nor was the call to be considered as in the least disrespectful to the President. Calls of a similar kind had been made upon his predecessors. It did not ask for a list of those appointments only which had been made during his own administration, but during those also which had preceded it. Mr. C. said he should not go into the expediency of the proposed amendments of the constitution; but he held that a call for information that might be useful to the country ought never to be opposed. Ours was a Government resting entirely upon public opinion, and it was the duty of the people's agents to enlighten that opinion; nor was any individual so high as to be exempt from public scrutiny. He concluded by again observing that nothing could be more desirable to the people of the South, and, he hoped, to the people of the Union generally, than the adoption of such an alteration in the constitution as that to which this call had immediate reference. There was a vulgar saying, which was not the less true or opposite from the lowness of the figure, that if you wished to murder the master you must first kill his watchdog.

Mr. SPEIGHT confessed that he entertained the same opinion in regard to the constitution as the gentleman from Georgia who had just taken his seat; but he could not see the necessity of making a call upon the Executive for information which was already well known by all intelligent men in the country who were in the habit of reading the newspapers. He did not attach so much importance to the proposed amendment as some gentlemen did, because he did not see so much evil to grow out of the existing practice as many others. The amendment presupposed that something wrong existed at present; that corruption had grown out of the appointment of members of Congress to public offices, or was likely to grow out of it. It could hardly happen that a gentleman of the intelligence of the mover of this resolution could propose such an amendment in the sacred charter of our liberties unless he apprehended some great evil. Now, it was wonderful to him that it could escape the gentleman's attention how easily this amendment might be evaded.

[Here the CHAIR reminded Mr. S. that he was speaking to a subject not before the House.]

Mr. S. said he hoped the resolution would not be adopted. The call did not go far enough back; let it commence in March, 1825. He was aware that the information prior to that time had already been given, but he had no doubt it slumbered and slept in the minds of the people.

[Here Mr. WICKLIFFE rose to say that, if this call should be agreed to, he would then move that the document already furnished, and which extended down to the year 1826, should be reprinted, so as to present the whole in one view.]

This, Mr. S. admitted, would render the call less exceptionable; and he desired to be understood as not imputing to the gentleman from Kentucky any intention unfriendly to the President in proposing this resolution. He had no doubt the gentleman was actuated by patriotic motives. But he had the right of considering the propriety of the measures he proposed. He was very sure there was not one man in the country, in the least conversant with politics, but knew the name of every member of Congress who had been appointed to office within the last eight or ten years. It was said that he could not collect a list of them in twenty-four hours. The gentleman must surely suppose that the records were somewhere locked up from all access. The gentleman asked whether he would give the House a list of such appointments: however able he might be, he saw no need of making such a statement at that time. Any member of the House could obtain the information with far less trouble than a clerk in the departments.

Appointments of Members of Congress.

Mr. BURGESS said that it seemed to be agreed, on all hands, that it was needful to know the number of Representatives that had been appointed by the Executive to salary offices under the Government. The only question seemed to be, how it was to be known. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPEIGHT] had just told the House that the number and the names of the members of Congress so appointed were in the knowledge of every man in the country who read the newspapers. Mr. B. confessed it was not within his; and if it were, he was very sure it was not in the knowledge of his constituents. Now, he did not consider it to be his duty to write to each one of them, nor to order an advertisement to be inserted in the papers giving them the list desired. But the gentleman has observed that every member of the House could apply at the departments and obtain the information for himself. Now, he desired to ask the gentleman which would occasion to the clerks of the departments the less trouble—to make out a list of these appointments for every member who should apply for it, or make out a single certificate in answer to this call, and have that multiplied by the press? What objection could there be to knowing how the fact stood? It was requisite that this information should be diffused among the people, in order to judge of the expediency of the amendment of the constitution which might be proposed to them. No successful objection could be urged against the call, for information of a similar kind had already been given as far down as 1826. Why must it stop there? Why were gentlemen so reluctant to spread this information before the public? What interpretation would the community naturally put upon such reluctance? Obviously, one not very friendly to the reputation of that House. It would be said that the members of the House of Representatives were unwilling that their names should go out to the people. Would it not strike them with the suspicion that all was not right? Such a suspicion was wholly unfounded. Mr. B. never would believe that the two Houses were to be purchased by offices of honor and preferment. He had ever been against the proposed amendment of the constitution. He would not admit that the members might be corrupted; but if they were corruptible, it was at least more honorable to the country, and more creditable to the Executive also, that they were bought by office, than if they had been purchased by money. Gentlemen might be assured that if the members of Congress were actually in the market, the consideration would be found to purchase them in that great fund of honor and profit which was at the Executive disposal. To oppose the publication of the names called for by the resolution, was to strengthen, in the most effectual manner, every suspicion that might lurk in the minds of the people; it went to cast a deep and lasting reflection not only on the Executive, but on the men themselves who seemed thus to dread the exposure.

Mr. ISACKS said that he was not sure the information sought by this resolution would, when obtained, compensate for the time occupied in the debate on its adoption; nor was he, on the other hand, convinced that any evil would follow it sufficient to make it worth while to offer serious objection to its adoption. One short argument would induce him to vote for the resolution. During the last administration (to which he was thought to be opposed) he had voted for a similar call; he was supposed to be friendly to the present administration, and he should be ashamed to record his vote against a resolution of the same tenor with that he had once advocated. Whether the result would be very beneficial or not, (and he believed it might be of some small service,) he should vote in its favor.

Mr. HOFFMAN observed that the present call included such members as had been appointed within twelve months after their term of service in Congress expired: he wished to know whether the former document, which terminated in 1826, required a similar statement?

Mr. WICKLIFFE replied that it extended only to six months after the expiration of the congressional term. He had extended the term in compliance with the views of some, who thought that a twelve month's quarantine was none too long.

Mr. ADAMS inquired whether the yeas and nays had been ordered on the adoption of the resolution.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Mr. ADAMS then said that, whether they should be ordered or not, he should vote in favor of the resolution; and that, not simply in compliance with the courtesy which was usually extended to all members who desired to obtain information from any of the departments. He should vote for the call, as he was satisfied, from the notice given by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] that he should follow it up by a motion for reprinting the information contained in a prior document of similar character with that now sought. As he understood it would not be in order to discuss at this time the amendment to the constitution, which was the basis of the present resolution, he should refrain from doing so. In voting for the resolution, however, he wished it to be understood that he did not at all agree in the views of its mover, in relation to the amendment of the constitution, which he had proposed. He held that any alteration of the constitution, on that point, instead of an amendment, would be a great deterioration of the constitution; and, if the House should indulge the gentleman with the information he had called for, (as he hoped it would,) and the proposal for an amendment should come before the House in order, Mr. A. reserved to himself the right of stating, in a few words, the grounds and reasons on which he was led to think that it would be one of the most pernicious alterations in the constitution that could be proposed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE now demanded the yeas and nays on his resolution, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. KENNON, of Ohio, said that he was in favor of the resolution. The amendment of the constitution, to which the resolution related, was not now a subject of discussion.

This resolution was intended, as he understood, to call out the names of all the members of Congress who had received Executive appointments to office within a given period; and when the answer should be obtained, it was to be printed in connexion with another document which carried the statement much further back. Now, if the information was called for at all, it was for the avowed purpose of enlightening the House and the public of the evils growing out of such appointments. The true point of inquiry obviously was, what influence the appointment of members of Congress to office had upon their course in that body. If a member had applied for an office, and afterwards received it, the fair inference seemed to be that the hope of it had induced that member to follow the will of the Executive in a manner other than would have been dictated by his own judgment and conscience. There was something in that; but if this was the object, the resolution ought to go further. It might happen that the Executive appointed a member on the ground of his known fitness for a particular office. When this was done without any application on the part of the member appointed, the motive to subserviency would not be the same. The true point to be got at, then, was this: what members had been applicants for office? He therefore offered the following amendment to the resolution: "and also the numbers and names of the members of Congress who, since the 1st of February, 1824, had been applicants, either by themselves or their friends, for office, or who had recommended others."

H. or R.

On this amendment Mr. CLAY demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that it would have given him great pleasure if the gentleman had moved this call in the shape of an original resolution. He should vote for it as it was, though he was apprehensive that it might swell the labors of the Executive so much as to delay the reply a little beyond the time he had hoped to receive it; but he should like to see the call extended a little further, so as to inquire who had been the applicants, which of them had been appointed, and the reason for such appointment? who had been removed from office, and the reason for such removal?

Mr. ADAMS said that he should be compelled, very reluctantly, to vote against the amendment, for the reason that it was very doubtful to him whether it would be in the power of the President to furnish the information sought. The call, he perceived, went back to the 1st of February, 1824, at which time the Executive of the United States was a person (Mr. Monroe) unfortunately now no more. Another person had been President since his term expired, so that the present Executive would not have it in his power to give a list of all the applications made, not only during his own, but throughout part of two preceding administrations. It was not consistent with the dignity of the House, nor with the rules of propriety, to send to the President of the United States a resolution which the House must know it would not be in his power to comply with. It might not be in his power to state what members had made application for office, even since the time of his own appointment. Application was often made verbally, and under circumstances which make it impossible that they should all be retained in his memory. Some applications were addressed to him in writing, and some of them were signed with the name of the applicant; but this was not always the case. Applications were made by members more frequently for their friends than for themselves. Mr. A. believed, sincerely, that it would be impossible for the President to comply with the call, even in reference to his own period of office. He knew it would with respect to that of his immediate predecessor; nor did he believe he could give the information in respect to the last year of Mr. Monroe's administration, which was included within the period stated in the amendment.

He should, therefore, be under the necessity of voting against it in that view. But he had another reason. It was a species of exposure of the individuals concerned. It seemed to imply that there was something wrong in members of Congress applying for offices under Government; and it seemed to hold such members up to the view of the community as guilty of some offence, if they had applied either on their own behalf, or that of their friends. There was something (he did not say in the intention of the mover, but in the measure itself) of an invidious kind. In the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky there was nothing of that kind. That call related only to official acts of the President, for which he was bound to answer when called upon; but here he was required to state the names of individuals who might have at any time held a conversation with him on the subject of appointments, either directly or otherwise, either for themselves or their friends, and with the best intentions; and all such persons were held out to the view of the nation as so many parasites, seeking, by flattery, to obtain Executive favor. Such a call was unworthy of that House.

Mr. BRANCH said that he should vote for the amendment. No adequate remedy could ever be applied to the evil complained of, unless the inquiry should go to this extent. It was proposed to amend the constitution so as to prevent the influence of Executive action on the debates and decisions of that body. To effect this end, they must first ascertain the actual extent of the evil.

Mr. B. said it was far from being his opinion that every application for office by members of either House was, in itself, an evil, or implied anything like crime; far from it. On the contrary, he was persuaded that many such applications sprang from the most patriotic motives, and the most honorable feelings; but he was as fully persuaded that many others were productive of subserviency to the Executive will, such as was utterly subversive of the freedom of debate. He thought it due to the people of the Union that they should know the number of members of Congress who had applied to the Executive for favors, and had received them; for he was convinced that no member of that House could do his duty as he ought to do it, so long as the desire of office tempted him into subserviency to the Executive will. He should vote for the amendment.

Mr. KENNON said that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] seemed to think that there was something invidious in the amendment, though not in the original resolution. On the point whether the constitution ought to be amended or not, Mr. K. had said nothing; but it was perfectly evident that the resolution had a direct reference to that subject. All seemed to agree that the evil to be remedied was the effect upon the Representative of the desire of office; and the true point of inquiry was whether the members of that House did feel and act under such influence. If they did, the public should know it. Now, if it should turn out to be a fact that almost every member of that House had applied to the Executive for office, and this fact came to the view of the public, then the public would see the necessity of having the constitution amended in this respect. As to the question whether it would or would not be in the power of the Executive to comply with the call, the gentleman from Massachusetts was much better acquainted with the facts on that subject than he could be: but this formed no objection to the amendment, because, if it was not in the power of the President to furnish the information, all that the President had to do was to say so.

Mr. FOSTER observed that the debate of this morning had fully confirmed him in the opinion he had early expressed, that this resolution was calculated to do no good, especially as one-half of the gentlemen who had advocated the call had declared, in advance, that they should oppose the amendment of the constitution, to which alone the call had reference. If he could think that the judgment of one member on that floor would really be controlled by the reply to that call, he would not oppose it. But it was not so; and, as he was anxious to have the constitution amended, and saw that, in pressing this resolution, the House was about to blend a mere party warfare with the great principles of the constitution, he could not yield it his support. If they pushed their inquiries so far as to ask who had applied for office, they ought to go the whole length, and find out who had wanted office. He had no doubt many members had wanted office, and did not get it, who were much better fit for it than those who did. He concluded by renewing his

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. WICKLIFFE, coming up again for consideration—

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House a list of all appointments made by the Executive since the 13th of April, 1826, from the members of Congress during their term of service, and for twelve months thereafter; stating the names of the persons appointed; the State or Territory by them represented; the time when they were appointed; the nature of the appointment conferred; and the amount of salary, or their emoluments received by virtue of such appointment:

Together with the following amendment thereto proposed by Mr. KENNON:

"And, also, the numbers and names of the members of Congress who, since the first of February, 1824, had been applicants, either by themselves or their friends, for office, or who had recommended others."

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. FOSTER, to lay the resolution and amendments on the table, it was decided by yeas and nays: Yeas, 54; nays, 116.

YEAS.—Messrs. Adair, Anderson, Archer, John S. Barbour, James Bates, Beardley, James Blair, Boon, Bouck, John Brodhead, John C. Brodhead, Burd, Carr, Chandler, Chinn, Claiborne, Silas Condit, Connor, Craig, Davenport, Dayan, Doubleday, Edward Everett, Fitzgerald, Ford, Foster, Gaither, Gilmore, Gordon, Harper, Hoffman, Holland, Hubbard, Jewett, R. White, Wickliffe, Williams, Young—116.

The question being on Mr. KENNON's amendment,

Mr. L. CONDUCT moved to amend the amendment, by inserting a clause extending the call so as to embrace a statement of the particular offices sought, the time of their application, and any letters in the possession of the President relating thereto.

Mr. ISACKS said that he would, in a few words, explain his reasons for voting against both amendments. He thought gentlemen were carrying this matter too far, and were making light of what might possibly prove to be a very useful call. To request the President to ransack his private papers to see who had made applications for office, or who had recommended others, when very probably some of the letters had been mislaid or lost, was entering on a concern which Mr. I. thought the House might as well let alone. Besides, the call, if agreed to, would not reach the object. If the object of gentlemen was to ascertain the names of all who had made applications for office, both principals and endorsers, they would find that they were unable to accomplish it. Gentlemen could not but know that many of those applications were not made in writing, but in verbal conversation. Some members might have thought themselves on terms sufficiently intimate to go to the President in person, and to say to him that such or such an office would be acceptable; not, perhaps, for themselves, but for some other person. Mr. I. had no doubt—indeed, he knew that such applications were often made verbally. Could all these conversations be recollected? Gentlemen could not expect it. He could remember but very few of them, either of the names of the persons applying, or those in whose favor the applications were made. The call would, therefore, not go half way towards effecting the object it sought to accomplish. He was opposed to it entirely; not, however, because he had the least fear his name could be found in any of the pigeon-holes of the Executive Department as an application for office, either in his own behalf, or that of any other member of Congress. But he thought the whole inquiry one which the House of Representatives should not seriously present to the President of the United States.

Mr. BARRINGER observed that he had, for years past, looked with anxiety to see some supplemental article appended to the constitution, such as that which had been proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky; and he was ready to join in any measure that might tend to show the propriety of such an amendment. And as the call contained in the original resolution had this tendency, he was disposed to sustain it. But he was indisposed to do, in this matter, what he considered as unnecessary towards a right understanding of what the House was called to do. He entirely concurred in the sentiments just expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ISACKS.] The object of the amendment to the resolution was foreign to the proposed amendment of the constitution. Mr. B. had no desire to expose any gentleman in the House. Not that he had personally any thing to apprehend; for he had neither applied for office himself, nor had he asked in behalf of any member of Congress. But he entreated gentlemen to state what useful end could possibly be effected by the adoption of such a call. Was any member of Congress, who might have applied for an appointment under the Government, either for himself or his friends, to be held up as derelict and base? Was it to cast odium upon the names of gentlemen? Was it not as lawful, as right, as legitimate, (if he might use that word,) for members of Congress to apply for office as it was for any other person? Did the constitution forbid it? So long as that instrument retained its present form, this could not be any crime. He concluded by expressing his hope that the House would adopt neither of the amendments.

The question being then taken, Mr. CONDUCT's amendment was negatived without a count.

Mr. KENNON's amendment was also negatived by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUMS.

The bill granting a township of land to the New England asylum for the blind, and to the New York asylum for the deaf and dumb, as reported with sundry amendments from the Committee of the Whole, came up in course.

Mr. VINTON moved to add a proviso restricting the State receiving, in which the land lay, from taxing it at a higher rate than other lands of the State; which was agreed to.

The question then being on ordering the bill to a third reading,

Mr. ROOT, of New York, said, that he had strong objections to the bill; and he wished to know whether there was a majority of the members, and if there was, who they were, that were willing to grant away a portion of the public lands for purposes the control of which pertained exclusively to the State Governments, and to distribute the public domain among the different States in equal quantities, whether those States were great or small. The public lands belonged to all the States, and to each in the proportion in which that State was bound to pay a direct tax. Those lands were helden by cession from the States, by purchase from other Governments, or by conquest. Omitting the large purchases of Florida and Louisiana, the greater part of the residue had been acquired by conquest. They were denominated crown lands, but remained within the jurisdiction of some of the colonies. It had been agreed, at the revolution, that they should be holden as a general fund, and owned by the several States in proportion as direct taxes were imposed by the old Congress. At first, and early in the revolution, these taxes had been laid according to a valuation of the lands; but, subsequently, and by the old Congress, this had been changed for the ratio at present established. This had been, in fact, a compact of the other States with the States ceding their vacant lands for the general good; which contract it was now proposed by the bill to violate, openly, by distributing the land for other objects, and in equal quantities to each State.

The provisions of this bill, in his judgment, put at defiance that clause of the constitution in relation to the public lands, which, though it authorizes Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them, yet provides that nothing therein shall be construed to prejudice the claims of the United States or of any particular State to them: that is, the claim of the United States to them as a general fund, for the benefit of all; and of each particular State, in its just proportion, according to its federal numbers.

The propriety of passing the provisions of the bill as originally reported, and of the amendments made in committee, is urged from the circumstances that some years ago, in an improvident moment, an appropriation of a portion of the public domain was made to aid an institution at Hartford, in Connecticut, for the instruction of the deaf and dumb. Thus, this act of misguided charity is seized upon as a precedent, and is made use of as an entering wedge, to open the way, not only for an unequal distribution of a general fund, but indirectly to stretch the power of the General Government over the States, to the regulation of their internal policy and public instruction, under the guise of extending its charities, to usurp the powers which belong to the States, and to them alone. He was for distributing the avails of the public lands among the several States in their just proportions, and leaving it to them to make their application either for the instruction of the deaf and dumb, the blind, or otherwise unfortunate, or in such other manner as they may think proper. He repeated his call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said that he concurred heartily in the opinion just expressed by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Root:] and as he should be constrained to vote against the engrossment of the bill, he deemed it his duty to state the reasons on which his vote would be founded.

The bill, though unpretending in its title, contained three principles of great importance, to neither of which he could yield his assent. 1st. It assumed that it was competent for Congress, out of the common fund of the public lands, to endow particular charitable institutions within the States. 2d. That the public domain might be distributed among all the States as integral members of the Union, in equal portions, without regard to their respective population. 3d. That it was within the power of Congress to prescribe to the States the uses they shall make of the land thus given to them by the General Government. And he called the attention of the House to the subject, in order that he and the public might know what the powers were which Congress, in this bill, undertook to exercise, and which, it might reasonably be expected, would govern its future measures in regard to the public lands.

1. The bill maintained, or took it for granted, that it was competent for Congress to endow charitable institutions within the State: a power which he was very confident the framers of the constitution never dreamed of conferring; and which, in practice, must involve the most inconvenient, if not dangerous and disgraceful consequences. There was not a literary institution in this wide country that did not stand in need of pecuniary aid; and many as much as those for whose benefit this bill was intended. Mr. M. said he felt every degree of regard and sympathy for the unfortunate beings whom it was designed to benefit: but there was not a literary institution in the country which might not present as high claims as these institutions did; other public charities, the lunatic asylums, the almshouses, the orphan asylums, and those numberless enterprises of benevolence which abound in our country, might present as strong a demand on the patronage and liberality of the General Government, and might with equal reason petition Congress for a donation out of the public funds of the nation. If the principle of this bill was to be sanctioned, there would be none which Congress might not, if it pleased, endow. Every institution for literary or philosophical purposes might come and ask for a share of the public domain. Congress might endow a college, or erect an observatory, in every quarter of the country. He trusted the House would not give its deliberate sanction to a principle like this. He asked, by what reading of the constitution was this power derived? in what part of that instrument was it to be found? He was aware that there were some who contended that Congress could make disposition of the public lands, to which the revenue in the treasury could not be subjected; and, on that principle, this bill seemed to be founded. In this opinion he could not concur: neither could he concede the authority claimed for the precedents established by the Government in former legislation. There had, indeed, occurred two or three instances of similar grants, adopted with but little deliberation; and two or three only: for he denied that the provision in the compacts with the new States on their admission into the Union, by which the sixteenth section in each township was set apart for the use of common schools, were at all a parallel case. In that case, the States receiving the benefit had given to the United States more than an equivalent. Because the public lands were exempt from State taxation for a number of years after their sale; and, for himself, he considered the States as having given up more than they gained by that arrangement. Besides, a grant of this kind admitted of defence on the ground that the Government, as a great landholder, might appropriate a portion of its property in such a manner as to promote the sale of the residue, and, by affording facilities of education, encourage the settlement of the country; but these reservations were far from justifying the claim to power set up in this bill. The principle it contained was without possible limit. There was not a county or a neighborhood in the whole country to which a donation for the purposes of education would not be acceptable.

2. But the bill contained another principle, if possible still more obnoxious: it asserted that it was fair and equi-able to divide the public lands in equal portions among the States, without regard to their respective population—a rule of distribution wholly unjustifiable, whether you consider the lands as purchased by money out of the common treasury, or as originally ceded by the States claiming the waste and unappropriated territory within their respective limits, after the revolution. As had already been observed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Root,] it was inconsistent with the conditions expressed in the various cession acts which conveyed these lands to the United States. Whoever examined those instruments would perceive that such a distribution of the common property of the Union was utterly repugnant to the views and purposes of the parties ceding. What was the express condition on which the fund was created? That it should be a common fund belonging to the whole Union, and should be administered on the same principle as all the other resources of the country, principally for the payment of the public debt; but, if otherwise applied, for the common defence and general welfare, subject to the limitations of the constitution. If the lands now held by the Government, or the proceeds of the annual sales, are to be distributed, there was no justice in departing from the principle that the federal numbers of the population of the several States should govern the distribution of their funds. Did this bill observe that rule? It did not. According to the bill, the State of Rhode Island was to have as large a share of the public domain as New York. Such a distribution utterly subverted the principle on which the cessations of that domain had been made. If, then, the conditions imposed by the ceding States are to be respected, the rule prescribed in the bill cannot be adopted. Nor, said Mr. M., can it be considered just, if you regard the lands as purchased by the revenues of the Government, derived to the treasury by your duties on foreign commerce. That system of revenue was believed to be grossly unequal in its operations; and the mode of distribution proposed certainly did not remove the inequality. But it was a mistake to suppose that the revenue derived through the custom-houses had been aided by the sales of the public lands in paying the public debt.

Mr. M. said that a very interesting document had been furnished to the House at the last session from the Treasury Department, which he was sorry to observe had not attracted that share of notice which its importance deserved; it was an account of the public lands with the United States, stated by way of debit and credit; from which it would appear that the public domain, so far from having accomplished its original object, the payment of the public debt, as a fund, was debtor to the treasury to the amount of eleven millions of dollars. Mr. M. professed himself at a loss to conceive how gentlemen, who held that the proposition to divide the surplus revenue in the treasury among the States was unconstitutional, could support this bill, or any other which in any mode diverted the sales of the public lands from the treasury, and made a distribution of that portion of the revenues. He could not conceive how such a distinction could be taken. For himself, he could not doubt that, if in any form a distribution of the public lands was had, the necessary and inevitable consequence must be, that the surplus in the treasury, derived from the custom-houses, after meeting the annual appropriations, would, in like manner, be distributed—a consequence deeply to be deprecated. But if that obnoxious measure was, indeed, to come upon the country, would any man deem it just to take the number, merely, of the States, as the measure of distribution?

3. The bill involved another principle equally objectionable, viz: that it was competent to Congress to prescribe to the States the uses to which they were to apply their own property. If it were true that the public domain did not constitute a common fund, and that its avails were of the same character as the other revenues of the country, and to be distributed in the same manner, he should like to know where Congress got the power to do what was now proposed? If the purpose for which these lands had originally been ceded had been accomplished, and the original motives for retaining the public lands no longer existed, and therefore a distribution was to be made of them, where was it that Congress obtained the power of dictating to the States how they were to employ their respective portions? Congress here undertook to say to the States that they should not have a certain portion of the public lands, unless they should apply it to the support of institutions for the deaf and dumb. This was inconsistent with the arrangement according to which the fund was acquired, and ought to be distributed. Mr. M. never could yield his consent to so monstrous a principle. Observe its consequences. In this mode Congress might, by indirection, exercise powers exclusively belonging to the State Legislatures, and which none would claim for this Government; indeed, it might wholly deprive any State of its share of the public property, unless that State would consent to become the agent of its designs. Suppose that Congress should prescribe that the lands distributed should be used for purposes of colonizing some portion of the population within the States; and suppose that the State of Georgia or Virginia should object to such an application of her portion, and refuse to make the necessary laws; she could receive no portion of the public domain, while the States more yielding, and whose policy or interests such measures would promote, would receive theirs. It is therefore idle, if not absurd, to undertake to divide the lands among the States by a law which makes them but your agents in executing plans which you devise, and applying this portion to purposes which you prescribe. He trusted the House would not establish a principle like this. If the public lands belonged to the States, let the States hold them free from all restriction by Congress. If they possessed, let them enjoy; and let not their rights be trammelled with conditions imposed without their suggestion, but which might be against their wishes. If the public lands were to be given away, let them be given freely; if they were to be distributed, let them be distributed justly. If Congress must assume the patronage of literature, and the endowment of charitable establishments within the States, let them do it by a general system. And let not every neighborhood be invited to send in its memorial for a portion of the public funds, to be appropriated to purposes not confided to the General Government, and for which it is wholly incompetent wisely to legislate.

South Carolina Convention.

Mr. M. said he had felt some diffidence in occupying so much of the time of the House in considering this bill, which, nominally, was of a very limited extent; but, with the amendments adopted, had, in his judgment, assumed a character of momentous importance. Some, perhaps, might think it but a small affair. Others might suppose him to be opposed to education through the country, or insensible to the claims of the destitute and unfortunate. No man was more anxious than he was to see the blessings of education dispensed, by proper means, to every class and condition in our country. He believed it to be the great parent of public virtue, and the surest support of our free institutions. He sympathized most deeply with those unfortunate human beings for whose improvement the institutions, aided by this bill, are designed. Yet he could not, as a Representative of the people, charged with high duties, and limited powers, and sworn to support and to execute the constitution, conscientiously support a measure, even for these benevolent purposes, which, in his judgment, was inconsistent with those powers, and unauthorized by the constitution. Such he conceived to be the objections to the bill under consideration; and he should, therefore, vote at once for its rejection.

Mr. VANCE offered the following amendment, which was agreed to:

"That no location shall be made on lands ceded to the United States by any of the Indian tribes, in which they have reserved a remainder."

The question being then put on ordering the bill to its third reading, and it was decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allen, Heman Allen, Allison, Anderson, Appleton, Arnold, Ashley, Babcock, Banks, Barstow, Isaac C. So the bill was rejected.

Mr. ROOT, however, immediately moved a reconsideration, with a view to propose an amendment distributing the avails of the public lands among the several States of the Union, for a definite time, according to their proportions of a direct tax. He moved a postponement of the question till to-morrow, which the House refused; but immediately adjourned.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 27.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION.

The following resolution, heretofore moved by Mr. ADAMS, came up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a copy of his proclamation, dated on the 10th instant, and of the ordinance of a convention held in the State of South Carolina, to which it refers.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, moved the question of consideration, viz: whether the House will, at this time, consider the resolution? and demanded the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. ARCHER observed, that the gentleman from Alabama need not press his motion, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was not desirous of pressing the consideration of his resolution for a day or two.

Mr. ADAMS asked of the Chair whether the question of consideration admitted of debate?

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. A. Then I am to understand that it will not be in GENERAL MACOMB.

The bill for the relief of General Macomb came up for its third reading.

[This bill proposes, only, in so many words, to release General Macomb from all responsibility as the security of Samuel Champlain, in a bond given by him, as paymaster in the army, bearing date 8th May, 1811; but the report accompanying the bill has reference to certain brevet pay due to General Macomb, as constituting an offset in his favor as the surety of Champlain.]

Mr. SEMMES observing that the bill contained a very important principle, desired to hear something more in explanation of its provisions, before he was prepared to vote upon it.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, agreed with Mr. SEMMES, and considered the bill as one which went to establish a principle that would, by releasing securities, if carried out, destroy the security of the Government for moneys due to the Government by principals.

Mr. SEMMES moved to commit the bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPEIGHT called for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, thought that, when the facts were understood, none could object to the bill. Dozens of similar cases had been provided for by special legislation. General Macomb had been security for an officer who had become a defaulter to the Government; the Government had suffered the case to remain many years without prosecuting, and, in the mean while, had promoted the officer. General Macomb had been ordered to a distance in his country's service, and had no opportunity of urging the officers of Government to do their duty in the case, and he ought not to suffer for the negligence of the Government.

Mr. SEMMES thought the statement given was sufficient proof that the bill ought never to have gone to the Military Committee. It was not a military subject, but more properly pertained to the Committee on Claims or that on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARD insisted that this objection should have been pressed when the memorial was first referred; and remonstrated against the recommitment of a bill reported by one standing committee of the House to another committee.

Mr. DRAYTON, though opposed to the commitment of the bill to the Committee on Claims, was wholly dissatisfied with the reasoning in the report; and went into an argument, at considerable extent, to show that the claim for pay, according to brevet rank, could not be sustained, and that the claim, on the ground of the general's being the chief of the engineer corps, was equally unfounded. As to the delay on the part of the Government, that had nothing to do in the matter, unless it had rendered the principal less able to meet the demands of Government, which was not shown or pretended. He regretted to be obliged to oppose the claim, for he highly respected the claimant, but he could not in candor give it his support.

Mr. PLUMMER observed that the Military Committee had not allowed the claim on the ground of brevet rank; all that part of the claim had been rejected. He renewed the motion (which had been withdrawn by Mr. SEMMES) to commit the bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought the question on which the claim rested was wholly of a judicial nature, and that the bill ought to go to the Judiciary Committee: he did not, however, make the motion.

Mr. VANCE, perceiving that there had been some misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman [Mr. WARD] who had drawn up the report, as to the views of the Military Committee, intended to have been embodied in it, moved to postpone the consideration of the bill for one week; which was agreed to. So the bill will come up on Thursday next.

ASSAY OFFICES IN THE GOLD REGION.

The House then went again into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, in the Chair, on the bill to establish assay offices in the gold region.

Mr. FOSTER said that, having endeavored to profit from the various grounds of opposition, and the different amendments proposed when this bill was last in committee, he had prepared an amendment, by way of substitute; which he sent to the Clerk's table, and which was read, as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish an assay office in or near the gold district of Georgia, another in or near that of South Carolina, and another in that of North Carolina, as branches of the assay office of the mint of the United States; and to appoint in each an assayer of the office, for the purpose of assaying such native gold or silver as may be offered at such offices, and for exchanging therefor the coins of the United States, or other current money, on the terms and under the regulations prescribed by the laws establishing the mint of the United States.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said assayers, previous to entering upon the execution of their respective offices, shall each become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sum of 2,000 dollars, conditioned for the faithful performance of their duties, respectively. And the said assayers shall receive and give receipts for all gold or silver which may be delivered to them, and to exchange therefor the coins of the United States and other current money, on the terms and under the regulations aforesaid; which gold and silver, thus received, said assayers shall assay and transmit to the United States' mint, in such way as may be prescribed by the director of the mint, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said assayers shall each receive the sum of 1,500 dollars as a compensation for their services; said sums to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

On this amendment the debate was renewed, which had been suspended on the rising of the committee.

[We present a condensed abstract of the views of the several speakers who participated in it, as follows:]

Mr. FOSTER briefly explained the amendment, and urged the advantages to be derived from keeping our own gold in the country; and, by exchanging it for gold coin, to bring a metallic currency into use as a substitute for the small bank bills now so much complained of. The constitutional question which had arisen on the bill, in its original shape, was obviated by the amendment.

Mr. ELLSWORTH understood the amendment as going, in effect, to declare that the United States' Government shall establish a market for all the gold dug at the South, from the bosom of the earth, and pay good coin in exchange for it. He had no evidence that the Government needed any agency of the kind proposed to effect the purchase of bullion; and if it did, the measure was incompatible with the existing law for the regulation of the mint.

Mr. CARSON said he knew that his friend from Georgia, in proposing his amendment, had been influenced by a wish to accommodate the bill, in its ultimate form, to the views of the different gentlemen who had formerly made objections to the bill. For his (Mr. C.'s) own part he was in favor of the original bill: it was simple in its provisions, and, in his opinion, it provided for every thing that was necessary. [Mr. C. here read a portion of the original bill.] He believed that those provisions gave a discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury and the director of the mint, which would embrace every thing which was necessary. He believed that, as to the exchange of gold coins for bullion, that was a matter of small consequence, inasmuch as whenever they could ascertain the value of gold they could always get its value immediately. The object of the gentleman from Georgia, in introducing that part of his resolution, was to benefit the United States and the national mint. What was that mint for but to coin money and to ascertain the value of the precious metals? But, unless they got gold they could not coin gold money; and there was no part from which they at present got so much as from the mines of the South, and these mines were still increasing in their produce. If gentlemen who understood the matter better than he did thought this a matter of no importance, he should not urge it; but there were speculations going on betwixt citizens and owners of mines which rendered it necessary that something should be done. The value of gold from mines in the same region was different. He could instance a case in which he had himself a concern, namely, the Brindleton and Wall mines; they were both in one neighborhood, and yet there was a difference of three or four per cent. in the gold produced from the respective mines. He could not, nor did he believe that gentlemen there could tell the difference betwixt the metals; but when sent in to be assayed, it was discovered. It was evident, then, that, in assaying and stamping the metal, there would be a safety to the citizen; and this was his only object, that they might know the real value of the produce of a mine. To attain this, he had no doubt they would submit to the half of one half per cent. for seigniorance. He was aware that when first he proposed the measure he had been laughed at, even by some of his friends; but the committee who were appointed, had carefully considered and investigated the subject. He was indebted to the gentleman from New York for the draught of the bill; the report was not his, (Mr. C.'s); his sole agency had been in ascertaining the amount produced by the mines, &c. He had no doubt that they were going on rapidly. He had held a consultation with the director of the mint, and the bill as reported by the committee met the approbation of that distinguished gentleman. He (Mr. C.) had suggested some different views, but that gentleman had shown him and convinced him of the propriety of the views entertained by the committee. At the same, he would say, he was willing that gentlemen should suit the bill to their views, if they would only accede that officers should be appointed under the Government to stamp the gold, and ascertain its real and proper value.

Mr. SPEIGHT could see no constitutional objection to the bill, but he thought one assay office would be sufficient for the whole gold region.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, considered the constitutional objections urged against the bill as utterly futile. An assay of gold was a very different thing from the inspection of pork, flour, fish, or tobacco: gold was the material of a circulating currency; he had never heard that fish or flour were. He looked on this objection as ludicrous. If the bill conferred any boon upon the South, it was a very small one.

Mr. ROOT understood it as the intention of this amendment to obviate the constitutional objection which had been raised to the establishment of those assay offices, by making them branches of the mint. If it would produce this effect, it would be proper also to take a view of the effect it would produce as to the coining of money. Gentlemen had said that it was admitted on all sides to be constitutional to establish an assay office at Philadelphia; and they had triumphantly asked if it must not be equally constitutional to establish such an office or offices elsewhere? But those gentlemen forgot that it was the object for which the assay office was established that must render it constitutional or otherwise. Why was it constitutional to establish one at Philadelphia? For the obvious reason that it was necessary and proper to carry into execution the delegated power of Congress to coin money. Were it not essential to the exercise of this power it would not be constitutional to establish assay offices at Philadelphia, or any where else. But it was necessary to have bullion in order to coin money, and to coin money it was also necessary that the value of the metal, its degree of fineness, &c. should be settled and ascertained. For this purpose an assay office must be established somewhere; and where so proper a place as near the mint, near the milling press where the metal was to be stamped with the image or mark of its value? Gentlemen should, therefore, have inquired before they so triumphantly rode over the constitution, whether these assay offices in Carolina or Georgia would be necessary and proper to enable the Government to carry into execution the delegated power of coining money. If they were not necessary for this purpose, with what object were they to be made? Was it not to accommodate the Southern section of the Union, and to enable the States, where these mines were situated, to draw on the treasury of the United States for the value of this commodity which they obtained out of the bowels of the earth? The measure would answer no other end. But that committee should hesitate before they passed such a provision, unless they perceived that it would be beneficial and proper to the exercise of the delegated power of the Government to coin money. - Let them look for a moment at the provisions of the bill. It provided that an assay office should be established, with an officer at an annual salary of 1,500 dollars, who was to give bonds to the Government for the due execution of his trust. This officer was to assay the metal produced from the mines, and exchange it for its value in coins of the United States, or other current money; and then he was to transmit it to the mint to be coined. Now, let them examine this, and see if any thing beneficial could result from this operation to the Government or to the nation. Gentlemen, when inquiring as to the benefits of this operation, did not stop to inquire the amount of gold coin in circulation, which had that year been struck at the mint. They would find that it had ceased to be valued as money, and was valued as bullion. Surely, then, if gentlemen would consider this, they would, before passing this bill, hasten to pass the bill which was before them last session, relative to the gold coin of the country.

Let them examine further into the operation of the measure now proposed. Bullion would be brought to the assayer in the South, who was to buy it. But at what price was he to buy it? By the law which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. ELLSWORTH] had read to the House, it was provided that 24½ grains of pure gold should be but equal to one dollar. Well, did those gentlemen of the South purpose to sell their bullion at the mint for 24½ grains for one dollar? He knew they did not; and he also knew that that was not its proper price. Under the law he had just alluded to, bullion left at the mint, to wait its turn for coinage, was to be returned in coinage of equal value; but if coined immediately, half of one per cent. was to be deducted for the coinage—call it seigniorage, or what they pleased. Now, would the gentlemen of the South be content to receive payment in silver, or in paper, at the rate he had mentioned, deducting the half of one per cent. for the coining of their bullion? No, they would not take it, because it was worth more. But they must have it stamped, not to send it to the mint, but to Europe, or to any merchant on the coast, of whom they could get its real value as bullion; so that the southern assay office, instead of being a branch of the mint, would, in fact, be an inspection office. The real value of gold in the commercial world was 23 1-5 grains for one dollar; and that was what they should have, deducting half of one per cent. for ready money being paid them for bullion. They complained now that they were not allowed the value of their gold; that they were cheated and jeweled; but at the assay office, when they get one, the assayer must assay the metal for nothing; and if he declined to pay for it at its real value, they would not let him have it to send to Philadelphia. And even if it were sent, and coined there, it would be of no use to the nation. Gold has been coined for some years past merely because its proprietors wished to have it stamped with a mark declaratory of its degree of fineness; and the coin might as well have been marked with a star as with an eagle.

The mint which was established, and still maintained at so great an expense, was, as far as regarded the coining of gold, totally useless to the nation; and the transmission of gold by the southern assayer to be coined at the mint, would also be a useless expense, because when coined it would be worth more as bullion than as coin. Nobody pretended to tender gold coin as money; it did not pass amongst our merchants from one to another as money. Let Congress, then, stay its hand on the subject before it, that the gentlemen who were desirous of having the measure pass might unite with those who were anxious to pass a law for making gold coins of such a weight pass as coins; to make gold worth as much as coin as it was worth as bullion; and, perhaps, the amount of seigniorage, one-half of one per cent. more. Let them do what they ought in this matter, and, then, perhaps, the Southern States might not need these assay offices. Let them pass a law making the relative value of gold and silver as 16 to 1, instead of 15 to 1, as at present; and they would then bring them to the same relative value as in England, where gold was made by act of Parliament the standard of value. If a bill was drawn on London, it was either to be paid in gold or its equivalent; here, when they purchased a bill, it was to be paid in silver or its equivalent. Hence they had to give a premium of 8½ per cent. for a bill on London, because it was to be paid in gold; and that, when the course of exchange was in favor of America, and against England. If they purchased a bill in America to be paid for in gold in England, or an equivalent, for every one hundred cents the purchasers had to pay one hundred and ten, because the Spanish silver dollar was worth but ninety cents in London. But if they would make their gold coin what it ought to be, this blot would be effaced from their price current. Let, them, then, hasten to pass a bill for this purpose, and they could afterwards decide as to the propriety of establishing these assay offices, and whether they would be of benefit to the mint and to the country.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, said he had listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROOR,] who had just taken his seat, though it was not the first time he had heard the same speech, which seemed as well calculated for one thing as another; and he never heard it without deriving some instruction from it upon things in general. The law which he proposes (said Mr. C.) to regulate the gold coin of the country in order to prevent it from being withdrawn from circulation, will be a good law, and I promise him to give it my hearty support whenever it shall come up; but it has nothing to do with the question now before us. Can it be a good reason to forbid the establishment of an assay office in the South because the American gold coins, as at present regulated by law, are too pure? Certainly not. As well might you say the gold shall be left in the earth till the Legislature fixes the proper value of the coins it is intended to supply. In the discussion of every subject that comes before this House, two things are chiefly to be considered: First, have we the power? Second, is it expedient? With regard to the first, we seem, Mr. Chairman, to have got into a kind of country dance, where constitutional scruples are changing sides, and, after setting to each other in very different views of that instrument, we are crossing over to assume opposite positions. Now, sir, I do trust that because we of the South have heretofore been, as we ought to be, very scrupulous about the powers of this House and the sacred character of the constitution, that, therefore, we shall be denied credit for our sincerity when we do admit the powers of Congress. Because we have entertained doubts on many former questions, we shall be compelled to do so on all others that may come before us where the cry of unconstitutionality is set up. I had hoped that the clear and unanswerable exposition given by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. PEXNER,] had quieted all suspicions on this subject; but if doubts are yet entertained, permit me to present a short view of what I consider to be the powers of this House, on the question under consideration. The constitution gives to Congress the right "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Now, the first thing which has been done to effectuate this power was to establish a mint. Had Congress a right to do this? I presume no one will deny it. This proposition, therefore, needs for its support no argument. Connected with the mint is an assay office, the clear and distinct object of which is to test the fineness of the metal to be coined in order to fix and "regulate the value thereof," when it assumes the shape of money. Does any, under this use of such an institution, deny the right of Congress to es-establish an assay office? No one, I presume. Then, we have these two positions proved, that Congress may establish a mint, and connect therewith an office to ascertain the value of metal to be coined. Now I maintain, that if it be necessary, in the honest import of that word, Congress may establish either a mint or a branch of the mint in each State; or it may remove the mint from Philadelphia, where it is now located, to such place as it may think most conducive to the advancement of the great objects for which it was designed. There is no obligation on the part of the Government to fix or keep the mint at Philadelphia; but, sir, we do not ask to remove it—we are not so unreasonable as to wish it; besides its central position, the great expense at which the Government has been to erect it there, would incline us to let it remain where it is. We do not ask either to have another mint established in the South, nor even a branch of the mint. We simply ask, for the sake of saving expense, to erect nothing more than that simple department connected with the mint, commonly called an assay office. We want, if I may use the expression, the mint at Philadelphia 'elongated so as to reach to our gold region; we want it stretched over the whole country, not by edifices and apparatus, which will be a source of great expenditure, but by the operation of a law. We think the act we propose will give us virtually a mint. We want to be placed in the same situation with those whose great wealth or contiguity to the mint enables them to go day by day, and obtain a fair and full price for their gold, and consequently for their honest labor. By way of illustration, we wish the laboring man to have it in his power to carry his gold himself to the mint, and get its true value, instead of its passing into second hands, the hands of the speculator, who, by reason of his superior wealth, can wait for its proceeds and carry it there at his leisure, full well knowing his profits will pay him for his delay. Again we wish our people to be placed in the condition of those who might happen to have mines immediately in the neighborhood of the mint. If, for instance, the good people residing upon the banks of the Delaware and Schuylkill, in the vicinity of Philadelphia, should have the good fortune to discover gold mines upon their lands, every one would at once perceive of what great advantage their proximity to the mint would be to them. They could carry to that establishment, at the close of every day, the fruits of their labor, and realize immediately that which would command certainly the support, if not the higher comforts of life. Now, sir, this is just what we want for the honest and industrious people of the South, who have asked but little of you, and have often had that little refused. And we think the small request contained in that bill will accomplish that object. We do not ask for a mint, but we ask for that which will as effectually answer our purpose, and which will cost comparatively nothing. Indeed, we might, with some show of justice, contend for the whole establishment itself, because it is emphatically the gold region of the United States, and would seem to be the place befitting this institution, upon the popular though trite truism, that a thick and wealthy settlement is better for a mint than an unfrequented desert.

With regard to the expediency of the measure, the Legislature usually compares the expense of the object with the benefit to be produced; and, as all Governments are intended to advance the prosperity of its citizens, the number to be benefited enters very materially into the consideration of the question. Now, sir, recent and increasing discoveries have ascertained, beyond all doubt, that there is a gold bank, immensely valuable, stretching from Virginia through North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, including five States. It must be perceived, at one glance, what a number of people will be concerned in extracting this precious metal, in the language of the gentleman from New York, from the earth.

And shall the pitiful expense of a few thousand dollars deter Congress from extending to these people so important an object? These people have paid their taxes to the Government, and have as much right to expect a portion thereof returned to them, in the distribution of its favors, as any other part of the Union.

Are you not appropriating your thousands, year after year, upon your navy, your army, upon internal improvement, and other objects not now necessary to be mentioned? What is it for? For the benefit of the people, either at large, or in those sections where these appropriations happen to have shown their peculiar blessings.

When, before, has an appropriation been refused, if it was to promote the industry of the country, or if the pretext could be found to encourage domestic labor? Now, for the first time, when nearly all concur in the power of Congress to grant the object; when whole States are to be benefited by the appropriation; when the expense is scarcely nothing, in comparison with the advantage to be attained; behold, it becomes very proper to be frugal, and to take care of the public treasury! In our constitutional scruples to the South we have been honest, if mistaken; for we have often refused benefits when offered to us, under the firm belief we had no right to them; but in this case we did believe the Government had the power to grant our request; we did believe its compliance with our wishes would effect a double purpose. The first great object would be to benefit itself, and, consequently, the whole community, not partially, but equally and universally. It was, as I verily believe, always the intention of the framers of the constitution to found the currency of the Government upon a metallic basis. It was to be a hard money currency, the only true security of property. If this be true, what can be of more importance to the whole community than to secure and keep in circulation as much of the precious metals as it is in the power of the Government to obtain? This reaches to every man, high or low. No exclusive privilege in this; no particular class is benefited more than another. If Congress is "to coin money, and regulate the value thereof," it must establish a mint: but of what consequence is a mint without metals to coin? It may be said it is open to every man who may choose to bring his bullion to be coined, and he shall receive the value thereof in hard money. That is precisely what the wisdom of this Government ought to encourage. It should afford facilities to the gold digger to bring his gold to the mint; and thereby the great purposes of that institution, and the still greater objects of the Government in furnishing a metallic currency, will certainly be promoted. We do not ask the exercise of the constitutional power, merely to benefit a certain class of individuals; for that is impossible. The moment you hold out an inducement to one single man to bring his bullion to the mint, you inevitably benefit every man in the community; for that bullion, when converted into coin, may find its way into every pocket in the nation. It has been said that the object only of this bill is to furnish a market for the gold diggers. Now, sir, suppose we grant this; what does the argument amount to? Is there a better article in this wide world to purchase than gold? Who gets it? Does not the Government buy it? And for whom, and for what purpose? To throw it away? Not so; it is to answer a great federal purpose, necessary to the effectuation of a great sovereign right, no less than that of providing a sound, useful, and lasting currency for the community, without which, neither the operations of the Government, nor the wants of its people, could find their indispensable support and relief. But, sir, is it possible we hear this measure objected to because it supplies a market—a "home market"—to this species of industry? How long has this doctrine ceased to be orthodox? Have we never heard of such a thing before? Yes, sir, we have; and in cases where the market was not for the exclusive benefit of the Government, but for the peculiar gain of a favored class. Not for carrying into effect an acknowledged power of the Government for the benefit of the whole community, without distinction, but to encourage and protect special and privileged interests. If this were to benefit the gold diggers alone, I would not ask it; but I know it is to produce a higher and wider advantage to every part and portion of the Union. It is obliged to be the case. Every dollar brought from the earth, and coined into money, from the constant circulation of that useful article, may, in the payment of debts, and the relief of wants, perform the office of thousands; and, sir, I believe that half a million of dollars will be extracted from the mines of Georgia alone, during the next year; something like 250,000 dollars was raised last, and part of that clandestinely, by intruders from other States. Georgia has distributed her gold region among her citizens in lots of forty acres, thereby multiplying the operators to such an extent as must necessarily result in a most profitable production of this useful metal. All we want is to have these honest laborers afforded those facilities which wealthy men, or those residing in the neighborhood of the mint, enjoy from that institution. We think an assay office will effectually secure those facilities. We think it will protect our citizens from the frauds and impositions of speculators, who swarm around the mining operatives, as is generally the case in all other laborious pursuits, depending upon their wits to obtain that for which they are too lazy to work. The mines are on the frontiers, and, heretofore, in consequence of the want of skill on the part of the miners, in judging of the genuineness of paper money—for, it is a well known fact, that bad money is always thrown out upon the circumference of a State—they have been greatly defrauded by receiving for the fruits of their labor counterfeit bills. Besides this, money of a most suspicious credit is put upon them; and, in a late case, by the failure of a bank, it is probable they lost something over one hundred thousand dollars. It is to guard against evils like these, and to provide the really means of converting speedily the proceeds of their labor into what will command the necessities of life, that we ask for an agency connected with the Government, in which we can confide, to test and stamp the value of our gold, or to give us from your mint its true value. We want you to draw Philadelphia within our neighborhood, which we say can be done for all our purposes, by a law establishing an assay office; and we sincerely believe we ask nothing unreasonable, when it is remembered how great the advantage which must necessarily accrue to the Government, as well as to a large portion of its people, who have never harassed you with very many petitions.

Mr. HUNTINGTON thought they could dispose of the bill before the House, without referring to the constitutional question, which he thought had better be referred to the Committee on Doubtful Powers. What was Congress asked to do? They were asked to establish three assay offices, to create three officers, at a salary of 1,500 dollars. Then there was the expense of building, &c., for which he believed the gentleman had inserted in one of the clauses of the bill 15,000 dollars, together with all the other expenses which would necessarily attend the creation of these establishments. All this was to be at the expense of Government. Well, the next inquiry was, will these offices benefit the Government, or the country? Did the Government need these offices to obtain bullion? Such a necessity was asserted by no one. Well, was it necessary to enable Government to establish a gold currency? That was not claimed. For they might establish as many assay offices as there were States, and, whilst the law remained as at present, it would not keep gold in circulation as coin. They were then brought to this simple question, whether there was any thing in the state of the population, or the condition of the country, where these gold mines were situated, which made it expedient for Government to adopt the proposed measure? The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CARSON] wished to have the gold stamped, that it might pass as bullion; this brought up the constitutional question at once. The gentleman from Georgia, however, only asked to be enabled to exchange bullion for gold. Now, he would ask if it would be expedient to go to such an expense to accomplish such an object? For what, he would again ask, were they to do it? His colleague had stated to furnish a market at the doors of those who raised the gold from the earth. The Government must have a mint, and an assay office at Philadelphia; but they were now called upon, not only to incur the expense of establishing assay offices for the convenience of certain particular places, but to send gold coins, in exchange for their bullion, at the expense and hazard of the United States. He thought the House was not prepared to do this, merely for the purpose of enabling those who lived in the neighborhood of those mines to exchange their raw material for gold coins, without the trouble or risk of transportation. He would not then go into the constitutional question; he was opposed to the amendment; he was opposed to the whole bill for the reasons he had already stated.

On motion of Mr. BURGESS, the committee now rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; on which question, in the House, a division was called. No quorum voting, a motion of adjournment was made, and carried.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 28.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. VERPLANCK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to such further reduction in the revenues as may not be required for objects of general welfare and public defence, authorized by the constitution, made a report, intended to accompany the bill (reported from the Committee of Ways and Means yesterday) to reduce and otherwise to alter the duties on imports; which report was read, and committed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved for the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the report. This motion, by rule, lies one day on the table.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private secretary, which was read, and is as follows:

WASHINGTON, December 28, 1832.

To the House of Representatives:

I have taken into consideration the resolution of the House requesting me to communicate to it, so far as my opinion may be consistent with the public interest, "the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of the republic of Buenos Ayres, which has resulted in the departure of the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States from that republic, together with the instructions given to the said Chargé d'Affaires;" and, in answer to the said request, state, for the information of the House, that, although the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States has found it necessary to return, yet the negotiation between the two countries, for the arrangement of the differences between them, are not considered as broken off, but are suspended only until the arrival of a minister, who, it is officially announced, will be sent to this country with powers to treat on the subject.

The fact, it is believed, will justify the opinion I have formed, that it will not be consistent with the public interest to communicate the correspondence and instructions requested by the House, so long as the negotiation shall be pending.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Ordered, That the said message do lie on the table.

Reduction of Postage.

[Dec. 28, 1832.]

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. E. EVERETT:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the inexpediency of reducing the rates of postage on letters, pamphlets, and newspapers.

In moving this resolution, Mr. EVERETT observed that the subject had, at the last session, been presented to Congress, by petition, from the portion of the country which he in part represented. He had then urged the justice of the measure recommended. Believing it still both just and peculiarly seasonable, he was induced, in this way, to bring it to the consideration of the House; and, in doing so, he would briefly explain the view which he took of it.

Few persons who had not turned their attention particularly to the Post Office were aware what a vast and expensive establishment it had become. In giving it this character, however, he by no means intended to say that its operations ought to be contracted; on the contrary, he would go as far as any one in extending the accommodation which it afforded to the people. But the view he took of the subject made it necessary to state the expense at which it is supported; and which, for the year ending July, 1832, amounted to the large sum of 2,266,100 dollars, of which 2,258,570 dollars were actually levied, in the form of postage, during the last year. The entire expense of the navy of the United States is but 3,379,000 dollars, and that of the whole civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous department of the Government is but a trifle over 3,000,000. These comparisons show that the Post Office establishment, if among the most useful, is also among the most expensive establishments of the country.

This expense is not defrayed from the treasury, as that of the other public establishments, but by a specific tax, levied on a portion of the people, viz: those who receive letters and packets by mail, charged with postage. One of the objects to which I wish to draw the attention of the committee is, the inquiry whether, as the Post Office establishment is partly for the service of the public, as well as partly for the accommodation of private individuals, the entire expense of it ought to be thrown upon the latter? And another point of inquiry is, whether the burden of supporting that part which is for private accommodation is fairly apportioned?

If the Government levied no more from the individuals served than it costs the Government to render the service to these individuals, there would, of course, be no cause of complaint. Or, if the state of the treasury required that more should be raised from the payers of postage than the establishment costs to the Government; then if the excess were equitably apportioned among all who pay it, there would be no injustice. But neither of these is true. On the present system, the Government, by penal laws, secures to itself the monopoly of the business, and then charges the expense of carrying it on to a portion only of the people, and, as I think, upon inequitable principles.

In the first place, there is frequently a considerable surplus over and above the whole expense of the establishment: thus, the year before last, there was a surplus of more than 200,000 dollars. In the present state of the treasury there surely can be no reason in raising a revenue of this kind by a Government monopoly.

In the next place, there is a very considerable number of post routes which are unproductive; that is, which cost more to keep up than they yield. The law requires a return to be made to Congress of those that yield less than a third of the cost of maintaining them; but no return is made of all the others, and those which are returned are rarely if ever discontinued. I am not for discontinuing them, unless they are useless or superfluous, as well as unproductive. I am willing to pursue the most liberal policy in multiplying them. But why are unproductive post routes established and kept up? Of course, because the public good, or the interest of the inhabitants on the route requires it, or both. But whether it be one or the other, or both, it is plain that the expense, if not borne by the inhabitants on the route, (those immediately benefited,) should be borne by the public at large, and paid out of the public treasury. It cannot be just to charge it, as we now do, to the individuals who pay postage on some other route, thus making them pay their own postage and that of their fellow-citizens.

Lastly, there is the vast quantity of letters, papers, and documents which are transported free of postage. The whole correspondence of the Government, external and internal, foreign and domestic; the voluminous documents, which we print here by thousands and tens of thousands, and the entire correspondence of seven or eight thousand postmasters; all these are transported free of expense to those who despatch and those who receive them. I am not for curtailing this privilege; it is essential (to some extent) to carry on the public business; and where not essential, it is designed and operates for the benefit of the people. But who ought to pay for it? Somebody must pay for it. We write free on the packets, but when we have done so they acquire no locomotive power; they do not fly through the air; they are carried along and distributed, by the usual means of transportation, to the amount of more tons than I will venture to estimate, in the course of the year. But this transportation, which takes place for the immediate service of the Government and the general accommodation of the people, instead of being paid for by the treasury, is thrown upon one class of the citizens, who are compelled by the Government to pay for carrying their own letters, and then for all the free letters, documents, and packages of the Executive and Legislative Departments. This seems to me unjust and unreasonable in the present condition of the treasury.

I think, therefore, that the cost of the unproductive post roads, instead of being borne by a part of the people, should be borne by the whole—should be a public charge: How much it would amount to in the course of the year I do not know; but the books of the Post Office, I presume, would furnish the amount on inspection.

In the next place, I think the treasury ought to be charged a reasonable sum on account of the transportation of letters and documents free of postage. What would be a reasonable sum depends on the proportion which this part of the transportation by mail bears to all the rest: I suppose that the two items together would fairly amount, in the present state of affairs, to over a million of dollars annually; that is, to one-half of the present cost of the establishment.

This would, of course, authorize a corresponding reduction in the present rates of postage; a reduction which ought, on every principle of equity, to take place.

In making the reduction, a new graduation of rates of postage might, I think, with propriety be made. I do not pretend that the amount charged can be made in all cases to correspond mathematically with the distance to which the letter is carried; but it seems too wide a departure from this rule, that while a letter from Boston to New Orleans pays but a quarter of a dollar, a letter from Boston to Washington should pay as much. The exemption of double postage for putting your letter into an extra half sheet, or for enclosing a five dollar bill in it, is also, I think, unnecessarily onerous.

The postage on pamphlets and newspapers might likewise be advantageously reduced. It is at present a heavy tax on literature and intelligence, not needed by the treasury. By combining with this reduction the method adopted in England to prevent the letter mail from being overloaded with other articles, or some other method for the same object, I think the convenience and interests of the people would be greatly promoted, and as acceptable a service rendered them as any in our power to render, in the way of reducing and equalising taxation.

There are various other views of this subject which I might present, but I forbear to consume the time of the House.

Mr. CONNOR, of North Carolina, said he did not object to the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT;] he would, on the contrary, go as far as any body in supporting every practicable reduction of the postage on letters, newspapers, pamphlets, &c. If he understood the proposition of the honorable member, it had reference not only to a reduction of the postage, but also to the expediency of throwing the Post Office Department on the public treasury. He thought such a proposition would not be sustained by the House then or at any other time. It never was intended that the Post Office should be a source of revenue; but it was intended that it should bear its own expenses. Contrary to expectation it had done this and more. At different times a million or two had accrued at the treasury from the Post Office Department; which sum it would have a just right to call on the treasury for at any time when it might be needed. But, as an individual, he was not willing to burden the public treasury with a responsibility for the Post Office Department. The gentleman was well aware how the great amount of surplus has been disposed of; it had been expended in forming routes, and making openings through various sections of the country to facilitate the communications of the citizens in the different parts of the Union. Last year, up to July, there was a surplus of 200,000 dollars which had been thus applied. In the present year there was said to be a small deficiency of some 5 or 6,000 dollars; but then they were informed that it would exceed by as great an amount the next year.

The surplus of the department went, therefore, to the entire people: it might, in fact, be called the establishment of the people. As to the unproductive routes, he would inform the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Committee on the Post Office had taken up that matter, it was under consideration, and he thought it probable that a bill would be reported for their discontinuance. It could not be a matter of surprise that some routes should have crept in which ought to be discontinued, but the department had not the power to do it.

The department as well as the committee had recommended the discontinuance of some of these routes; but when the matter came before the House it always met the opposition of members concerned in the particular routes, so that nothing had been done. The committee, however, having had the matter under consideration, in conjunction with the department, they were in hopes that they should be able to attain their ends by a separate bill for the purpose. The Post Office Department could not be thought too large or unwieldy whilst it was able to support itself. There was no danger, under any circumstances, that it should become a burden to the treasury. It had the power, by a single order, to sweep three-fourths or the whole of the mail stages off the roads, and substitute horse mails at the most economical rates. Mr. C. concluded by repeating his objection to the proposition of throwing the department on the public treasury.

Mr. WILDE rose, but the hour for resolutions having expired, did not address the House.

The remainder of the day was spent on private bills.

VOL. IX.—59

SATURDAY, DECEMBER, 29.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The resolution offered by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, lying over from yesterday, came up again for consideration.

Mr. WILDE said, had he known, when he rose yesterday, that the hour allotted to such business was so nearly at an end, he would certainly have forborne to take the floor. To speak on a resolution, after a day's interval, was too much like a commonplace remark in conversation after a long silence. The little he had to say, however, though it would have been more appropriate then, if now to be said at all, had best be said at once. It was contrary to the usual courtesy of that House to reject a mere resolution of inquiry. If introduced without preface or comment, it generally passed without opposition or remark. But when a gentleman, not content with submitting his proposition, argued in favor of it, so far as his [Mr. W.'s] observation extended, it indicated just so much doubt of its correctness, or so strong a conviction of its urgency or importance, that other gentlemen were warranted, and even invited to intimate their first impressions even on its first appearance. He [Mr. W.] did not intend to intimate that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] at all questioned the soundness of his own proposition. On the contrary, its novelty and importance had, doubtless, called forth that gentleman's explanation. Availing himself, then, of the privilege customary in such cases, he [Mr. W.] ventured to intrude a few hasty suggestions.

The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts was, in effect, to charge the Post Office on the customs. This would be virtually to discharge that House from the further consideration of reducing the duties to that extent. Adding two millions to the duties on imports, in the present state of our affairs, was like throwing water on a drowned man. In Mr. W.'s part of the country the chief distinction recognised among politicians here, was between those who wished less money to be raised by duties, and those who tried to find new ways of spending it. Among the latter class, he was forbidden to rank the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT.] That gentleman placed his resolution on the footing of its proposing a reduction of oppressive and unequal taxation. He [Mr. W.] accepted the omen. On a proper occasion he should be proud to have the support of the gentleman to that object. He was happy to hear the general principle avowed, though he feared there might arise some unfortunate difference of opinion between them, when they came to its application in detail.

With respect to postage, Mr. W. denied that it could, with propriety, be called a tax. It was not unequal. If it was mostly paid by the inhabitants of cities, they, too, derived the greatest advantages from it. So far as it was a charge on commercial correspondence, the merchants were indemnified by increased facilities afforded to enterprise and speculation. The cities received from abroad the earliest intelligence of events, which regulated prices in our markets, and these were often of sufficient consequence not merely to defray the charge of postage, but to warrant the expense of expresses. So far as political and literary information was concerned, the publishers of newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets, in the cities, derived the profits of a more extensive demand for their works, which the mail enabled them to circulate more widely.

There seemed to him no more propriety in maintaining that each part of the country should defray the expense of its own post routes, than in saying that the seaboard ought to pay for its own fortifications, and commerce for the navy that protects it.

As to the oppressive character of the charge of postage,

he was not apprized that it had ever been complained of. If it had ever been galling, the sore must have grown callous. Providence, it was said, fitted the yoke to the neck; it fitted the neck to the yoke also. This had been worn until it became comparatively easy. Other burdens still touched the quick, and must be got rid of. In this manner the topic of postage had been considered and disposed of by the Committee of Ways and Means; and as he should be sorry to see that disposition of it at present disturbed, he felt bound to say thus much, merely to prevent the opinion of the House being prematurely affected by the great weight to which every thing that fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts was justly entitled.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, differed so much from the speech by which the mover had supported and explained it, that he could scarce find a single feature of resemblance. From the words of the resolution he should have concluded its object to be, that printers and publishers of newspapers and pamphlets, residing in our cities, might get their publications carried all over the country, free of postage, and be thereby enabled to enjoy a complete monopoly of the business. A design of this kind could, he presumed, hope for no support in that House. But, in his speech, the gentleman had urged considerations of at least a very doubtful character, if not wholly unfounded in fact. With the leave of the House he should consider a few of these.

The proposition advanced in the gentleman's argument went, if Mr. H. understood it, to pension the Post Office Department upon the public treasury. Such a scheme contained, at first blush, a manifest impropriety: During the last fifteen years it had been the settled policy of the Government to make this department support itself. It was a settled principle in this country that the transmission of intelligence should never be made a subject of taxation. The proposition in the resolution was, therefore, impolitic; contrary to the fixed policy and principles of this country. But it was quite as unjust as it was impolitic. The principal argument urged by the gentleman in its behalf, and the chief subject of his complaint in the existing state of the department, was the vast inequality of the operation of the present law of postage, the practical effect of which was said to be that the whole expense of the transmission of letters throughout the country was borne by a few persons. Mr. H. did not think that such was the case in point of fact. By whom was the greater part of the postage at present paid? First, by members of the legal profession, who transmitted the necessary papers connected with the causes in which they were engaged; this expense was always charged by the lawyers to their clients, and by them paid. Another class was the printers of newspapers and periodicals, and they charged the postage to their subscribers and customers. A third class consisted of merchants and men of business, and it was well known that postage formed an item of charge in their mutual accounts. The burden, then, fell on wide classes of the community, and was made a practice, as equal in its purpose, as in the nature of things was possible.

But, supposing the project of the gentleman from Massachusetts was adopted, by whom would the amount then be paid? It would be taken from the pockets of hundreds and thousands who had little or no concern in the transmission of letters, papers, or books at all. All these would be made tributary to the expense of an establishment with which they had scarce any thing to do, and from which they derived scarce any sensible benefit. The charge, surely, ought to be borne by those who were directly benefited by the establishment; and if any part of our population should be exempt, it ought to be those who had little or no interest in the transmission of the mails. The gentleman's scheme, instead of remedying, would aggravate and increase any inequality which existed at present. The gentleman complained of gross injustice in compelling the productive mail routes to bear the whole expense of those which were unproductive. But this complaint was as unfounded as the other. If the unproductive routes were to be pensioned upon the treasury, how was the department to ascertain which routes were unproductive and which were not? The reduction of the rates of postage would speedily operate to render many routes unproductive which now supported themselves, and sent a balance to the department. The gentleman would soon find that he had got the department into a situation where its difficulties were far more and greater than ever. Its old difficulties would be increased, and new ones created.

These were a few of the evil consequences that would grow out of the plan, so far as it had been illustrated by the gentleman's own argument. But it would be well for the House to look a little beyond the gentleman's speech. When they should have got the whole Post Office establishment as a pensioner upon the treasury, by what standard would the Postmaster General judge how often it was expedient that the mails should run on the various mail routes through the country? Innumerable calls would be made upon him, of the propriety of which he could not judge, and which he would not be able to refuse; and, before half a year had passed away, the expenses of the department would far exceed the amount that otherwise would have been more than sufficient to pay all its charges, and the inequality of the pressure would be infinitely greater than it was now.

He hoped there would be no disposition in the House to adopt any one of the gentleman's propositions; and, if so, then why institute an inquiry on a plan so impolitic that none could doubt its prompt rejection? Could it be expedient to make the inequalities of the burden, occasioned by the transmission of intelligence, still greater than they were at present? To produce a total inability to distinguish productive post routes from unproductive ones? To free the printers and publishers in our great cities from charge upon their papers and pamphlets, and thereby give them a monopoly of the publishing business? To destroy every county newspaper throughout the Union, or turn them into the mere agents of the large city establishments? Such a change, instead of being expedient, could not but prove manifestly injurious to the country. Would gentlemen ever consent to put the transmission of intelligence as a charge upon the treasury, when the treasury might need the aid of the Post Office? If, when the treasury was full, the Post Office became a petitioner for its aid, what might be expected when it should be empty? Believing the plan wholly inexpedient, Mr. H. said he should, when the proper time came, move to lay the resolution on the table; and he should do so now, but that he presumed the gentleman from Massachusetts would be desirous of an opportunity of convincing the House that his proposition was not so injurious as it at present appeared.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, said that the resolution offered by his colleague, had been at least of sufficient consequence to attract the attention of influential members of the House. But, after all that had been advanced in reply to the remarks with which the resolution had been introduced, the chief argument of his colleague had not been met, viz. that, according to the existing laws, the burden of sustaining the Post Office establishment pressed very unequally upon the country. This none had denied. The gentleman last up [Mr. HOFFMAN] had argued, that because the postage paid by lawyers and printers was charged upon others, therefore the burden was not unequal in its pressure. But, let gentlemen look at the States where this tax was paid, and the amount collected in each. This would show whether it was paid by the whole country in an equal ratio. The tax, as it was now collected, pressed severely upon a class who were far from wealthy. It was for this class of citizens that relief was sought. And had his colleague proposed relief to any thing like the extent gentlemen had represented? No, far from it. All he had proposed was, that the productive routes should not be burdened with the whole expense of the unproductive. He had not complained of the existence of such routes; on the contrary, he had professed himself willing still further to extend them. But, let the expense be borne by a tax that should be paid by the nation at large.

It had been urged that the House had received no petitions on this subject. But, surely, when the House was fully possessed of the facts, they stood in need of no petitions to enlighten them. They represented the interests of their constituents, and when they saw how those constituents might be relieved from an unequal burden of taxation, they ought not to wait to be prompted by petitions. While Congress was engaged in considering the propriety of reducing other taxes, they might as well consider the expediency of mitigating this also. It was a proper subject to be submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CRAIG felt some anxiety on the subject of the present resolution, nor could he pretend that he was therein wholly free from all regard to his own interest. If the plan proposed should be carried out, it could not but prove highly injurious to the interests of his own constituents. Instead of curtailing the number of mail routes, he had long held the opinion that they ought, on the contrary, to be still further extended. The mail establishment was not so full and so complete as it ought to be. Many of the citizens of our country were entitled to the enjoyment of the advantages derived from the transmission of the mail in their own neighborhoods, who at present were destitute of them.

It had been said by the mover of the resolution that the tax at present paid was unequal and oppressive; that it bore hard upon a particular class of our citizens, who were more heavily burdened than they ought to be for the benefit of a different part of the country. This was precisely the argument used by those opposed to the protective system; and, in the arguments urged by the gentleman and his friends in reply to them, he would find the best answer to his own objection. No system of indirect taxation could ever be made to bear equally on all portions of the community. And this, so far from being a valid objection to that species of taxation, was the strongest argument in its favor; because its pressure fell heavily upon those who were best able to pay it. This was the best argument he had ever heard in favor of the protective tariff; and it applied equally to the law of postage. A very large part of all the postage collected in the United States was paid by the commercial community; it was a tax upon commercial correspondence; and it was coextensive with the growth and prosperity of commerce itself. In this correspondence the producers of the country had a deep interest. The farmers who constituted a large part of his own constituents, when they sent their flour to Lynchburg, to Richmond, to New York, or Boston, had occasion to correspond with those to whom it was consigned for sale; and the same thing might be said of all other producers similarly situated.

The gentleman last up, from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] had told the House to look to the States where most of the postage was collected, and they would find it paid by the Atlantic States. Very true. But why? Because the produce of the other States there found its market. It was the commodity which paid the postage, and the postage was ultimately charged to the producer. Besides, our political system must be a whole. It would not do for the head to say to the foot, I have no need of thee; you are not so dignified as I, and I can do without your aid. We must take the weak with the strong; for our union was such, that if the weakest part of the body politic should be taken away, the strongest could not but speedily sympathize with it. Suppose Congress were able to check all the little rills which contributed to swell that mighty stream which now supported the Post Office establishment, what would be the consequence? One little spring might be cut off, and no sensible effect follow; and another might be stopped, and still no visible consequence be perceived; yet it was from streams, from springs, nay, from individuals drops, that the mighty ocean itself was supplied; and, by stopping the springs, one after another, even the ocean would at last be exhausted. The fine capillary tubes in the human system were all essential to the health, and even the vitality of the body. Many of the existing post routes might be, and doubtless were, unproductive. But why? Because they had been but recently established, so recently that a taste for reading had not had time to diffuse itself in the neighborhoods where they had been introduced. The people had not had time to acquire a taste for the fine effusions of the North; and how was such a taste to be cultivated? By cutting off the means of obtaining the periodicals which were annually multiplying themselves under the public patronage? When the system of mail routes should have spread its ramifications over the whole country, and extended itself into all its more obscure neighborhoods, then, if there should still be any surplus revenue derived from the establishment, Mr. C. would be prepared to reduce the rate of postage; but, till then, he must protest against it.

Mr. EVERETT had just risen to reply, when the hour for resolutions expired.

After spending some time on private bills,
The House adjourned to Wednesday next.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 2.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. E. EVERETT, coming up again for consideration,

Mr. EVERETT observed, that though he had not anticipated, in offering this resolution, that it would consume so much of the time of the House, yet he believed the subject to which it referred was of importance enough to deserve all the time which it had occupied, or might yet occupy. He did not himself, however, intend to protract the debate; but as his objects had not been correctly stated, nor his arguments answered by any of the gentlemen who had followed and opposed him, he would trouble the House with a brief additional explanation.

Of the several gentlemen who had spoken against the resolution, not one has attempted to refute the broad principle, that as the Post Office establishment was partly for the public service, and partly for private accommodation, it was not just that the entire expense of it should be charged to one class of private individuals. The gentleman from Georgia (whose ingenuity had not found a reply to one of Mr. E.'s arguments) had said, that the resolution went to charge the Post Office on the customs. This was giving the resolution, to say the least, twice the latitude intended. Mr. E. had intimated only that a part of the expense of the Post Office (that part which was not for the service of the payers of postage) ought to be charged to the people at large; that is, ought to be charged to those for whose good the expense was incurred. The gentleman might call this charging the Post Office on the customs; but, if it were so charged, it would be precisely in the condition of the army, navy, executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government; and, in short, every public institution and establishment.

H. or R.]

Reduction of Postage.

These are all "charged to the customs," precisely because the people of the United States had, from the first, given a preference to indirect taxation, as that method of raising the public revenues, whose burdens were most equally diffused and least felt. Why, the cost of that portion of the Post Office establishment, which was for the direct service of the public, or for the accommodation of individuals, who do not themselves pay for it, should not be defrayed as all other public establishments are—why it should be charged to a limited class of private citizens, who are not otherwise benefited than the rest of the community, I cannot conceive; nor has any gentleman, by any plain and common sense argument, attempted to show.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] had gone a step farther, and said that my resolution went "to pension the Post Office on the treasury." On the contrary, it goes to prevent every other department of the Government from being pensioned on the Post Office. Is not the official correspondence of each department a portion of the service of that department? Does not the transmission of despatches, instructions, and reports, to and from this place, in the army and navy, and in the fiscal department of the Government, form a portion of the service of those departments, and no other? Why, then, is the expense of this transmission charged upon that single class of citizens whose business or inclination leads them to receive letters by mail? Suppose the President of the United States should have (as he frequently has) occasion to send a courier with despatches to Europe, or an express to the seat of war on a distant frontier; might not the compensation and expenses of such courier or express, be charged to the Post Office with as much propriety as the whole mass of Government correspondence is now charged to it?

I believe, sir, that few gentlemen are aware of the enormous weight transported free of postage, and, consequently, at the expense of those who pay postage—in the mail. I have endeavored to make an estimate of that part which is most easily reduced to calculation, viz. the weight of the documents printed by order of the two Houses of Congress, for distribution by mail. From the best data within reach, I believe that the weight of those documents, taken with the pamphlet edition of the laws, amounts to forty tons annually; and this enormous weight, it is to be recollected, is to be transported all over the Union, not in baggage wagons and canal boats, but in light vehicles and stage coaches, at the rate of six or eight miles an hour. The expense, of course, was prodigious, and by whom paid? By those who receive the documents? No. They are free. By the people at large, for whose presumed benefit they are distributed? No, and it is the object of my resolution that it should be. But the expense of this vast amount of mail carriage falls on one class of the citizens, and that the class who do not receive the documents. And these documents form but one portion of what is transmitted free of postage; there is, besides, the correspondence of the executive and legislative departments, and of nine or ten thousand postmasters. To this enormous extent the other branches of the public service are pensioned on the Post Office—an arrangement in which I can perceive neither justice nor equity.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WILDS] had said that it was unseasonable to press a measure of this kind at a moment like this, and that, in its operation, it would interfere with a great matter which the House had in hand. On the contrary, I hold it is precisely the right time for the introduction of the proposition, and, instead of interfering with the matter to which the gentleman alludes, I take it to be fairly part and parcel of that matter, and expressly referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which the gentleman is a member, as one of the points alluded to in the message at the opening of the session. The President says: "The subject of the revenue is earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, in hope that the combined wisdom of the Representatives of the people will devise such means of effecting that salutary object, as may remove those burdens which shall be found to fall equally upon any."

Now, sir, I have proved that the burden of the Post Office establishment falls very unequally, and the gentleman refuses to relieve those oppressed by it, because he has in hand a general plan for relieving those who suffer under what they think unequal taxation. I maintain that this Post Office tax, the heaviest single tax which the people pay, amounting to two and a half millions annually, is demonstrably unequal in its apportionment. All the other taxes in the country are levied on consumption, and that is as near an approach to equality as can be made. The postage tax, instead of interfering with a plan for removing unequal taxation, is in reality the only burden with which I am acquainted, which falls unequally on any of the people. Sixty or seventy tons of franked documents is, literally as well as financially, an enormous burden to throw on a single class of the community; to say nothing of the unproductive routes, the cost of which is also cast on the same individuals.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] had said that if the Post Office were not thrown on the treasury, the time would come when the treasury would make drafts on the Post Office; if we did not keep the Post Office and treasury distinct, whenever the latter ran low, the Government would resort to postage as a source of revenue. Sir, that will be done at any rate. Whenever the ordinary sources of public income, derived from the customs, are cut off, and it becomes necessary to resort to direct taxation, the Post Office will be among the first objects resorted to. In the last war the rates of postage were doubled. Foreseeing such an increase of postage hereafter, as the possible result of my proposition, the gentleman said my plan tended to tax intelligence and information for the use of the treasury. I say, on the contrary, I wish to prevent intelligence and information being taxed to carry on the various branches of the public service; and it is a very insufficient reason for refusing to take off the tax now that you may have to put it on again hereafter. Let us take it off now that we can, and keep it off as long as we can; it will be time enough to put it on again when we must.

The gentleman said that those who now pay the greater part of the postage did not themselves bear the burden of it. The lawyers charged it to their clients; the merchants to their customers. All this is true; but how does it help the matter? What is it that is thus charged over to clients and customers? Merely the expense of their own postage? Far from this. The clients, the customers, and others, who bear the ultimate burden of postage must pay, not only their own postage, but that of Congress and the Executive, and the cost of the unproductive routes of the country. The lawyer and the merchant might throw this burden from their own shoulders, but they could not do so only by throwing it upon others, to whom it as little belonged to pay it.

The gentleman had further objected, that if the cost of unproductive routes were thrown on the treasury, no means would remain for ascertaining what routes are unproductive. I confess I could not comprehend this difficulty. I do not perceive why it will not be as easy then as now. If the gentleman will but state the rule, (which he may not find so easy to be done,) by which productive and unproductive routes are discriminated, I will undertake to show that it will be as easy to apply that rule, should the unproductive routes be charged to the treasury, as it is now. I admit that it will be difficult to find any exact principle of estimating the productiveness or unproductiveness of routes. The law, however, positively requires it to be done, and a return made to Congress of all the routes which yield less than one-third of their cost. It might not be possible to come nearer than an estimate of the annual amount of unproductive expenditure; but when that estimate is made, by those best able to make it, I would thank any one for a plain, intelligible reason why the amount should be charged not to the people at large, whose interest dictates the support of these routes, but to a small portion of the people having no special interest in the matter. Such a reason I have never heard.

Reduction of Postage.

Besides all this, I believe the rates of postage might be essentially reduced, without any diminution of the revenue of the department. If the rates were diminished one-half, I am well persuaded that the quantity of correspondence would increase in that proportion. This is eminently true of all that correspondence which is not on business, properly so called. Letters of convenience, friendship, and inclination, and especially letters written by the poor, would unquestionably be multiplied in full proportion to the reduction of postage. The tax is a very heavy one on the part of this community, and really cuts off a great part of that correspondence which most promotes the pleasure and happiness of life. None but men of business, who are obliged to write, and the rich, who can afford to do so, now enjoy the advantages of the Post Office. In bringing forward this resolution, I do not look very particularly to the interests of that portion of the country which I represent. The commercial community does, indeed, bear a large portion of the tax. It is true, as has been said, it is best able to bear it; but if this is a reason against reducing this tax, it holds equally of every other. But it is the West, which, as a great section of country, feels this burden most severely, and suffers most in the restrictions which it lays on correspondence. The West is settled by emigrants from the East. The whole emigrating population is within the range of the highest rate of postage. Every one knows the strength of the ties which bind the feelings of the emigrant to the spot of his birth; his anxiety to receive intelligence from home, and to write back the narrative of what befalls him. For every such letter the Government taxes him about twice what it costs to transport it, in order that all the public, official, and electioneering correspondence of Congress and the departments, may go free.

All I ask is inquiry into the subject by the committee. I wish them to investigate it, and see if they cannot reduce this tax. They may find that it can be reduced without producing any defalcation in the income. In that event they will not refuse to reduce it. They may, on a more deliberate examination of the subject, become satisfied, with me, that the postage of the Government ought not to be charged to a small part of the people, as it now is; and that the citizens on the productive routes ought not, besides paying their own postage, pay that of their fellow-citizens on the unproductive routes. Should this be the result of their examination, as it is of the best reflection I have been able to give the subject, they will have in their power to recommend to the House a measure of relief, which, I am sure, will be very acceptable to the people.

Mr. HOFFMAN observed, in reply, that he had remarked, on a former day, when this subject had been under discussion, that, if the gentleman had submitted his resolution without the accompanying observations, it would probably have passed in silence, as containing some proper suggestions to the Post Office Committee. But the gentleman had thought proper to favor the House with his views and reasons for introducing it, from which it had appeared that the reasonings on which the resolution was founded, were wholly fallacious, and the purpose of its introduction very different from what might be gathered from the tenor of the resolution itself. The gentleman's whole argument, as it has now been put, lay in this fact that the transmission of intelligence among the people of the Union, was charged with the expense of the transmission also of the public documents, especially those printed and circulated by order of the two Houses of Congress. This might be a very good argument in favor of a reduction of the franking privilege; but for nothing else. If it was true that the two Houses were in the habit of franking more than they ought to do, it was easy to remedy the evil, by curtailing the power. Confine the franking privilege to the officers of Government, or limit it in point of time. The argument might avail against the people's reading so much, or against the Houses franking so much, or in favor of their franking more selectly; but it was no argument for the reduction of the rates of postage. Still less was it any reason why the expenses of the Post Office should be charged upon the treasury. Did not the treasury already contribute largely to the expense of that department? The legislation of the House, while occupied in examining and passing upon proposed mail routes, was paid for out of the treasury. A large share of the action of the department itself was sustained from the same source. All the salaries of the numerous officers of the establishment came out of the treasury, and he had no doubt if the matter were fully investigated, it would appear that a large part of the charges attending the transmission of the forty tons of documents, of which the gentleman had spoken, came from the same place.

But, allowing the burden to be as unequal as the gentleman had represented it to be, his own proposition would render it still more unequal. Those who paid now were persons who derived at least some advantages from the transmission of the mail; but those whom the gentleman wished to compel to pay, were persons who were almost entirely unconnected with it; who seldom sent, and as seldom received letters by mail at all.

The gentleman seemed to think that there was no just ground for the franking privilege enjoyed by the postmasters; if this source of expenditure should be closed, some other to the same amount would have to be opened in lieu of it; great inconvenience must result, and no diminution of cost in the long run. He complained, too, of the injustice of charging the support of the unproductive routes upon such as were productive. But Mr. H. believed that, without the former, the latter would lose much of their utility, and of their productiveness also. Many a letter now mailed at New York would never find its way into the Post Office, if the writer knew that, by the cutting off the routes at the end of the distance it had to travel, his letter would be prevented from certainly reaching its destination. Suppose that one-fifth of the expense of the Post Office should be charged upon the treasury, and the postage of letters reduced one-fifth also; the salaries of the postmasters must, of course, be reduced in the same proportion. The treasury would have to pay them, and so, in the end, the whole Post Office Department would come, as he had said, to be pensioned upon the treasury. There was no way, that he could see, to avoid it.

If the gentleman really desired that the committee should inquire only whether the rate of postage might not be reduced without injury to the funds of the department, Mr. H. should have no great objections to such an inquiry. He should rejoice to see the postage reduced as heartily as the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other individual; and when there should be a permanent surplus of the funds of the department over its expenditures, he should be very willing to reduce the rates; but not till then. Laboring under the conviction that such was not the case, and believing the resolution, as explained by the mover, to be improper in its aim, he must move to lay it upon the table.

H. of R.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[JAN. 2, 1833.]

Mr. POLK demanded the yeas and nays upon this motion, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN consented to withdraw the motion, at the request of

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who observed that the debate which had occupied the time of the House, had no more to do with the resolution which had given the pretext for it, than it had to do with the subject of the tariff. The resolution in itself was one of the fairest and most proper subjects of inquiry that could be proposed. The expediency of a reduction of the rates of postage was a perfectly proper subject of consideration, and he thought ought to be proposed annually as a standing subject of legislative inquiry. If it should be found that the rates were higher than they need be, and the funds of the department accumulated with too great rapidity, ought not the postage to be reduced? Yet, while he held this opinion, and held it strongly, he differed entirely from the gentleman from Massachusetts in the views he had expressed. He considered our whole system of mail establishments as one undivided whole; and he believed that the inhabitants upon the Atlantic seaboard were as much interested in its extension and ramification as those of the interior. He considered it as much the interest of his constituents to keep up the unproductive routes, as it was of those who lived in the immediate vicinity of those routes; and it was as much their interest that the public documents should be sent all over the country as it was of any other citizens of the republic. The whole Post Office establishment had been instituted mainly for the accommodation of the commercial interest; and, of all the taxes paid in the country, one of the most just, equal, and universal, was that of postage. But, should the House stand by and see it accumulate to the amount of two millions of dollars, and not inquire into the expediency of lowering the rate of postage? of diminishing the tax upon the transmission of intelligence, civil, commercial, literary, and religious? However he differed from the views of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, he heartily concurred in the propriety of his resolution.

Mr. WATMOUGH said, the honorable gentleman from New York, on my left, appears to view this question only as it may effect the tariff, or rather any views against the tariff, which either the administration or a majority of this House may have in contemplation. Sir, if I could have any additional motive to induce me to go for the resolution of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, a resolution which, if carried, is calculated to relieve, to so great an extent, not only my own immediate constituents, but also the great mass of the people of the Union, from a tax evidently bearing partially and unjustly on them, that inducement I find in the very view taken by the gentleman from New York. If, sir, in relieving the great mass of the people from an unjust tax, I can likewise have the advantage of placing some slight barrier against the war of desolation which I perceive in the horizon, rolling with a awful ruin onward towards my own and every manufacturing district in the Union, I am too happy to be able to avail myself of it. In this point of view, I trust I may venture to express the cheering hope that I shall be sustained by the whole body of my honorable colleagues from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DEARBORN referred to the early period in our history, when the chief intercourse by mail was confined to the vicinity of the seaboard, and when the whole amount received for postage did no more than defray the expense of transporting the mails; but, of late years, the business of the country had vastly augmented, and now the postage was more than quadruple what would be requisite for the mere expense of mail transportation. Between our great cities, from Boston to Baltimore, contracts could be obtained to carry the mail for a cent a letter. Why, then, were the rates still continued so high?

That other routes through the interior might be sustained. The Government had the monopoly, and carriers dare not enter into competition with the Post Office Department. But not only was the postage on our mail routes much higher than it need be to cover expenses, but Government received a very high rate of postage where there was no expense at all, where the mail was not carried one rod. He referred to the tax charged upon letters from foreign countries: all these letters—and they often amounted by the packets to 20, 30, and 40,000 in a single vessel—six cents a piece was paid to Government, though they had not been transported by Government conveyance a single yard. Thus an amount of 2,400 dollars postage was paid upon letters received by gentlemen from their correspondents, and on which Government had incurred no expense whatever. Was not this a most onerous tax? Besides which, they had to pay a heavy contribution to the sustaining of unproductive mail routes. He hoped the inquiry would go to the appropriate committee.

The hour allotted to the consideration of resolutions having now expired,

Mr. VERPLANCK moved the orders of the day. The motion prevailed: Yeas 82, nays 79.

[This motion (from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means) was believed to be preparatory to another for the consideration of the new tariff bill, which may account for the above vote, on what is ordinarily considered a mere motion in course.]

When the bills first in the orders of the day were announced,

Mr. VERPLANCK moved to postpone the consideration of them until to-morrow, in order to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was negatived: Yeas 74, nays 83.

Mr. VERPLANCK then obtained leave to make an explanation, and said that there were several bills besides the bill to reduce the tariff, which had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; so, that gentlemen who were opposed to considering the tariff bill at this time, need not vote against the motion, as other bills might be taken up. He should not press that bill if gentlemen were unprepared for it. He understood that, on account of some of the statements accompanying the report not having yet been printed and laid on the tables, some gentlemen did not consider themselves as ready to go into a discussion of the tariff bill to-day.

Mr. BURGESS said that, if the gentleman would pledge himself not to move to take up that bill to-day, he would vote to go into committee, but not otherwise.

Mr. VERPLANCK replied that he would not pledge himself not to move the bill, but he would assure gentlemen he should not insist upon having it taken up now.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, in the chair.

Mr. VERPLANCK said he should waive his motion for considering the bill to reduce the tariff for the present, but would renew it at a very early day; to-morrow, if possible.

Certain appropriation bills being taken up, and having been gone through with—

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ROOT moved the consideration of a resolution offered by him last session, to amend the constitution of the United States.

The motion, after some opposition, was agreed to: Yeas 60, nays 50.

Mr. ROOT said the resolution was introduced last session, with the view of carrying into execution the very first recommendation of the President for the then three successive years. A report was moved at the last session, that it was proper to vote directly for President and Vice President, and that there should be some modification by which a recurrence to the House of Representatives should never take place if possible. This proposition, so solemnly and so repeatedly recommended to their consideration, would, he admitted, if carried into execution, change what he used to consider the principle of the presidential election. The principle he used to believe was this: that the election should be by States, in a manner substantially the same as under the old confederation, when each State had an equal number of votes; and that, under the constitution, as he understood it, the only alteration was this: that, inasmuch as the principles of taxation and representation were to go hand in hand together, the new constitution introduced another branch of representation, namely, the tax-paying interest; thus providing that the States paying the most taxes should have the greater vote in the choice of President and Vice President. By combining the principles of representation by States with that of representation according to the tax-paying interest, the larger States had more votes in the elections than the smaller. The electoral colleges, chosen in the manner which the States might respectively provide, had a direct vote in the election of President and Vice President. But a notion had prevailed, and had been increasing for years, that the election would be more popular in every State, provided the people chose their own electoral colleges.

JAN. 3, 1833.]

Reduction of Postage.

[H. OF R.]

In pursuance of this practice most of the States had provided that the people should choose their electors; this being so, it followed that, if it was proper that they should have a voice in the election of President and Vice President, then the constitution should be so provided that they could have their choice. The present President feeling the full force of this popular sentiment, amounting almost to a command, because it was the popular voice in every State of the Union, had recommended that the vote of the people in elections should be direct. Was there not, in the late election, additional reasons for this? He would ask whether, at the late election in most of the States—or he would mention the States of New York and Pennsylvania, because he was better acquainted with them—he asked, then, whether, in those States, the people called on to vote had an opportunity fully to express their opinion as to the candidate they desired to be elected? It was not so. When persons appointed agents, the fitness and character of those agents should certainly be taken into consideration. A man of honor, if he would do a thing, supposing it to be a proper thing, would be unwilling to do it with a foul instrument. Again: when a person employed an agent to do a thing, he was desirous to know whether he had performed his duty with fidelity; whether he had acted as he should have done if the person by whom he was appointed had been present. If he could not know this, he should be unwilling to appoint an agent. Besides, too, there was a liability that the agent might betray his trust voluntarily; he might be seduced or purchased to act contrary to the interests of his employer. The principle of elections had been lately urged on their consideration by reasons ten-fold stronger than Executive authority: he meant the declaration that the Executive is the representative of the whole people—that the Executive represents the whole United States. Forcible arguments were offered to show that such is the fact, otherwise a minority might elect a President against the will of the majority. If this was not to be inferred, at first sight, from the constitution, yet the principle was declared to be found there. Was it not better, then, if this was correct, to have it so plain that all might see that it was so; that it might be approved in all parts of the country, and by all parties, that the President is the representative of all the people of the United States taken as an unity. This principle, having received such high sanction, and been so universally approved, should they not place it in the constitution so as to make it beyond doubt? There would be no departure from the federal principle from adopting the provision of the resolution. When he introduced it, he thought it best that the Supreme Court should canvass the votes, so that, in a contested election, a body, supposed to be above all political feeling, should have the decision; but many of the select committee thought it would be best that the canvass should take place in the same way as heretofore. But one of the objections made by the members of the committee was, that, if there should arise a difference in the votes, an unequal vote might be obtained by a joint ballot of the two Houses. He preferred that the tax-paying part of the people should return their representatives, and it was necessary that there should be some court, some body instituted to decide, because it was impossible to decide by sending the question back to the people. In the anticipation of such an event, as that of sending the question back for the decision of the people, it would be necessary to have the election a year or two before hand, otherwise there would, in such a case, follow a dissolution of the Government. According to the calculation of chances, however, such a thing could not happen above once in a thousand years; there was not much danger to be apprehended from that; other circumstances might occur to cause a dissolution of the Union. Should it be said that a recommendation so solemnly and so repeatedly made, should be passed over without the consideration of the House?

Mr. POLK moved that, in reporting the bills which had passed through the committee, the resolution would be reported as still under consideration.

This motion gave rise to a long debate on a question of order, viz: When a number of bills have been successively considered in Committee of the Whole, and laid aside, and while another is under discussion, a motion is made, to rise, whether the chairman of the committee, in making his report to the House, shall report the bills which have been considered and laid aside, to the House, without an order of the committee to that effect? and whether the bill or resolution under consideration when the motion to rise was made, and which bill, &c., had not been amended, is to be reported with the previous bills?

The debate terminated by the committee rising; when the chairman reported to the House all the bills, but reported progress only upon the resolution.

Mr. WICKLIFFE opposed the report of the chairman as unauthorized.

The SPEAKER replied that it could take cognizance of what had been done in Committee of the Whole only through the report of the chairman of that committee.

After several ineffectual attempts to amend or set aside the report, it was suffered to stand.

So the resolution of Mr. ROOT is still in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House then adjourned without acting on the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted on a preceding day by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, instructing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to bring in a bill reducing the rates of postage.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that he had an amendment to propose, which might, perhaps, meet the approbation of the gentleman who offered the original resolution,

H. OF R.]

Remission of Duties.

and of the House also; it was simply to provide that the efficiency of the Post Office should not be impaired, nor its ability to sustain itself diminished. Mr. C. then offered the amendment.

Mr. EVERETT regretted that there should be any objection to a resolution of inquiry going to the Post Office Committee. The character of that committee was, he should have thought, a sufficient guarantee that nothing injurious to the public interest could be expected at their hands. He was of opinion that the resolution should be referred without the restrictions imposed by the amendment; but, rather, than it should be rejected, he would vote for the resolution with the addition of the amendment.

Mr. POLK said that, as he could not perceive any necessity for acting on either the original proposition or the modification suggested by his friend from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] he should move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

On this motion Mr. EVERETT demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered and taken, stood as follows: Yeas 89, nays 89.

The CHAIR gave the casting vote in the affirmative; so the resolution was laid on the table.

The question came up on the engrossment of the several bills which passed through the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROOT wished to inquire whether the committee had reported these bills?

The SPEAKER said such was the report of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ROOT moved that the Committee of the Whole have leave to sit again upon these bills.

The SPEAKER declared the motion not to be in order. Mr. ROOT appealed from the decision of the Chair, and explained the grounds of his appeal at length.

The SPEAKER explained the grounds of his decision, which was affirmed by the House without a division.

Mr. ROOT then moved that the bills be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but it was subsequently withdrawn.

The bills were all ordered to be engrossed as reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, excepting the bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for 1833, and that exempting merchandise, imported under certain circumstances, from the operation of the act of May, 1828.

When the first named bill came up,

A motion was made by Mr. FOSTER to amend the items appropriating 25,600 dollars for the incidental and contingent expenses of the Senate, and 100,000 dollars for the incidental and contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, by appending thereto the following, viz: "And no part of this appropriation shall be applied to any printing, other than of such documents or papers as are connected with the ordinary proceedings of either of the said Houses, ordered during its session, and executed by the public printer, agreeably to his contract, excepting such as may have been ordered by the joint committee for preparing a code of laws for the District of Columbia, or such printing and books as have heretofore been ordered by the House."

Mr. FOSTER explained the grounds of this amendment, which, he stated, would make the provisions of the act, in this respect, similar to that in the act of 1829—30. He was opposed to the practice of furnishing books for the members of either House out of the contingent fund of that House. An appropriation, by a resolution of the House, out of the contingent fund, to improve the city of Washington, was quite as correct, in point of principle. If it became necessary to furnish books for the members, let it be done upon the vote of both Houses of Congress, agreeably to the forms prescribed by the constitution.

Mr. VERPLANCK was aware that the House had, perhaps, gone too far in the purchase of books from the contingent fund; but this amendment might prevent the furnishing such as were absolutely necessary. He thought gentlemen ought to be willing to trust themselves on this subject.

Mr. FOSTER thought the reason for this amendment was quite as strong now as three years ago. It was provided by the constitution that money should not be drawn out of the treasury but by law. The contingent fund had been applied to the purchase of books for members without law, by only a simple resolution of the House. There was a standing appropriation of five thousand dollars for the increase of the library. He thought that was sufficient without purchasing five or six thousand dollars worth of books for the individual benefit of the members.

Mr. W. MCCOY called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment, which were ordered.

✓ The amendment was adopted: Yeas 101, nays 70.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The bill to exempt merchandise, imported under certain circumstances, from the operation of the act of 19th May, 1828, then came up on the question of engrossment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that it was only necessary to understand the principle of this bill to be convinced that it was against the true policy of the country. The merchants, who were to be relieved, had ordered goods from abroad previous to their knowledge that the tariff bill of 1828 was about to be passed, and when it was too late to countermand their orders before that law went into effect. The goods came, therefore, liable to a much higher duty than had been calculated upon when they were ordered, and a loss ensued. Admit this state of the fact, still they were not entitled to the relief claimed, because they had it in their option to reshipe the goods and get the drawback. Besides, the goods thus imported, had been sold by the importers; and if the principle so often advanced, and so strenuously maintained in that House, that the consumer of the goods paid the duty, was a true principle, how could it be just to refund to these importers the amount of duty which they had charged upon the goods sold, and had, therefore, already received from their customers? Besides, Congress had no right to charge less duty on goods imported by our own merchants than on those imported by foreigners; to do so would be a violation of our commercial treaties; and if this relief was to be extended to all the merchants, resident as well as native, Government must go back and refund the whole difference of duty between the tariff of 1824 and 1828. It was said that the prices at which the merchants sold their goods, did not reimburse them for the cost and duty; it might be so; it could not be helped; it was one of those curses which ever followed too frequent legislation on such great and momentous concerns. The bill went to establish a principle which the Government could not carry out, and its operation would be unequal and unjust.

Mr. HOFFMAN wished to be informed on what description of goods, in point of fact, the duty would be refunded, and what would be the amount taken from the treasury?

Mr. VERPLANCK replied, by referring him to a document where the kinds of goods were detailed. The total amount to be refunded would be 450,000 dollars.

Mr. DEARBORN said that it would be recollected by the House that the tariff law of 1828 was passed on the 29th day of May. It had been reported, however, at a very early period of the session, and in its original shape; the time at which it was to take effect was declared to be on the 30th day of June. When the bill was about to pass it was deemed proper to alter this period to the 1st of September. This alteration had been made by the Remission of Duties.

Senate; but, through inadvertence, the amendments had been confined to the first section of the bill, and had not been inserted in the other clauses of it. Hence, it came to pass that the law operated very unequally. On the goods embraced in the first section of the bill, viz: iron, steel, and lead, the duty did not become operative until the 1st of September; while, on all other goods mentioned, it took effect on the 30th of June. The law was passed at so late a period of the session, that it was impossible the news of its enactment could have reached the more distant parts of the United States until early in June; after which thirty days would be required for the intelligence to reach the nearest ports of Europe. It was obviously impossible that orders for goods, which had been previously sent out, could be countermanded in time to save the goods from the operation of the law—especially those which were ordered in Asia, (and we had then much trade with Smyrna,) and those in South America and the Baltic Sea. The most strenuous efforts had been made to countermand them; but the letters from agents abroad stated that the cargoes had been contracted for, and those contracts could not be annulled. Some were, in consequence, directed to sell abroad; but they replied that, on receiving the news, goods had fallen, and if the cargoes were sold they would not bring first cost. When the goods thus purchased came in, they had to compete with those which were already in market, and the consequence was a general fall in the price of goods. So far was it from being true that the consumer had paid these duties, that the whole loss fell exclusively on the pockets of the importers; and the goods were finally sold at a very great sacrifice. On one order of wool from Smyrna, as much as 19,000 dollars had been lost by the difference of duty. Mr. D. said that he had at that time been in circumstances to know the true effect of the tariff of 1828 upon the commercial world. There had been no previous notes of preparation by which any merchant could have been enabled to anticipate that such a law was about to pass. He had scarce found one who believed that the bill would ever become a law. It came upon commercial men with a sudden shock. Agents, familiar with the markets of England, had made the utmost efforts to sell abroad, but had been unable to do it. And the whole loss which ensued fell directly upon the importer, and upon him alone.

Mr. D. asked whether it was just, whether it was equitable, or honorable, in Government to pass a bill of so much consequence, with such suddenness as to leave no time for the countermanding of orders sent abroad, and then to refuse to the merchant, thus taken by surprise, that relief to which he had a right? It had been urged by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] that merchants never could escape the consequences of a ruinous fluctuation of duties. This was but too true; but was this to be advanced as an argument against the demand of honest claimants? If the Government had pursued a wrong and oppressive course, were they to be told that they must never come to their senses, and compensate for what they had inflicted? Was it not an act of simple justice? He trusted the House would never yield to such an argument. He believed the petitioners had suffered great wrong, and were justly entitled to redress. As to foreign merchants, few sent goods here on their own account. Most of them had houses here, which were considered as entirely on the footing of American houses; and he had no objection that the relief should be extended to them as fully as to our own merchants.

Mr. HOFFMAN observed that the situation in which he had been placed, by the selection of the House, must plead his apology for opposing the bill now before it. Having adverted to the facts on which the claim was founded, he concluded that the bill was consistent neither with the principles of sound policy, nor the dictates of a just and enlightened judgment. It was maintained that, when the Government passed an act, raising the amount of duty on imported goods, it was bound to allow the importer full time to countermand his previous orders, or supply himself abundantly before the act should take effect. In the session of 1828 such a principle would have been deemed, by certain gentlemen, heretical in the extreme. The object in passing the tariff of that year was avowedly to secure to the American manufacturer, and to the owners of goods already on hand, the entire possession of the American market. Now, to maintain that the act must be made so far prospective that the importer should have ample time to order such a supply as must in effect prevent the purpose in view, would have been considered as a proposition intended to defeat the bill. Now, if it would have been impolitic not to pass such a bill as the tariff of 1828, it must be equally so to relieve merchants from its operation. The two things went on the same principle. If the House must grant this relief, in order to prevent the law from being unjust in its operation, then it was equally binding so to construct the law that no such relief would be needed; and, to do this, it must be so far prospective that the merchant should, in fact, have time to evade its effects. And, on the same ground, whenever Congress should reduce the duties, the law must have the same character, in order that the holder of goods imported under the former rates of duty, might have time to get rid of them.

If that was the judgment of the House, they would express it by passing the present bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] had stated the substantial objection to the bill. Few persons would dispute the doctrine that duties fell eventually upon the consumer. On this principle alone a tariff bill could operate as protection to domestic industry. If the American manufacturer could get the same price for his commodity, without the duty on the imported, he was very sure he would never desire such a duty to be laid, because its effect must be to make the goods come so much dearer to the consumer. It was said, however, that, after the tariff of 1828, the prices of goods had declined. How this was to be accounted for, Mr. H. never could conceive, unless it arose from a vast over importation; and if this importation was caused by the anticipation that such a bill as the tariff of 1828 would become a law, then no just claim could be pretended for relief. If it was over-importation which had kept down the price, let those who imported take the consequences. But Mr. H. rather supposed such an effect grew out of the natural course of trade, and the foreign goods came in only to pay for our own products which had previously gone out.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DEARBORN] had said that the tariff had been passed so suddenly, that it was impossible any merchant could have anticipated it. Mr. H. differed from that gentleman entirely as to the state of the fact. The question had been agitated during the preceding session of 1827. In 1828 a great convention had been held, the reports of whose proceedings not only spread through every portion of this country, but went abroad to other countries. The whole object of holding that convention had been to bring about an increase of duties on foreign manufactures; and the over-importation of that year was occasioned by the expectation that such a measure would be adopted. Mr. H. however, did not place much reliance on this; for though the imports had been very great, they had not much exceeded the amount necessary to pay for the exports of the previous year, and the cost of their exportation. But still, the overstocking of the market was the reason why the price of goods had not risen after the law went into effect. The prices had fallen; but they would have fallen yet more if the duties had not been increased. If this was true, the importers had no just demand for compensation. There was another reason why their demand was not reasonable. The whole evil they had suffered arose from the state of the foreign market, or was so intimately connected with it that it was impossible to say to what exact amount they had been injured by the passage of the act. How could any man say that it was just 100,000, or exactly 400,000, or any other specific sum? The whole subject was enveloped in mist and uncertainty. Though the price of goods had not risen in proportion to the increase of duty, yet they had not fallen as much as they would have done had the duties not been raised.

On the whole, Mr. H. considered the bill, in its principle, both impolitic and unjust. If the principle was to be established, that whenever any charge of the rates of duty was to be made, either by increasing or diminishing them, the merchant must be allowed time to shape his business accordingly, the importer would enjoy a great advantage over both the manufacturer of domestic and the importer of foreign goods. It was only by a strict enforcement of the rule of law, that these classes would be enabled to defend themselves against the competition of the importers. Were not these holders of goods, in country stores especially, the very collectors of the revenue? Ought not Government to protect them as such, and give them a fair chance of living in their own market? But should Government always allow a delay of three, four, or six months before a tariff law went into effect, there would still be importers in the same relative condition as now; and the effect of such delay would fall with most destructive effect on all retailers, and on all the manufacturers of the country: a numerous class of citizens, whom, he trusted, no man in that House was disposed to injure.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose in support of the bill. The principal objection to it, as he understood gentlemen, was, that the relief now sought was not provided by the tariff bill itself. If that argument was a good one, then the House must take it for granted that every bill ever passed by Congress, ay, though it might be "a bill of abominations," was the very best that could possibly have been passed; and, however harshly its provisions might operate, Congress was never to provide a remedy. There was nothing new in the principle of this bill. It had been the invariable practice of the Government of the United States to grant relief in all cases where the parties concerned had had no opportunity to become acquainted with the existence of the law, or where a law operated with oppressive rigor on particular interests in the country. Laws of this character had passed during the continuance of the restrictive system and the non-importation act; forfeitures were every day remitted, in cases where vessels had not been in circumstances to get notice of the legislation by which they were to be effected. Many of these claims arose out of cases in which the tariff law of 1828 had never been intended to operate. The circumstances of the two dates, at which different portions of that law had taken effect, had been already explained.

There was no necessity of settling the abstract question, whether importers were, in all cases, to have full time allowed them to prepare for a law before it went into operation. He should not rely upon theories. The House ought not to be governed by theories. They should look at actual matter of fact. After the passage of the tariff of 1828, it was a fact that goods had fallen generally. There had been no material rise in prices. The importers had had no opportunity to countermand their orders, which had been predicated in the duties of 1824, and the whole increase of duty fell upon the importers alone. The gentleman from Kentucky had asked why they did not reship the goods? The answer was easy. The expense would have amounted to more than the excess of duty. They must encounter a loss at all events, and they preferred relying on the justice of Congress who had drawn them into the difficulty. The act obliged them to make out a clear case to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and, if they were able to do this, they were justly entitled to relief.

The House here, on motion of Mr. BURGESS, adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 4.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The following resolution, moved yesterday by Mr. VERPLANCE, coming up to-day in course, it was read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next, as soon as the morning business is over on each day, the House will proceed to the consideration of the bills from the Senate, and engrossed bills, and such as have passed through Committee of the Whole House, and that, at the hour of one, on each day, the House will proceed to the consideration of "the bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports," until otherwise ordered.

Mr. McKENNAN moved to amend the resolution by striking out "Monday next," and inserting "the first Monday of February next."

Mr. McKENNAN said that his motive in moving an amendment of this description must be obvious. An act had passed at the last session of Congress, reducing the duties on imports, and before that law had gone into operation, another bill was now reported to the House to carry the reduction still further. He appealed to the gentleman, he appealed to every member of the House, he appealed especially to his own colleagues, to say whether they had received any expression of the opinion of their constituents, which would justify them in acting on such a proposition? There was not a citizen within his own district who so much as dreamed that the subject would be touched during the session; and he could not feel himself at liberty to consent that such a measure should even be considered. The bill from the Committee of Ways and Means aimed a blow, a fatal blow, at the interests of his constituents.

Here the CHAIR interposed, and reminded the gentleman that the merits of the bill could not now be gone into.

Mr. McK. resumed, and said that he had only adverted to the character of the bill, to show the vast importance of the measure which this resolution went to bring at once and exclusively before the House. It had only been a few days since the bill had been reported. The moment he could obtain a copy of it he sent it to his constituents; they had not had time to consider it, or to send on to him the result of their examination of it. Until then he had nothing to justify him in giving his assent to such a resolution.

Mr. POLK said that the gentleman had given to the resolution an importance to which it was not entitled. It was a mere arrangement of the business before the House. To adopt the amendment which had been proposed, would be equivalent to the expression of a determination that the House would not go into even a consideration of the great question of the reduction of duties at the present session. He trusted gentlemen were not prepared to say this. The resolution was a literal transcript of one passed at the last session. If the subject was to be taken up at all, it was obviously necessary that it should be considered at as early a period as might be consistent with a due regard to other public interests. He believed that these would not suffer from the adoption of the resolution; and he hoped, therefore, that it would be agreed to; and, with a view to ascertain whether the House was or was not disposed to take up the subject of the tariff at the present session of Congress, he demanded the previous question.

The motion was seconded by the House: Ayes 83, noes 78.

The question then being whether the main question shall now be put?

Mr. VANCE demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the reading of the resolution and amendment; and they were read again.

Mr. CRAWFORD remarked that the vote just taken showed the absence of fifty members of the House; and, as this was avowedly a test vote, he thought it no more than fair that all should be present; he, therefore, moved a call of the House; which was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and having got through with it, and the names of the absentees being ordered to be called again—

Mr. WILDE moved that all farther proceedings on the call be suspended, as he feared that otherwise the hour allotted to resolutions, would elapse before the yeas and nays could be taken on the question before the House.

Mr. ELLSWORTH opposed the motion. He believed no question had ever been agitated in this House since the organization of the Government, so deeply involving the interests of his constituents, if not of the country, as the question of repealing the tariff. To enter upon an inquiry to do this, and to enter upon this inquiry without liberty of debate, might well alarm the people. He should be glad to assign some reasons for not again, at this time, and under existing circumstances, legislating on the tariff; he was not willing thus to hasten to retrace the steps so lately taken. He trusted that on one of the most momentous questions which could come before them, it would at least be permitted that all the members should have an opportunity of voting. If the measure was to be thrust down their throats, let them at least have liberty to record their votes against it. He should have been exceedingly glad if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] would have permitted those who were very deeply interested in the result of the measure proposed, an opportunity of expressing their sentiments; but as that was denied, he hoped that they should be allowed at least the consolation of recording their votes in relation to it.

Mr. POLK said there seemed to be some misapprehension as to his purpose in calling the previous question, and as to the effect of that motion. He had had no wish whatever to preclude the fullest discussion of the subject of the tariff; this was merely a resolution in relation to the order of business before the House. So far from its being his purpose to "thrust down the throats" of gentlemen any discussion in reference to the subject of the tariff, the effect of the amendment would be, on the contrary, to allow the fullest opportunity to have that subject considered and discussed. He trusted his friend from Georgia [Mr. WILDE] would withdraw his motion for a suspension of the call.

Mr. WILDE was sorry he could not do so; but he was disposed to proceed upon the old maxim—"When you are in a majority, act: when you are in a minority, talk." The House could not complain of being taken by surprise; the resolution had been offered yesterday, and laid on the table; every one knew it would come up to-day. He wished, therefore, that the House should proceed to the vote.

Mr. SLADE demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the call, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. BURGESS remonstrated against the precipitancy with which gentlemen wished to proceed. All ought to be present; and time should be allowed them to reach the House in the ordinary course of attendance. Who could have dreamed that, at a time like this, the previous question would be called upon them, and that on a subject upon which the House at the last session had deliberated for five months? The gentleman's resolution went to thrust the tariff bill ahead of all other business, and cause it to override every thing else. And this, not that they might carry into effect the will of their constituents, but the will of those known not to be their constituents.

Here the CHAIR interposed; and arrested the discussion, as running into the merits of the bill.

Mr. B. resumed, and insisted that time should be allowed to all the members to be present. There would have been no call of the House had not the motion been considered as one of a very extraordinary character: a measure altogether unprecedented, and beyond the remotest expectations, even of those most submissive to the will which had thrust the general subject upon the House. The members ought to be at the House; yes, though the cannon should be pointed at that Hall.

The question was now put on suspending the call, and decided by yeas and nays: Yeas 106, Nays 85.

So the call was suspended.

The CHAIR now stated that the hour allotted to resolutions had elapsed, and the subject was laid over.

The remainder of the day was spent on private bills.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5.

POINT OF ORDER.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to revive and continue in force the law appointing a reporter of the proceedings of the Supreme Court, and moved that, without commitment, the bill be ordered to engrossment for its third reading.

The CHAIR decided that the bill, going to create an office with a salary, came within the spirit of the following rules:

"101. No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day in which it is made or offered; and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House.

102. No sum or quantum of tax or duty, voted by a Committee of the Whole House, shall be increased in the House until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed, and voted in a Committee of the Whole House, and so in respect to the time of its continuance.

103. All proceedings, touching appropriations of money, shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole House."

From this decision Mr. ADAMS took an appeal, and the question of order was argued at large by Messrs. WICKLIFFE, ADAMS, ELLSWORTH, IRWIN, TAYLOR, WAYNE, WILLIAMS, E. EVERETT, and REED, of Massachusetts.

The Speaker's decision was sustained by himself, upon the ground that whatever doubt there might be as to the strict letter of the rules, this bill came clearly within their reason and spirit. These rules, he maintained, were the laws of the House, intended to govern their proceedings, and ought, therefore, to be construed according to their obvious intent and spirit, the good to be obtained by them, or the evils guarded against. So long as he presided over the deliberations of the House, he should pursue this course, in the discharge of his duties, and in construing and expounding its rules.

The object of these rules could not be misunderstood. They were intended to guard against precipitate legislation, and to afford every opportunity for free discussion and debate on all subjects touching the appropriation of money, or imposing a tax or charge upon the people. This bill creates a new office, and fixes a salary, though the appropriating clause is omitted. Hence it was said not to fall within the operation of the rules.

The Chair maintained that the omission of the appropriating clause made no difference; it was of a character which rendered it peculiarly liable to the operation of these rules. The Chair proceeded to show the danger of such a construction, and the manner in which the benefits and spirit of the rules would be defeated.

What benefit would arise from the committal of a bill appropriating a sum of money, after the law had fixed the office, and salary, and the appointment had been made, and the duties performed? The appropriation would follow as a matter of course. He instanced the cases of the President, judges, and officers of the United States. What benefit, in fact, arose from committing a bill appropriating the funds to pay them? None. But suppose a bill to raise the salary of all these officers, is it not apparent that the commitment of the bill, in such case, would be important? The Chair thought it an important decision, and felt gratified that it would now be settled by the solemn judgment of the House for their future action.

Mr. ADAMS hereupon withdrew his appeal.

Mr. ARNOLD asked the Speaker whether the discussion which had been made, would now appear upon the journal?

The SPEAKER answered that it would not.

Mr. ARNOLD then said, as he considered the discussion of the Speaker as settling an important principle, a principle which threw an additional guard around the public treasury, he was desirous of having it upon the journal. He was desirous of this for several reasons. It guarded the people's money for one thing; and, therefore, ought to go upon the journal. It will enable us to act uniformly on this subject; and, as he had no other means of getting it upon the journals, but by renewing the appeal, he did so, although he should vote to sustain the decision of the Chair, believing it to be right.

Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were taken, and stood as follows: Yeas, 162, nays 14. So the decision of the Chair was affirmed, and the bill was committed.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day, being private bills, among the rest the bill for the relief of Major General Alexander Macomb, [which goes to relieve him from the payment of 10,000 dollars as security for a paymaster.] Mr. WARD explained, and advocated the bill with great warmth. It was proposed by Mr. DANIEL that the bill go to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. WILLIAMS thought it should be referred to the Committee on Claims; and, on these motions, a long and desultory discussion arose, which was not terminated when

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 7.

POINT OF ORDER.

The following resolution, moved last week by Mr. VERPLANCK, came up again for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next, as soon as the morning business is over on each day, the House will proceed to the consideration of the bills from the Senate, and engrossed bills, and such as have passed through Committee of the Whole House, and that, at the hour of one, on each day, the House will proceed to the consideration of "the bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports," until otherwise ordered.

And the question lying over being, "Shall the main question on this resolution be now put?"

Mr. DENNY moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STEWART moved a call of the House.

On this motion Mr. TAYLOR demanded the yeas and nays. They were ordered, and taken, and stood: Yeas, 79, nays, 106.

The question then coming up on the motion of Mr. DENNY, to lay the resolution on the table, it was decided in the negative by yeas and nays: Yeas, 78, nays, 112.

The question next being, Shall the main question be now put? It was decided in the affirmative: Yeas, 107; nays, 88.

The main question was, on the adoption of the resolution, and as it was about to be put,

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, stated to the Chair that the hour allotted to resolutions had expired, and moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

The CHAIR pronounced this motion to be out of order, inasmuch as the House had ordered the main question now to be put.

To this decision Mr. DENNY objected, and took an appeal.

The House sustained the decision of the Chair; and the main question, "Shall the resolution be adopted?" was then decided in the affirmative: Yeas, 118, nays, 82.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The House then proceeded to the unfinished business of Thursday—the bill to exempt merchandise imported under certain circumstances from the operation of the act passed 19th of May, 1828.

A prolonged and animated debate took place upon the principle of this bill, of which the following is the substance:

Mr. BURGESS said the ground upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] appeared to place his present opposition to the bill was, that it effected the rights of the manufacturers. This, in his view, was not a sound objection to the bill. Ardent as he had ever been in the support of the manufacturing interest, he was unwilling to do injustice to the merchants. Where a question of justice arose, it was not for him to distinguish one interest from another. This merchandise had been imported under peculiar circumstances. The proposition to increase the duties had been debated during the greater part of the session of 1828. It was thought by most importers that the bill, for that purpose, would not pass. They had accordingly gone on as they had done, and ordered their goods under the duties which prevailed in 1827. But when the goods arrived here, the duties imposed by the act of 1828, were levied upon them. From the course trade had assumed, it was not in their power to get back the money they had thus paid in increased duties. The general rule undoubtedly was, that the impost paid on the importation of merchandise became one of the elements of its price to the consumer. But when this was carried beyond a certain rate, purchasers would not buy. This had been their condition. They had been obliged to sell the goods at a sacrifice or not at all. Inquiry had been made as to the amount which might be drawn from the treasury under this bill. It had been intimated that half a million was too much to pay under such circumstances. But, in such a case, the greater the amount the greater necessity existed for justice. Those who claimed that this amount should be refunded, had proved that they could not countermand their order for goods—which they would have done had opportunity been given; and that the prices had not been raised in consequence of the increased duty paid upon the goods. It had been supposed that the law would not go into operation before the 30th of September. But it was found that this period was confined to the first section; all the others went into operation on the 30th of June. He had himself stated, on going home, after the close of the session of 1828, that it was by mistake that the law did not take effect in all its sections in September instead of June. A liability was thus brought upon the importers, which they could not avoid. The proof that goods declined in price instead of rising, is conclusive. [Mr. B. stated, and commented upon the testimony in the report on this point at length.] There was in the treasury about half a million of dollars, which, in equity and justice, belonged to these importers. We were their debtors to that amount. They cannot be paid unless this bill is passed. They had brought goods into the consumption of the country, to the amount of a million and an half of dollars, which could not be sold for more than costs and charges, without the duty. The country had been benefited by the cheapness which was thus occasioned. This great stock had caused a decline of prices which had been continually going on. In consequence of these importations, goods have been purchased from that time to the present at less prices than they would have otherwise brought. They had been obliged to pay an amount in duties, which had not been refunded by the consumers; and that, in consequence of the operation of the law, which was not fixed at a time sufficiently prospective to enable them to protect themselves. Shall they be compelled to bear this loss for relying upon the maxim that duties are paid by the consumer? The loss was occasioned by a mistake in legislation, and it was our duty to make reparation.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought he could satisfy the House in a few words, that the bill ought not to pass. The bill proposed to refund the duties paid on merchandise imported between June and September, whether any loss was sustained on the importation or not. If the relief contemplated is placed on the ground that loss has been occasioned by our legislation, why are not the invoices and accounts of sales of these goods produced and submitted to a committee, who would report the facts? It would then be seen whether a loss had been sustained in point of fact. But, by a general law applying to all cases of importation, whether profitable or otherwise, it is proposed to pay back the duties. He was not prepared thus to open the doors of the Treasury—especially upon this alleged ground of mistake. He well remembered the progress of the bill of 1828; and his recollection was borne out by the journals. The bill was not passed in haste. It had been urged in 1827. As the woollens bill of that session did not pass, a great convention was got up during the summer of that year. The Presidential election was then pending. The friends of the candidates, then before the people, gave many assurances of their friendship to the tariff policy, particularly in Pennsylvania. He well remembered the quo animo with which the bill was carried through. As originally reported the bill was to have gone into operation on the 15th of May. Its passage having been protracted, its operation was postponed to the 30th of June, excepting the first section which was fixed on the 30th of September. An attempt was made to fix the operation of the other sections to that period, which failed. The sense of the Senate was expressly taken upon that question. There was no mistake in fixing the time from which the bill was to operate. He remembered the arguments used on the occasion. It was said in behalf of the manufacturers, that if the operation of the bill was postponed to the 30th of September, the country would be flooded with foreign merchandise at reduced duties. If goods had been ordered they would have the benefit of the increased duties by the enhanced prices. If the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BRASS] can satisfy the House that the fall of prices was occasioned by the act, he would then present a case for the equitable consideration of the House. The evidence does not prove this; it shows losses to have occurred from the fluctuations of trade, not to be ascribed to the act, but to the general over-trading of the merchants. Shall we make good, from the public treasury, all losses which merchants may fall into from over-importation? The manufacturers might more properly claim an indemnity for losses occasioned by the repeal of duties. Suppose, instead of a fall of prices, they had been greatly enhanced? This was the professed object of the law. It was either intended to prohibit the importation of foreign manufactures or to increase the prices. If it did neither, we were very idly occupied in passing laws for the protection of manufacturers. But had prices risen, ought we to oblige merchants to pay their profits into the treasury? The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BRASS] says these importations created so great an excess in the market, that the country purchased their goods at a cheaper rate, and, therefore, the duties should be refunded. When the importers and manufacturers combine in overstocking the market, are we to make good the losses of one or both classes, whenever such an event happens? He hoped such a principle would meet with no countenance.

Mr. DRAYTON said he should vote in favor of the bill, because he believed it to be the duty of the Government to give sufficient notice of the operation of a law increasing the duties, to enable merchants to import merchandise in reference to the law. If this principle was not incorporated into the act originally, it should be so now. There was no reason why iron, which was the subject of the first section of the act of 1828, should be placed on a better footing in this respect than woollens or cottons. If individuals, in the ordinary course of business, and not by ruinous speculations, had suffered losses from the want of the principle being incorporated into the act, he was willing to grant them relief. It was but an act of common justice to place them now where we ought to have originally placed them. The strong part of the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] was, that the importers were not taken by surprise—that the proposition was long pending. But it should be recollected that they could not have foreseen that the act would have gone so soon into operation. Where orders had been given in the ordinary course of business, was there sufficient opportunity given to countermand them? He thought not. On this ground he hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, the merits of the bill, in his view, lay within a small compass. The claim for the relief proposed was founded upon an allegation of mistake. That allegation had been fully refuted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] whose statements were supported by the journals. Had there been no evidence whatever on that point, he should have regarded it as immaterial. There could be no evidence recurring against the terms of the law itself. It had been said that we were bound in justice to refund the duties because the price of merchandise fell. What was the occasion of the fall of prices? Was it not the design of the law to augment prices? That certainly was its aim and object. But it seems that prices fell; and was this fall occasioned by the act of the Government? No, the importers themselves occasioned it. Under the act of 1824, the maximum duty was 75 per cent. Under the act of 1828, it was 275 per cent. If the natural effect of the last act had not been obviated, would prices have fallen from its operation? If they had fallen, who had produced the fall? There could be no doubt but it was occasioned by excessive importations. Shall the importers now turn round and ask us to indemnify them from the consequences of their own improvidence? Shall Congress make itself the guardian to protect every body from making improvident contracts? People were generally vigilant enough in the pursuit of their own interests. If a merchant sends out a ship, and happens to import goods which are sold at a loss, he must bear it. If the goods sell at a high profit, he is entitled to enjoy it. Had prices risen, instead of falling, after the act of 1828, could we have required the merchants to bestow their profits either on the Government, or the consumers? The principle of this bill resolves itself into this naked question: Shall we indemnify these importers for their own improvident acts? Before such a question is settled in the affirmative, we should see where it will lead us. A bill has been reported new modelling the duties imposed by the act of 1828, which would, very probably, pass. Suppose the consequence of this bill to be the breaking down of the manufacturing establishments of the Middle and Eastern States, and the sacrifice of a hundred millions of dollars invested in those establishments. Will not these manufacturers, under these circumstances, have a stronger claim upon the public treasury than these importers? If this bill is carried through, the same principle would establish their claim. But the principle is wholly wrong. It is taking charge of the pursuits of private individuals, and becoming sponsor for the success of their speculations. It is, in short, becoming security for every individual in the United States, and would lead to the allowance of all claims which individuals may choose to set up, on the ground of losses occasioned by our legislation. But Government cannot be charged as a wrongdoer. No hostility to private interests can be ascribed to its acts. If injuries result from the operation of laws, they must be incidental, and not designed. All the acts and measures of Government are supposed to be influenced by motives of benevolence—by a single regard to the general welfare. If the bill recently reported for the reduction of duties should pass, it probably will be hard to satisfy the Eastern manufacturers that it is an act of benevolence. Yet they are obliged to be satisfied. They would not be entitled to any indemnity of the Government for the losses to which it might subject them. He would mete out the same measure of justice to merchants and manufacturers.

Tuzation and the Tariff.

And the House adjourne.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 8.

TAXATION AND THE TARIFF.

Mr. BURGESS moved the following preamble and resolution, which were read and laid on the table, viz:

Whereas it has been alleged in statements made in this House by members thereof, and elsewhere by others, that the power given to Congress by the constitution, to lay and collect duties by impost, on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States from foreign countries, has been, and now is, unequally, unjustly, and tyrannically exercised by the majority thereof; that by such injustice and tyranny so exercised, the people in certain States of the Union, called by themselves the Plantation States, are grievously oppressed, and compelled, ruinously to themselves, to pay annually a great amount of money over and above their fair and ratable portion of such duties; that they have alleged also, both within and without these walls, the people of those States have been, and now are, compelled, by the despotic exercise of the power aforesaid, to pay annually a heavy amount of money as duties, imposed on their staple products, cotton, rice, and tobacco, when exported from these States to foreign countries; and that as they have often alleged, moreover, on this floor, and lately have, by public functionaries, in one of those States, proclaimed to the people of that State, and of the United States, that those great sums of money, so unjustly exacted and extorted from them as aforesaid for duties, both on their imports and exports, are, by the despotic exercise of powers usurped by Congress, lavished in bounties given by a tyrannical majority of that Congress to manufacturers in the Northern, and especially in the New England States, and in expenditures on works in those States exclusively for the benefit of the people thereof in the employment of their labor, and in the consumption of their products; so that, by these allegations made, repeated, and proclaimed, in manner as aforesaid, the people of those Plantation States may be misinformed and in error, as well concerning the amount of duties paid by others (the people of these United States) in other States of this Union, as concerning the amount of such duties paid by themselves on foreign merchandise imported into these States, and the payment thereof on their great staples, cotton, rice, and tobacco, when exported to foreign countries; and concerning the disposition of public money, made as aforesaid alleged, in bounties or public works by Congress; and being so misinformed and in error, are liable to be dissatisfied, disturbed, and agitated, and the prosperity of themselves and of the nation may be thereby interrupted; and, moreover, because it is now proposed to this House to depart in legislation from the great policy adopted by the Congress of the United States on the 4th of July, A. D. 1789, nor hereafter to lay duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, therein and no longer, by such duties, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, as that any effect of such regulations may either encourage or protect the same, or any other of the great sources of domestic production, whether the same be agricultural, mechanic, or manufacturing; but, from and after this time, to lay all duties on imports from foreign countries for the purpose of revenue only, as assessments of taxes on the people, and solely to satisfy the wants of Government, and therein to make such a "readjustment of the rates of impost as may distribute and equalise among all the people those burdens which may be found to fall unequally upon any of them," and because it is utterly impracticable to make such re-adjustment, and so to equalise duties on all imports among all, by any form of law, until Congress shall first know what quantities and kinds of foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, have been, and now are, by the course of trade, the habits, the usages, and the wants of the people in each State, imported and consumed in the same: therefore, for the purpose of acquiring the best information which may be had on all these great national questions, as well for the use of the members of this House, as for the satisfaction of their constituents, the people of these United States, and to the intent that all errors may be corrected in the premises, and the effects of all such errors avoided in all future legislation therein:

Resolved, That a committee of twenty-four members of this House, one from each State, be appointed by ballot, to examine into and report to this House concerning the following matters and things; and in the following manner, that is to say:

1. It shall be the duty of said committee to inquire into, and report to this House the amount of money paid by the people of each State to the United States, viz:

1st. On all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into said State from foreign countries.

2d. The amount so paid on all goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of such State, exported therefrom to foreign countries.

3d. On all tonnage of ships or vessels owned therein.

4th. The amount of hospital money paid by the seamen thereof into the marine hospital fund, and the number of seamen belonging to each State respectively.

5th. The amount of postage paid in each State.

6th. The amount paid as aforesaid in each State on spirits distilled therein.

7th. The amount received by the people of each State from the United States, for drawbacks, for debentures, for vessels employed in the fisheries, for bounties on manufactures, and of what kinds; the amount expended by the United States in each State on public works, and their several kinds; for transporting the mail, and for supporting the military establishment therein.

Tribunal for Claims.—Reduction of the Tariff.

[H. or R.]

II. Said committee shall inquire into and report the amount of goods, wares, and merchandise exported from each State:

1st. Of the growth, produce, and manufactures of foreign countries; and,

2d. Of each other State in this Union.

3d. The amount of duty payable thereon in each State, the number of people therein at each census, and the average amount payable by each person.

4th. And it shall further be the duty of said committee to inquire into and report the amount and value of production, so far as may be done in each State, of sugar, cotton, rice, tobacco, bread-stuffs, provisions, salt, distilled spirits, silk, wool, fish, oil, peltry, lumber, manufactures, of what and of each kind, with the market price of each.

5th. It shall also be the duty of said committee to inquire into and report the current price of products of like kind and quality as those last aforesaid, both in France and England, together with the cost and charges, and the amount of duties or bounties on exportation or importation thereof, either into or from those countries.

6th. And it is further resolved, That said committee have power to call on all accounting officers in the service of the United States for copies and abstracts of all such books and papers in their possession as may, in their opinion, aid them in such examination and report; to examine, under oath, all persons who may, for that purpose, appear before them, and to send interrogations to all such persons as may, in their opinion, give them information in the premises; which interrogations it shall be the duty of such persons to answer, in writing, according to the best of their knowledge and belief, and to make oath thereunto before some magistrate competent to administer the same.

7th. It shall be the duty of said committee, in their report, to state, in tabular form, all the particulars aforesaid: 1st. in relation to each State in this Union; 2d. to report, in like form, first, the whole amount of all those States which allege that the people thereof are required by law to pay, and have paid, more than their ratable portion of the public revenue, to wit, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia; and, 2d, to state the whole amount of those particulars in respect to all the other States; and to make these statements in such form, with such distinctness and accuracy of arrangement of the facts, found by their inquiries as aforesaid, and not otherwise, as that all who desire it may see and read the truth, whereby the allegations aforesaid may be refuted or confirmed, and this House be aided by a competent knowledge of the facts necessary to be known in all the future action thereof concerning the laws of these United States, regulating the commerce, the revenue, and the taxes of the American people.

On motion of Mr. B., the preamble and resolution were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WILDE asked of the Chair whether it would be in order to exclude from the motion to print the preamble of the resolutions?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

TRIBUNAL FOR CLAIMS:

Mr. HOGAN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report on the expediency of establishing a judicial tribunal, which shall take cognizance of all claims and demands of individuals on the Government of the United States, and decide on the validity thereof, in accordance with the principles of equity and law, and establish rules of evidence.

Mr. H. accompanied his motion by some remarks on the great number of private bills on the calendar of the House; the consumption of time annually occasioned by discussing them, and the small degree of attention usually bestowed by a vast majority of the House on their discussion. He stated, as his opinion, that private individual claims for more than a million of dollars, might be substantiated against the United States, were it allowable to sue the national sovereign; but, since this could not be allowed, they must be settled by Congress, and the expense of so doing would not amount to less than three millions of dollars. The resolution was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, the intervening orders were postponed, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WARREN in the Chair, and, by a vote of 94 to 78, took up the bill "to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports." The following is the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the third day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, in place of the duties heretofore laid by law, the several duties hereinafter mentioned, for, during, and until the several respective periods hereinafter specified, that is to say:

First. On wool, manufactured, the value whereof at the place of exportation, shall exceed eight cents the pound, and on woollen and worsted twist and yarn, a duty at and after the rate of thirty-five dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-four, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of twenty-five dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-five, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of fifteen dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

All wool unmanufactured, the value whereof at the place of exportation, shall not exceed eight cents the pound, shall be free of duty from and after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-three: Provided, that wool imported on the skin shall be estimated as to weight and value as other wool: and, provided, further, that wool mixed with dirt or other material, and they reduced in value to eight cents the pound or under, shall be appraised at such price as, in the opinion of the appraisers, it would have cost had it not been so mixed, and a duty thereon shall be charged in conformity with such appraisement.

Second. On all milled and fulled cloths, known by the name of plains, kerseys, or Kendall cottons, of which wool shall be the only material, the value whereof at the place of exportation, shall not exceed thirty-five cents the square yard; and on all blankets, the value whereof at the place of exportation, shall not exceed seventy-five cents each, a duty at and after the rate of five dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

On worsted stuff goods, shawls, bombazines, poplins, tabinets, and all other manufactures of silk and worsted, a duty at and after the rate of ten dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

On coach lace, a duty at and after the rate of twenty-five dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Third. On blankets, other than those hereinbefore specified, a duty at and after the rate of twenty-five dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of fifteen dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Fourth. On carpets, carpetings, flannels, stockings, baizes, cloths, kerseymeres, merino shawls, and all other woollen manufactures, or of which wool is a component part, except as herein otherwise provided, and on ready-made clothing, a duty at and after the rate of forty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of thirty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-five, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of twenty dollars for every hundred dollars value.

Fifth. On woollen and worsted hosiery, mits, gloves, stockinets, and on worsted bindings, a duty at and after the rate of twenty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of ten dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Sixth. On all manufactures of cotton, costing not more than twenty-five cents the square yard at the place of exportation, a duty at and after the rate of thirty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of twenty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

On all other manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton and silk, not herein otherwise specified, a duty at and after the rate of twenty-five dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of twenty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

On nankeens imported direct from China, a duty at and after the rate of fifteen dollars on every hundred dollars thereof.

On cotton hosiery, mats, gloves, and stockinets, and on cotton twist, yarn, and thread, a duty at and after the rate of twenty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of ten dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Seventh. On iron bars or bolts, not manufactured in whole or in part by rolling, a duty at and after the rate of eighteen dollars the ton, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of fifteen dollars the ton.

On bar and bolt iron, made wholly or in part by rolling, a duty at and after the rate of thirty dollars the ton, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty of twenty-four dollars the ton: Provided, that all iron in slabs, blooms, or other forms less finished than iron in bars or bolts, and more advanced than pig iron, except castings, shall be rated as iron in bars and bolts, and pay duty accordingly. All scrap and old iron shall pay a duty of twelve dollars and fifty cents the ton. Nothing shall be deemed old iron that has not been in actual use, and fit only to be unmanufactured; and all pieces of iron, except old, of more than six inches in length, or of sufficient length to be made into spikes and bolts, shall be rated as bar, bolt, rod, or hoop iron, as the case may be, and pay duty accordingly; all manufactures of iron partly finished, shall pay the same rates of duty as if entirely finished; all vessels of cast-iron, and all castings of iron, with handles, rings, hoops, or other addition of wrought iron, shall pay the same rates of duty as if made entirely of cast-iron.

Eighth. On iron in pigs, a duty at and after the rate of fifty cents per every hundred and twelve pounds weight, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of forty cents for every hundred and twelve pounds weight; on cast-iron vessels, and all other castings of iron, a duty at and after the rate of one cent. the pound.

Ninth. On steel, a duty at and after the rate of one dollar and fifty cents for every hundred and twelve pounds weight, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty of one dollar for every hundred and twelve pounds weight.

Tenth. On manufactures of iron and of steel, not herein enumerated, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, the several rates of duty provided by existing laws, until the 2d day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter the lowest rate of duty which would have been payable on the same, either under the act of the 27th of April, 1816, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage;" or by virtue of the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and annul the several acts imposing duties on imports."

Eleventh. On hemp, a duty at and after the rate of thirty-five dollars the ton, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of thirty dollars the ton.

Twelfth. On cordage tarred, a duty at and after the rate of four cents the pound, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of two cents the pound.

On cordage untarred, and on yarn, twine, and pack-thread, a duty at and after the rate of five cents the pound, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of three cents the pound.

Thirteenth. On cotton bagging, a duty at and after the rate of fifteen dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Fourteenth. On all manufactures of hemp or of flax, not herein enumerated, a duty at and after the rate of fifteen dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Fifteenth. On spirits from grain, a duty at and after the following rates, to wit: on first proof, a duty of twenty cents per gallon; of second proof, of twenty three cents the gallon; of third proof, of twenty-six cents the gallon; of fourth proof, of thirty cents the gallon; of fifth proof, of thirty four cents the gallon; and over fifth proof, of forty cents the gallon. On spirits from all other materials than grain, a duty at and after the following rates, to wit: of first and second proof, of eighteen cents the gallon; of third proof, of twenty-one cents the gallon; of fourth proof, of twenty-six cents the gallon; of fifth proof, of thirty cents the gallon; and over fifth proof, of thirty-six cents the gallon.

Sixteenth. On salt, a duty at and after the rate of eight cents the bushel, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of five cents the bushel.

Seventeenth. On olive oil in casks, a duty at and after the rate of fifteen cents the gallon, until the second day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of ten cents the gallon.

Eighteenth. On brown sugar, and on syrup of sugar cane in casks, a duty at and after the rate of two and a half cents the pound, until the 2d day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of two cents the pound. On white clayed-sugar, a duty at and after the rate of three cents the pound, until the 2d day of March, 1834, inclusive; and thereafter a duty at and after the rate of two and a half cents the pound. On sugar-candy, and other refined sugar, a duty at and after the rate of ten cents the pound.

Nineteenth. On molasses, a duty at and after the rate of four cents the gallon.

Twentieth. On coffee, a duty at and after the rate of one cent the pound.

Twenty-first. On teas, from and after the 3d day of March, 1834, a duty at and after the rates following, to wit: on imperial, gunpowder, and gama, hyson, and young hyson, ten cents the pound. On hyson skin and other green, souchong and other black, except bohea, six cents the pound, and on bohea three cents the pound.

Twenty-second. On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, a duty at and after the rate of twenty dollars for every hundred dollars value thereof; and on all other manufactures of silk, or of which silk is a component part, a duty at and after the rate of twelve dollars and fifty cents for every hundred dollars value thereof.

Twenty-third. On all printed books, in other languages than Latin, Greek, or English, whether bound, or unbound, if printed less than thirty years before the time of their importation, a duty at and after the rate of four cents the volume.

On all printed books in Latin and Greek, if printed less than thirty years before the time of their importation, a duty at and after the rate of twelve and a half cents the pound weight, when bound; and when unbound, a duty at and after the rate of ten cents the pound weight.

On all other printed books, printed less than thirty years before the date of their importation, when bound, a duty at and after the rate of twenty-five cents the pound weight; and when unbound, a duty at and after the rate of twenty cents the pound weight.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the several articles made free of duty by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, the following articles shall be admitted free of duty from and after the 3d of March, 1833; that is to say, cotton, wool, indigo, and printed books, in whatever language, printed thirty years before the date of their importation.

Twenty-fourth. On all articles, not herein enumerated, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, the lowest rate of duty, calculated upon the value of the article, which would have been payable on the same, either under the act of the 27th of April, 1816, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," or by virtue of the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports." Such rate of duty being calculated upon the value of the article at the place whence imported, estimated according to the provisions of this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the fifth section of the act of the 14th of July, 1832, entitled "An act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," as repeals the existing laws, requiring teas, when imported in vessels of the United States from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, to be weighed, marked, and certified, be, and the same is hereby repealed. And the residue of the said section, and the whole of the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth sections of the said act of the 14th of July, 1832, be, and the same are, discontinued, in the same manner as if they had been inserted in, and re-enacted by this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several laws heretofore existing, shall extend to, and be in force for the collection and remission of all duties imposed by this act, and for the prosecution and punishment of all officers, the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission, of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and for the allowance of all drawbacks heretofore and hereby authorized, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, prohibition, offence, fine, penalty, forfeiture, allowance, drawback, provision, clause, matter, and thing, power, duty, and authority, in the several heretofore existing laws contained, had been inserted in, re-enacted, and made applicable to this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the provisions hereof, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed: Provided always, That all laws heretofore existing, shall, nevertheless, continue in full force, so far forth only as the same may be necessary for the prosecution and punishment of all offences which have been or shall be committed contrary thereto, and for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which have been or shall be incurred under the operation thereof, and for the allowance of all drawbacks authorized, accruing, or hereafter to accrue under, or by virtue of the said laws, or any of them, in as full and ample a manner as if the same were not hereby repealed.

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCE, the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VERPLANCE said that he rose to invite the attention of the committee to the examination of the details of the bill now before them, and for that purpose only. It was true, that this was a bill which might serve as an occasion for expatiating upon topics that always awakened much interest. The great question of constitutional right might be argued. The question of the incidence or bearing of taxation, together with other not less important theories of political economy, might be now discussed. But, for myself, I feel that after the years during which Congress, and public men elsewhere, as well as the press, have discussed these points, and especially after the ample discussion which has taken place during the present Congress, it would be presumption for me to think that I could now contribute any new general views that would enlighten the House or the nation. In making these remarks, I speak not only my own unfeigned opinion, but, as I am fully authorized, that of those of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means, who have joined with me in reporting this bill.

As members of this House, we have some of us, on this floor, and all of us in some way or other, made known our views to our constituents. The people have the whole of the general argument before them. It is now to a more practical and urgent duty that I would invite the attention of this body. It is one growing out of the financial state of our Government, and its legislation.

The last war left the nation laboring under a weight of public debt. The payment of that war debt was one of the great objects of the arrangement of our revenue system at the peace, and it was never lost sight of in any subsequent arrangement of our tariff system. Since 1815 we have annually derived a revenue from several sources, but by far the largest part from duties on imports, of sometimes twenty, sometimes twenty-five, and recently thirty two, and thirty-three millions of dollars a year.

Of this sum 10,000,000 dollars a ways, but, of late, a much larger proportion, has been devoted to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. At last that debt has been extinguished. The manner in which those burdens were distributed under former laws, have been, heretofore, a subject of complaint and remonstrance. I do not propose to inquire into the wisdom or justice of those laws. The debt has been extinguished by them; let us be grateful for the past. We are now to enter upon another, an honorable and gratifying duty, the reduction of the taxes of the people—the alleviation of the public burdens.

Here Mr. V. gave a brief view of the financial history of our Government since the peace of 1815, in which he stated that, during the last six years, an annual average income of 27,000,000 of dollars had been received; the far greater part from the customs. That this sum had been appropriated, the one-half towards the necessary expenses of the Government, and the other half in the payment of the public debt. In reviewing the regular calls upon the treasury, during the last seven years, for the civil, naval, and military departments of the Government, including all ordinary contingencies, about

Reduction of the Tariff.

13,000,000 of dollars a year had been expended. This amount of 13,000,000 of dollars would seem, even now, sufficient to cover the standing necessary expenses of Government. A long delayed debt of public justice, for he would not call it bounty, to the soldiers of the revolution, had added for the present, since it could be but for a few years only, an additional annual million. Fourteen millions of dollars then covered the necessary expenditures of our Government. But, however rigid and economical we ought to be in actual expenditures, in providing the sources of the revenue, which might be called upon for unforeseen contingencies, it was wise to arrange it on a liberal scale. This would be done by allowing an additional million, which would cover, not only extra expenses in time of peace, but meet those of Indian warfare, if such should arise, as well as those of increased naval expenditure, from temporary collisions with foreign powers, short of permanent warfare. We are not, therefore, justifiable, in raising more than 15,000,000 dollars as a permanent revenue. In other words, at least 13,000,000 dollars of the revenue that would have been collected under the tariff system of 1828, may now be dispensed with; and, in years of great importation, a much larger sum. The act of last summer removed a large portion of this excess; yet taking the importation of the last year, as a standard, the revenues derived from that source, if calculated according to the act of 1832, would produce 19,500,000, and with the other sources of revenue, an income of 22,000,000 dollars. This is, at least, seven millions above the wants of the treasury.

It was this excess of public burdens which the Committee of Ways and Means have felt it to be their duty now to call upon Congress to reduce. The task of regulating the rate and manner of that reduction was neither easy nor enviable. We all must know that large sections of the country throughout, as well as various classes of the community in every section of the country, have complained, or remonstrated against the unequal operation of the public burdens. It is certain, too, that, under any plan of finance whatsoever, of long duration, various interests must grow up, which cannot but be subject to great injury, from a change even for a better, and less onerous system.

The committee have felt all these difficulties. They have approached the subject, not with rashness or presumption, but with humility. They have endeavored to profit by the lights of long experience, and of former legislation. Whatever may be the defects of their bill, they confidently claim for themselves the merit of honest and sincere intention. They trust that no local or personal interests, and certainly no views or feelings of party politics, have been suffered to influence them. They have desired and endeavored to conduct the deliberations of their committee-room in the spirit of justice, conciliation, and of peace; and it is in this spirit that they now invite this body to the examination of the bill before them.

Mr. V. having concluded—

Mr. HUNTINGTON observed that it seemed to be settled that the House was now to enter on the tariff bill; but as many gentlemen had not expected that the discussion would have been pressed before Monday next, and consequently had not examined the bill as reported, with as much minuteness as they otherwise should have done, he moved that the committee now rise.

The motion prevailed: Ayes 90; and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 9.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

The House having again gone into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports:

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Connecticut, who had yesterday moved for the rising of the committee, rose and said that he would take the present opportunity to express to the committee the gratitude he felt for their kindness in having, on his motion, risen when this subject was under consideration yesterday, and, as the most suitable return, he should endeavor to condense, as far as was in his power, the remarks he had to make on the general principles of the bill before them. He had neither the disposition, nor, at this time, the physical strength to examine it in all its details. Nor did he think, indeed, that after the repeated discussions which the tariff had undergone in that hall, as well in respect to the constitutionality as the expediency of that system of policy which it was the object of this bill to annihilate, that the subject was one on which it would be useful to consume much of the time of the committee. He should content himself with presenting some general views, in doing which he should endeavor to be as concise as the importance of the subject would admit.

That the bill now under consideration was one of great interest to no inconsiderable portion of the community, and was intimately connected with the vital interests of the country at large, was not, he believed, denied by any one. When he left the State of his nativity to resume the discharge of his duties here, he had left his constituents engaged in preparing to meet the exigencies of the tariff bill of the last session, and so to arrange their business that it might not be utterly destroyed by the operation of that bill. He had left them pursuing their respective occupations of honest and meritorious industry, without the slightest intimation from any quarter that, at the short session of Congress, (and especially after the full and mature deliberation upon which, at the last session, a bill had been passed materially changing the previous rates of duty,) and, within one month after the opening of that short session, a new bill would be reported, so essentially altering the provisions of that which had just passed, and which had not yet gone into operation. Yet it had not only been reported, but was already pressed upon the House with an urgency wholly unprecedented.

Should the bill pass, he should have to return to those whom he represented, and tell them that they must now accommodate themselves, not to a bill that would admit of their struggling, though with difficulty, to preserve the establishments of their industry, but to a bill, by which the arm of that industry must be utterly paralysed; that they must pursue, if they could, indeed, find them, new objects and new employments; that the value of their labor was to be reduced to a trifle; and that so long as the bill continued in force, they must make up their minds to become hewers of wood, and drawers of water to foreigners who had no interest in our Government. Viewing this bill as wholly subversive of the interests, both of his own constituents and of the country at large, he should be faithless to his trust, and recreant to his duty, did he not, as far as he could, repay the generous confidence of those who sent him here, by endeavoring to arrest its progress. He hoped to treat those who differed from him in their views of the proposed measure, (for whom he cherished no feelings but those of regard and kindness,) with the respect due to them as men, and as members of this House, but with that freedom which became one who deeply felt the importance of upholding the interests which it was now proposed to sacrifice.

He was by no means unmindful of the embarrassments under which he presented himself before the committee, of the difficulties intrinsic to the subject, and extrinsic too, and which would demand from him a passing notice. He did not shut his eyes to the fact that the Chief Magistrate of the Union, in his message to Congress at the opening of the present session, had told them that "the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war." That "there must be a proper adaptation of the revenue to the expenditure; and the expenditure be limited to what, by an economical administration, shall be consistent with the simplicity of the Government, and necessary to an efficient public service."

Reduction of the Tariff.

Mr. H. said he was not unmindful of the value, the weight, the importance, and, he would add, the effect of executive recommendations. These same principles had also received the sanction of the gentleman who presided over the Treasury Department—an officer who was supposed to know best the operation of the existing system, as well as of the adoption of a new one. Mr. H. was not unmindful of the effect of his recommendation. He had read, also, the report of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in which it was stated, as reasons, why the legislation of Congress ought to be directed, at this session, to a modification of the tariff; that the period had arrived when the public debt was substantially extinguished; that a new term of Presidential service was about to commence; and that these considerations marked this as a fit season for permanent fiscal regulations. That report declared that the object of this bill was to relieve the people from unnecessary taxation, and to remove from them a needless burden; which, while it was injurious in its effects, enriched the treasury, only to divide and distract our public councils, in relation to its expenditure. Nor could he shut his eyes to another fact to which the honorable member from New York [Mr. VERPLANCK] had, in faint terms, alluded; and to which he should take the liberty to allude. He was not unaware that there were certain portions of our country in which a protecting tariff was considered unconstitutional, inexpedient, and oppressive; and, more than this, that one of the States of this Union had plainly told the country that the existing law should not be executed within her limits, and that, if an attempt should be made to enforce it, the result should be, her secession from the Union. No, he was not unaware of all these considerations; he had examined them attentively; but they formed only one side of the picture. There was another side to which he would direct the attention of the committee. When he looked around upon the condition of this country, and beheld it possessing an elevated character, abundant wealth, and overflowing prosperity; and when he read in the Executive message that this was a subject of heartfelt thanksgiving to the Great Author of all blessings—and remembered, at the same time, that all this unparalleled natural happiness had grown up under the very system which it was the object of this bill to destroy—he looked to the same enlightened patriotism which had reared up this system, and appealed to it for its preservation; nor would it, he was confident, be invoked in vain. Those who represented the interests thus protected, would be sustained by their constituents in their efforts for its continuance. Thus, while there were embarrassments of no ordinary character to be encountered in meeting this subject, some of which presented themselves whenever the tariff was proposed to be changed, there were circumstances which still induced the hope, that the industry of our citizens would be saved from destruction, and our country rendered independent of foreign Governments, for its support and sustenance not only, but for its prosperity and its wealth.

The honorable member from New York, who introduced the bill, made a few general remarks, combined the principles which formed the basis of the bill, without going into any minuteness of detail, or entering on the general question of the policy of the protective system. It was Mr. H.'s purpose also to confine himself to remarks of a general character. In his passing remarks, the honorable member had paid one compliment to the system, and one only—"it had paid the national debt." And, while he held in his hand a bill to consign that very system which had done this, to the tomb of the Capulets, he had, in anticipation, written upon its monument this simple inscription: "gratitude for the past." Mr. H. thanked him for that. But there was another hand which would write upon the different side of the same monument another inscription: "Plighted national faith violated"—"Death by parricide."

A few general principles would embrace the whole subject, and he should endeavor to compress his remarks within them.

The Committee of Ways and Means had presented this bill, as containing provisions to insure the revenue from the customs, which, with that from other sources, would be sufficient for the wants of an economical, but efficient Government. The principle which formed the basis of the bill was that the Government would require but fifteen millions of dollars for its annual expenditure, of which twelve millions and a half were to be raised from the customs, and two millions and a half from the public lands. It had been stated by the committee, in their report, that they considered it their duty to present to the House a bill which should be gradual in its operation on the existing establishments of the country. In this respect the committee had expressed the same sentiments which were contained in the Executive message, and in the report from the Treasury Department. The report uses the following language: "It has been the wish of the committee to guard against a sudden fluctuation of the price of goods, whether in the hands of the merchant, the retailer, or the manufacturer. With this view, they have made the reduction upon the more important protected articles, gradual and progressive."

The President, in alluding to the subject, says: "If, upon the investigation it shall be found, as it is believed it will be, that the legislative protection granted to any particular interest, is greater than is indispensably requisite," (for the objects previously specified,) "I recommend that it be gradually diminished, and that, as far as may be consistent with these objects, the whole scheme of duties be reduced to the revenue standard, as soon as a just regard to the faith of the Government, and to the preservation of the large capital invested in establishments of domestic industry, will permit." "Large interests have grown up, under the implied pledge of our national legislation, which it would seem a violation of public faith suddenly to abandon." The Secretary of the Treasury, in recommending a reduction of the revenue, says: "The necessity of adopting the proposed changes to the safety of existing establishments, raised up under the auspices of past legislation, and deeply involving the interests of large portions of the Union, is not less imperative in the further changes which may be deemed expedient."

Such had been the sentiments always avowed by those who believed that the protective system ought to be abandoned. But how does the bill correspond with these opinions and views thus expressed? Was that a gradual reduction of the protected duties, which annihilated the whole in two years? Was this the "gradual diminution" of which the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had spoken? Did the Committee of Ways and Means really suppose that within two years the industry of this country could adapt itself to the provisions of such a bill as that now reported? Did not every man, at all conversant with the practical operation of the existing system, know that to call this a gradual reduction, was a perversion of the terms?

Was two years a period in which the industry of the country could change its entire direction, and resort to new channels? or in which the people could resort to new and untried employments for their livelihood? No, for almost all beneficial purposes connected with the protection of interests, which had grown up under the faith of the legislation of Congress, a delay of two years would be no better than the immediate operation of the bill on the whole amount of duties proposed to be reduced, sweeping them away at a blow. He would tell the committee all the good that such a delay would occasion: it allowed those who had on hand extensive stocks time to put that stock into a manufactured form for sale. But as to those who were the real working men of the country, the bill operated to throw them completely out of employment, without time to prepare themselves for such a radical change. He repeated the position (and he did so with all respect for the committee who had introduced the bill) that, to profess the principle of gradual reduction, and, at the same time to cut down the whole protective system within two years, was nothing but mockery. Such a bill was substantially no better than an instantaneous abolition of the whole amount of protective duties; and this was one feature of the bill which rendered it so peculiarly obnoxious to those whose interests he more immediately represented on that floor.

But, whether gradual in its operation or not, whether immediate or more remote, whether carrying out the recommendations of those opposed to the whole system or not, it was reported as a bill calculated to bring down the revenue of the country so as "to meet the exigencies of an economical but efficient administration."

The general views Mr. H. entertained of the provisions of the bill might be comprised in the answers to these general inquiries.

Will this bill reduce the revenue?

If it will, is it expedient to do so?

If it be expedient, is this the best mode of doing it?

And, if so, is the present the proper time to do it?

To each of these inquiries he should devote some attention.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in estimating the effect of the bill upon the revenue, had taken as the basis of his calculations, the actual imports of the year 1831; and he supposes that the amount of goods imported during that year, will not exceed the average of future years under the operation of a tariff such as that proposed by this bill. On this hypothesis he had concluded that the effect of the bill would be to reduce the revenue six millions of dollars, thereby leaving the actual amount, from the customs and other sources, at fifteen millions. If the Committee of Ways and Means possessed the foresight to discover with certainty what would be the practical effect of such a bill upon the revenue, they possessed more sagacity by far than he did, or, as he believed, than any other person. The country had, as yet, had but a very partial experience of the effect of reduction of duties upon the revenue. But such experience as had been attained, taught the House this lesson, that the first effect would be, to ruin the revenue by the influx of foreign goods. This increase would, in the natural course of things, continue until the pauperism of the country was such, that its citizens could no longer, for want of means, purchase the fabrics imported; and then the revenue would be so much diminished, that a resort must be had either to a renewal of the system now proposed to be abandoned, or to some other measures, in order to replenish an exhausted treasury.

The bill passed at the last session was, as yet, an untried experiment; the signature of the Speaker of this House was, as yet, hardly dry to a bill, the professed object of which was to reduce the revenue. Different opinions existed as to its probable effects; many believed it would greatly increase the revenue—it was to be tried as an experiment. But now, while that law remained on the statute book as yet inoperative, it was proposed to substitute a bill, the effect of which on the revenue would be vastly greater. Mr. H. would not say that that effect would certainly be to increase the revenue; nor could say that with perfect confidence: but he thought it would be well for the House at least to wait and see what the effect would be of the bill already passed. There was one fact which they might look at, by way of illustration: Congress had, therefore, reduced the duties upon molasses, coffee, and salt. No other articles could possibly have been selected so proper for a favorable experiment in the reduction of the revenue as these. The experience of the country had, to be sure, been, as yet, but short; but what had the result already been? If gentlemen would look at the tables furnished by the treasury, they would find that in 1830, when the duty on molasses was principally collected on that article at ten cents per gallon, though on a part it was collected on a duty of five cents, the amount imported was little more than 9,800,000 gallons; yet in 1831, when the duty was five cents, the importation had risen to upwards of 15,400,000 gallons, being an excess in this single article of molasses, of more than 5,000,000 of gallons. If the committee would look to the same tables, they would find a great increase in the importation of coffee. In 1830 the duty on this article was, for the most part, five cents per pound, and the quantity imported was little more than 38,000,000 of pounds. But in 1831, when the duty was principally two cents a pound, the quantity imported had risen to 79,000,000, being a difference of more than 40,000,000 of pounds. He would ask the committee whether there were not circumstances which would lead to the conclusion, that the bill before them would, for a time, increase rather than reduce the revenue? What would be the effect of a reduction of the duties on those who supplied the market from abroad? Would they not pour their goods into this market? Would not that be the natural, the certain effect, in relation to the surplus stocks held by European manufacturers? Would there be no motive operating upon those who were at all times desirous of breaking down the manufacturing establishments of this country to flood our markets expressly with that view? And if the policy of the present bill should be adopted, could it fail of being perceived, that it would be used as a means, by foreigners, to hasten, if possible, the period of the destruction of our own manufactures? Mr. H. said he had been informed by a very intelligent American who had recently returned from Europe, that it was perfectly well understood that arrangements were making throughout the manufacturing districts of England, to export to this country vast quantities of their manufactured goods, to avail themselves of the benefits of the bill of last year. What will they not do should the present bill pass? He would ask the committee to look back for a few years, for it was well, very well, occasionally to do so, and learn lessons from experience. What had been our imports in 1815? They had risen to more than one hundred and thirty millions of dollars; although our exports during that year amounted to a little more than fifty millions. In 1816 the receipts from the customs had been about sixty-two millions; and how long did this state of things continue? Just long enough so to impoverish the country as to reduce the revenue from the customs to fourteen millions in 1820 and 1821. Just long enough to bring down the rates of exchange to about 101, and to sink greatly in value lands and the products of agricultural labor. There were gentlemen present who well remembered those periods of our history, and who, he hoped, would take warning from the lessons which were then taught us. He would not undertake to say how long our foreign importations would be increased, should the present bill pass. But he would say this, that the increase would probably continue until the time should arrive when the resources of the people would be cut off, their establishments broken down, and they rendered unable to purchase longer from the workshops of Europe; when the revenue would be so much reduced that Congress would have to cast about for the means to replenish their empty treasury, to meet demands upon it which were honorably and justly due. But Mr. H. said he would now pass from this topic, submitting to the committee this question—whether, from the experience of the past and the probabilities of the future, it were wise to adopt a bill purposely framed, by a reduction of duties, to reduce the revenue, when there were so many reasons to believe that the revenue, for a time, will be increased, until eventually it will be greatly reduced by reason of the poverty of the people, depriving them of the power any longer to purchase? And in connexion with this part of the subject, he would remind the committee that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had told the House that the system proposed by this bill was intended to be a permanent system; that it was brought forward now, that all engaged in commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural enterprises, affected by a change of duties, might know what was the policy and intention of the Government, in relation to their interests, and by which they might regulate their operations in future. But suppose the bill should actually result in an increase of the revenue. Were they then to be told that the rates of duty must be brought down still lower? Must we tell our constituents that the majority who passed this bill (if, indeed, it should pass) thought it would reduce the revenue, but if it should not, the duties on protected articles must be still farther reduced; and they must prepare for yet another change in the financial system of the country, predicated on such a reduction?

Mr. H. averred that he would never tell his constituents any such thing by his votes in that House; and he hoped it would not be necessary so to speak to them in consequence of the passage of this bill by the votes of others. If, however, it should be admitted that the professed object of the bill would be answered, and that the revenue would be reduced six millions of dollars, the next question which presented itself, and which required an answer was, whether it was expedient, at this time, by destroying the protection afforded to the labor and industry of our citizens, to reduce the revenue to the amount of twelve and a half millions from the customs?

Mr. H. granted that this question of expediency must depend on what ought to be considered the proper expenditures of the Government. The Committee of Ways and Means supposed that these expenditures should not exceed fifteen millions of dollars; and this amount they proposed to raise, by drawing twelve and a half millions from the customs, and two and a half millions from the public lands; and the bill was predicated on the supposition that two and a half millions were to be derived from the public lands as a permanent source of revenue. Now, Mr. H. put it to every Representative of the people in that House to say whether he believed that the public domain could continue to be a source of revenue for many years? Were not the signs of the times such as plainly to warn every man that no safe calculation could be formed on such a result? It was perfectly well known that, in some quarters of the Union, the public lands were considered as the rightful property of the States within which they were situate; and, in the same section of the country, if this opinion did not prevail, it was still supposed that the price of them ought to be greatly reduced. But more than this: the Chief Magistrate had told the nation that, it seemed to him to be our true policy that those lands should cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and be sold to settlers at a price barely sufficient to reimburse to the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts; and that, in convenient time, the right of soil, and the future disposition of it, be surrendered to the States respectively in which it lies. And Mr. H. was not unmindful of the influence of Executive opinions. It was also to be remembered that, as probably a great majority of the people of the country considered the public domain to be the property of all the States, they might deem it proper to make an equitable apportionment of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, instead of having them paid into the treasury. In whatever aspect the subject was viewed, no one could be so blind as not to see that a permanent system of revenue, based upon the public lands, must prove in practice entirely fallacious.

If, then, they should strike off these two and a half millions proposed to be derived from the public lands, the amount of duties from the customs must be proportionably increased. The committee had also estimated but $1,600,000 to meet the demands arising out of the act of the last session extending the system of revolutionary pensions. Mr. H. submitted that this estimate was much below the amount which would be required for this purpose. Let gentlemen go to the pension bureau, and there inquire into the number of applications which had already been presented for the benefits of the law of the last session, and they would find how high the numbers were rising. He did not say, far be it from him ever to say, that the provisions of that law were extravagant, or in any wise censurable. He supported and voted for that law with the highest satisfaction. He cared not how much it might cost the country to do what the gentleman from New York had, with great truth, denominated an act of justice to our revolutionary officers and soldiers. He spoke of the subject only in reference to its bearing upon the bill now under consideration.

The Committee of Ways and Means had not told the House what items of expenditure would be necessary to constitute an economical, yet efficient administration of the Government. The administration was to be economical, but it was also to be "efficient." The term efficient was one liable to much latitude of construction, and would admit of very different interpretations. Was it to be understood that we were to have no internal improvements of a national character provided for, or were we only to make provision for completing such works as were already begun? Was this the meaning affixed by the committee to the phrase "an efficient administration?" Was the Government to complete works, already in progress, and was it then to stop, and make no further appropriations for new surveys or new works?

Had the committee considered the amount of what might be denominated floating claims against the Government which would have eventually, probably very soon, to be met and satisfied? It was known to all who heard him, that several of the States had large claims against the General Government for militia services during the last war, the principle of which was acknowledged to be just, and which had been sanctioned by the legislation of Congress; but the exact amount of which had not been liquidated. Among these, had not the State from which the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means himself came, a very large claim for interest on moneys advanced for the service of the Union? Massachusetts had presented claims, of which she had yet received but a part only, and not yet a dollar of interest. Connecticut had a similar claim; yet the committee had allowed but one million of dollars for contingencies. Was this committee prepared to adopt a bill like that before them, with such an amount of floating debt against the treasury? But he would go further: Did the bill contain any provision for the extinction of the Indian title to the immense tracts of land still held by them? These titles were to be extinguished at the expense of the General Government; and the policy adopted by the country was to extinguish them as soon as it could be done in a peaceable manner. The Government stood bound to one of the States to do this as soon as it should be in its power. He asked whether the committee, which reported the bill, had taken this into consideration? Suppose we should have another Indian war, was any provision made for such an event? That just brought to a close had cost the country probably a million and a half of dollars; and was it probable we should be exempt from other similar expenses? Did the bill provide for such contingencies? Did it not proceed on the supposition that twelve and a half millions were to be drawn from the customs and two and a half from the public lands: allowing one million for pensions and another million to cover all contingencies?

Reduction of the Tariff.

It was his own conviction that, should the bill pass, the country would, at a period not very remote, and when it had been impoverished by importations of foreign goods, want money, and would have to raise it by some other means than those provided by this bill. In fact, the Committee of Ways and Means themselves, after resolving on what they called a gradual reduction of the duties, found there would be a deficit, and, to supply the deficiency, had put a duty on coffee, and tea, and silk. For what purpose? To reduce the revenue? No, to increase it, rather; having, by other provisions, reduced it to a point below the wants of the Government. The imposition of this tax would, indeed, continue in office the weighers and others attached to the custom-house; but would it satisfy the people? Would they consent to have the means of their support cut off, the price of their labor reduced, their industry paralyzed, and yet be taxed, by an impost on what might be denominated the comforts, if not the necessities of life?

Mr. H. said he had submitted these views with a desire to draw the attention of the committee to the importance (when forming a permanent system of revenue) of ascertaining, with reasonable certainty, whether the money it was proposed to raise by this bill would be adequate to the ordinary expenses of the Government, and sufficient to meet the contingencies which might arise, and he had, therefore referred them to expenses which were not only probable, but some of which would certainly accrue, and must be paid; and, if paid, would require different financial provisions from those proposed by this bill.

But, admitting that, in all his previous suggestions he had labored under a mistake; that the bill would operate to reduce the revenue as was contemplated, and that it was desirable that it should be so reduced; (and he took it for granted that no member of that House was desirous of retaining an excess of revenue in the treasury beyond the exigencies of an efficient Government; he was very sure he had himself no such wish; then the next inquiry would be, is this the proper mode of effecting the reduction contemplated? If the time had arrived when the national debt being paid, a reduction of the revenue was to follow, was it expedient to make the reduction on the principles contained in that bill? Or, would it be preferable to effect the same object in a mode that might preserve from destruction the industry of the country? The professed object of the bill was to reduce the protection now extended to manufactures, agriculture, and the mechanic arts; but the practical effect of the bill would be to annihilate them.

Whether the protective system was or was not constitutional, was a question on which he should not now enter. Whoever had read that masterly exposition of the constitutionality of a protective tariff, which had proceeded from one of the most illustrious sons Virginia had ever raised, could be in no want of arguments on that subject. And who ever had read another document, which bore the signature of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANPLANK,] (and who had not read it?) required no further argument to convince him of the same truth. Of the constitutionality of the system, therefore, (of which Mr. H. entertained no doubt,) he should say nothing. The immediate question was, whether it was expedient to destroy it? And this was the great, the important question.

In answer to this inquiry, he should only turn the attention of the committee to the effects of the present bill. Waiving all disquisitions on constitutional law, and all speculations on political economy, two subjects which had grown somewhat threadbare in that hall, he would direct the thoughts of gentlemen to the consequences which must follow should this bill become a law; and would then ask if this could be denominated a proper and expedient act of legislation?

Mr. H. said he was not sure whether any single branch of domestic industry throughout the country, at least in the Northern and Middle States, could sustain such a blow, unless, indeed, it might be that of iron, and even with respect to that, it might be considered very doubtful. Every other description of industry (he left the subject of iron to his friends from Pennsylvania) must be, if not utterly and at once prostrated by the bill, at least most materially injured.

He would not permit himself to dwell upon the scenes which such a measure could not fail to produce in a large portion of the Union. He would, however, ask gentlemen to reflect upon the condition of those who had, under the faith of the laws of Congress, vested their entire capital in extensive manufacturing establishments. If one of this description was now much in debt, the result to him must be bankruptcy; if he was out of debt, the effect would be the sacrifice of his establishment, or a great reduction in their value. But he would ask what would be the result of such a bill to the man who held the plough, to the mechanic who depended on his workshop for his daily bread? What on the family which was now able, by its industry, to sustain itself in competency and credit? What upon the great agricultural interest of the country, upon the farmers of our land? To whom would they be able to sell their flour, their other breadstuffs, their other agricultural productions? To whom would the machinist and mechanic sell the works of their labor? To whom would the day laborer be able to look for any employment that would afford him any thing beyond a bare subsistence? He asked these questions, because the moment Congress should break down the protective system, that moment they lessened the value of the whole productive industry of the country. The man who had been able hitherto to support himself in comfort, and to educate his children, would now be compelled to curtail his expenses to his indispensable wants; and then what would be the first expenditure which necessity might compel him to cut off? Yes, what would be the first? Might it not be the education of his children? And does any one desire that we should have in this country a body of uneducated operatives like those in Europe? Besides, admitting that they could continue to work at such reduced prices as must ensue, where could they send the products of their industry? Where would the flour go to, where the provisions, where the various manufactured articles? Shall we send them to the States of Europe, who talk so much about the doctrine of free trade? Could this country send them a single barrel of its flour? Was there one single article that could in the least compete with their own products, which those lovers of free trade would admit to an entry in their ports at a fair rate of duties? Not one. The protective policy now proposed to be destroyed, was a policy which had received the sanction of our State Legislatures, and of the American people. Our friends at the South thought the system unconstitutional, and would, of course, vote for the bill. He did not address them; he addressed himself to the Representatives of those States of the Union which had pronounced the system to be not only just, but to be wise and expedient. He asked those gentlemen whether they were prepared to give it up? Were they ready to go home to their constituents, and tell them that they had given votes here which went to paralyze their industry? That they had laid the foundation for the destruction of all the arts they cherished, and all the fruits of their labor? If there were sufficient reasons why all this should be done, then they would vote for the bill; but whether there were any such reasons or not was a question of the deepest responsibility.

Mr. H. warned gentlemen that such would be the results of the bill; and why should they adopt a measure that must thus prostrate the best interests of the country, when they could as well adopt another course, which would reduce the revenue without any such results? No human being could tell the desolations which such a bill would certainly spread throughout all the Middle and Eastern States. He would merely ask the committee to look at the picture. And could it be the true policy of the American Government that these citizens should thus be destroyed? Why must it be done? But if the measure must be forced upon the country, he would ask, in the last place, was this the proper time? He repeated the inquiry, was this the fitting time to enter upon such a course of legislation? Would not gentlemen consent first to see what would be the practical operation of the bill passed at the last session of Congress? Would they insist upon rushing instantly upon the abandonment of the plan proposed by that bill, before they knew how it would operate? Was this the usual course of legislation? No. All who heard him were familiar with the passage of the last tariff law; all remember with how much care it was examined and scrutinized; with what zeal it was pressed upon the House as a system which, once adopted, was to be permanently the policy of the country. And would they already, before the bill was even tried, enter upon a new and untried scheme?

There was another reason why the present was not the proper time: the bill had been brought into the House without the least warning to the country. Was there a man in that hall that could have divined that, in twenty days after their arrival here, a bill would be brought in providing a new tariff; and, before one month had expired, would be pressed for immediate adoption? He wished to ask, and he did ask gentlemen to say whether they believed that the people of this country expected any action of Congress upon the subject during the present session, especially on a bill like this, which proposed, within two years, to bring our manufacturing, agricultural, and mechanical establishments to a state of great depression, if not ruin? He addressed himself to those in a peculiar manner who had voted for the bill of last year as a compromise, and in the belief that it was to be a permanent arrangement. Would they not consider it more wise to let that bill go into effect, and be tested by experience?

Why was the House called to legislate at all on the subject? What had occurred since the close of the last session which should make it proper that this bill should supersede and override all the other public business? What was it that had brought this "bill of abominations" into the House, and rendered it imperative upon the committee to act on it immediately? The gentleman from New York [Mr. VERPLANCK] had made some allusion to the true cause, and Mr. H. would follow him with all becoming deference for the feelings of others, but in that spirit which he thought became the subject. Could any man shut his eyes to the fact that there was a certain portion of this country which considered the protective system, and the laws enacted with reference to it, as unconstitutional and oppressive, and that one of the States had publicly declared that the tariff laws should not be enforced within her limits; and has added the declaration that, if any attempt should be made by force to execute them, she would immediately secede from the Union? On the merits of this question the present was not the proper time to speak. Mr. H. referred to it as a fact which ought to be brought to the consideration of the committee. He had seen and watched the rising of this spirit when it first appeared: it was then a cloud not larger than "a man's hand." It has since spread, and he had seen it gradually rising in the horizon. But he did not fear to look at it, and would never consent, by his vote, to act under what would be understood by the country as a coercion produced by such a prospect.

On this topic it was his purpose so say but little. He had hitherto confined himself to the merits of the bill; yet it was too plain to be denied that, had it not been for the demonstration in a certain quarter, they should never have heard of the present bill. And is it known that this bill would be satisfactory? Would it remove the difficulty? Were they to risk so great a sacrifice as the utter prostration of the great interests of the Middle and Northern States, with no certainty that, after all, the discontents at the South would be quieted, even if they were proper now to be considered. It was said that this must be done to preserve the Union: but was it necessary to sacrifice the Northern and Middle States to preserve the Union? Was that the way to preserve it? Would that bill preserve it? Would its provisions be satisfactory? It was not for him to answer that question: but, judging from what he heard, and from what he read, he should suppose there was but little prospect of such a result. But suppose the bill should not be satisfactory, was the Union in any danger? Did the Representatives of the American people really believe that, unless this bill should pass, the Union will be dissolved? The President of the United States, who had sworn to execute the laws, had recently issued his proclamation, and affixed to it the great seal of the nation, in which he declared that the Union must be preserved, and that the laws should be executed; that, having the fullest confidence in the justness of the legal and constitutional opinions of his duties, expressed in that proclamation, he should rely, with equal confidence, on the undivided support of his fellow-citizens, in his determination to execute the laws, and to preserve the Union by all constitutional means. Did gentlemen believe that he would not do what he promised? Let him ask the attention of the committee to the precedent which Congress would set by passing such a bill at such a juncture. He had said that it was not his purpose to enter minutely into a consideration of the course pursued by one State in the Union. He spoke of this matter only as a fact which existed, and inquired whether if a single State, considering itself aggrieved by the legislation of Congress, could constitutionally declare that the laws of the Union should not be executed within her limits, and possessed the right to secede on the first attempt to execute them, what would become of the Government? Virtually at an end; it would cease to exist, and the great object for which it was formed, would be destroyed.

But let the committee follow out the principle in all the results to which it might lead. Suppose the bill should pass, and its effects upon the Northern and Middle States should be (and they would be) such as he had alluded to, and that then not a single State, but all the Middle States, and the whole of New England, should speak, through conventions, the following language to Congress: (which, however, they never would do.) Unless you repeal this bill immediately we shall secede from the Union. He asked whether there was any gentleman on that floor who would consent to legislate in the face of such a threat? He was confident there was not an individual who would do it: and yet those States were told that they must consent to surrender all their vital interests as a patriotic sacrifice for the preservation of the Union.

Mr. H. said that he had now touched upon all the topics he had proposed to himself when he rose to address the committee. He was opposed to the bill because he doubted whether it would operate immediately to reduce the revenue at all; that, even if it would, it was inexpedient to adopt such a measure, in the existing state of the treasury, with so large an amount of floating debt against the Government, because it broke down a system which it had been the object of all previous legislation to build up and establish, and this without any necessity, because a law just passed, with a view permanently to settle the tariff, had not been tried, nor its operation upon the country ascertained; and, because it was proposed at such a time, and under such circumstances, that the people of the United States would naturally conclude that the bill was passed in view of the disaffection of a certain portion of the Union. For these reasons, and to him they appeared most sufficient and conclusive, he should vote against the bill. He had not alluded particularly (as he might have done) to the time, the circumstances, and the manner in which the protective system had been originated and established. There was the less necessity for him to do so, as an honorable friend of his over the way [Mr. WILDE] had placed his signature to a paper which fully disclosed them, (and his friend never put his name to any thing which he did not write,) and, although they differed on many questions of public policy, it was with great pleasure that he referred to him on the present occasion. In the document to which he alluded, it was declared that the bill of 1816 was not the act of New England, but had proceeded from another source; what that was he (Mr. H.) need not explain to this committee. He did not know, nor was it necessary for him to state all the consequences that must follow from the adoption of such a bill as that now before the committee. It would entirely destroy most of the branches of manufactures and agricultural and mechanical industry, by which the people of the Northern and Middle States obtained their livelihood; and when this came to be felt and understood, he was mistaken if they would not speak to that House in a voice that would shake the marble pillars of that splendid hall to their foundations. It would not be a voice of disunion. No, those who inhabited the portion of country from which he came, gave no countenance to disunion.

They have spent much blood and much money to lay the foundations of this Government, and they had no idea of overturning the fabric they had reared. The Union had obtained for them all of the past which was valuable, connected with their national interests; and it was the Union which was to secure to them all which was valuable in the future. Their voice would not be a voice of disunion nor of insubordination to the laws: such was not the character of those whom he represented; they would obey the laws. They understood it to be the fundamental principle of our Government that the majority must rule. But he told this committee that there was a redeeming spirit in the land, whose action would be felt at the ballot boxes, and which would speedily repeal this law, and again place the industry of the country under the protection of laws which had hitherto cherished and sustained it.

Mr. H. said he had now done with the general principles of the bill. It had been his first intention to move to strike out the enacting clause, but he had been informed that such a motion would not preclude the offering and discussion of as many amendments as gentlemen might choose to offer, and he did not know but there were gentlemen who might wish to propose amendments.

In concluding, therefore, he would make a motion, which would test the sense of the committee on the expediency proposed by this bill, of withdrawing all protection from the domestic industry of the country, by reducing the duties on the productions of foreign labor competing with our own, and adding to the duties on articles which do not compete with our own industry. Congress had, at the last session, taken off substantially all the duties on teas and coffee. Could any gentleman have forgotten the reasons then advanced in favor of such a measure? Was not the House told that these were, by the habits of our people, become necessities of life, and that it was desirable, as soon as possible, to relieve them from so grievous a burden? And yet it was now proposed to reinstate the duty on those articles then made free. His object was to bring the committee first to a vote on these two articles, and he, therefore, moved to erase the two paragraphs of the bill (the 31st and 32d) which imposed a duty on teas and coffee, and which contain the following provisions:

"On coffee, a duty at and after the rate of one cent the pound weight."

"On teas, from and after the third day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, a duty at and after the rates following, that is to say, on imperial, gunpowder, gomee, hyson, and young hyson, ten cents the pound weight; on hyson skin and other green, souchong and other black, except bohea, six cents the pound weight, and on bohea, three cents the pound weight."

Mr. INGERSOLL next obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion of Mr. BURGESS, that the committee rise; which motion prevailed: Ayes 88, noes 62.

The committee thereupon rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 10.

EXPENSES OF LAND OFFICES.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to change the location of certain land offices in the United States, and moved for its engrossment.

Mr. WILDE said that, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, his attention had been drawn to the expenditures of the Government connected with the department of its public lands. He had for sometime been impressed with the conviction that those expenses greatly exceeded the due proportion which they ought to bear to the other demands of the public service. And he had risen now to inquire whether the bill just reported involved any augmentation of this expense?

Mr. WICKLIFFE said, the increasing expenditure of the land offices, for a few years past, had not escaped his notice; he would be glad to apply a corrective, if he could satisfy himself as to the most proper mode of doing it. The provisions of this bill would not increase the expenses of the offices beyond what might be required to transport the books. The necessity for this bill had arisen from the fact that several land offices, from sales of lands, and the consequent change of the sphere of their action, were located out of the district where the lands for sale at them are situated. Every year applications had been made to change the location of the offices by law. To avoid continual legislation on this subject, the bill proposed to invest the President with the power to make the necessary changes in the location of the offices. The only mode which had occurred to him of reducing the expenses of the system, was to reduce the number of land offices, by making the district of each more extensive. This bill would not increase the expenses except for the mere transportation of the books of the offices where a change was required.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed without a division.

THE TARIFF.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the bill to reduce and otherwise alter the duties on imports—Mr. WAYNE in the chair.

Mr. INGERSOLL, of Connecticut, rose and said that the peculiar situation in which, as one of the Committee of Ways and Means, it had been his fortune, perhaps misfortune, to be placed, seemed to require that he should, in this early stage of the debate, give the reasons why he had not been able to assent to the present bill, and the report which accompanies it. This is due to myself, (said Mr. I.) no less than to my highly respected associates of the committee, from whom I have been obliged to differ. As was said on a former occasion, and in reference to another report, by the gentleman (Mr. VERPLANCK) who, as chairman of the committee, reported this bill, my position in regard to it, is "singular and solitary." Yes, I say it more in sorrow than in anger, it is solitary indeed. Even my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE,] who has generally acted with me in the Committee of Ways and Means, on all matters connected with the protective policy of the country, has finally concluded that it is his duty to leave me; and it is well known that all the other members of the committee have ever been, in principle, opposed to the policy that we have hitherto endeavored to uphold. No doubt the motives of my worthy friend were of the purest kind, and the feelings which prompted him were those of a generous bosom. Yielding, however, a little to the infirmities of our common nature, he may have been unconsciously influenced, in some measure, by the circumstances in which he stood. His attention has doubtless been turned more particularly to the preservation of the strong interests, the iron interest, of his own State; and finding that they apparently fare better under this tax bill than those of some other States, who have no phalanx of electoral votes to make themselves felt here, he may have concluded to go for the bill as it is, rather than take the chances of getting a worse one at a future session. It is proposed to protect the leading productions of Pennsylvania by duties varying from about thirty to ninety per cent.; and the bill which does this, also proposes to crowd down the woollens, in which the hardy yeomanry of the county, the wool growers, are particularly concerned, to twenty, or less than twenty, per cent. Had our circumstances been reversed, had the woollens, the cottons, the paper, and the other branches more immediately interesting to the people in the quarter of the country from whence I come—had these been preserved by higher rates, and the iron and coal of Pennsylvania depressed below the average of a mere revenue duty, my friend, I think, might have viewed the subject in a different light. Let me, however, assure him, in parting, that the iron arch, important as it is to the entire system, cannot long remain after its enemies have been once permitted, in this way, to undermine its foundations.

What would be the precise effect of this measure, if adopted, on the revenue of the country, no one could with safety predict. But, as I wish to avoid as much as possible all debatable grounds, I shall take it for granted, for the purpose of this inquiry at least, that the committee are right in saying that the receipts from the customs, under their bill, would be reduced to something over thirteen millions of dollars. We are asked to make arrangements now for large reductions, because, in the opinion of the committee, our present receipts, unless we promptly interpose, will roll up and retain a dangerous surplus in the treasury, "a needless burden upon the people, a tax falling directly or indirectly upon the land and labor of the country, certainly injurious in its effects, and probably unequal, enriching the treasury only, to divide and distract our public councils, by tempting to expenditures of doubtful constitutional right, or inconsistent with the simplicity of republican institutions, staining their purity, and hazarding their permanency." If, Mr. Chairman, there is one individual on this floor who is in favor of accumulating such a surplus in the treasury, for the pleasure of scrambling for the spoils, I wish it to be distinctly understood that it is not the humble individual who now addresses you. No, sir; the sentiments held by me on that subject, were embodied in a report presented at the last session, and which was also signed by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GILMORE,] and, by the principles there expressed, I shall steadfastly abide, let those principles lead me where they may.

There are some points, then, in which I am happy to agree with the other members of the committee. I agree with them that we should not accumulate an useless surplus in the public treasury; and that, at a proper time, and in a proper manner, the revenues should be adapted to the strict wants of the Government, if found to exceed those wants. More than this, it may be admitted that, after the payment of our debts, fifteen millions, the sum estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and sanctioned by my associates of the committee, should be, in ordinary times, sufficient to meet the current expenses.

Having gone thus far with the other members of the committee, we have now reached the point at which I am sorry to part with them. In saying, as I do, that this is not the proper time to change the established revenue system of the country, I have no allusion to what is taking place elsewhere. I come to this part of the subject, in the way in which it was put to me, as a strictly financial, not a political question. This is not the proper time, because you will, in my opinion, have need for every dollar you will receive under the present system of duties for the two years to come, at least. In the report put forth, it is taken for granted that now is the time, and now the hour, most fit and proper to reduce the treasury receipts; and this the committee are attempting to accomplish by their bill, lest the dreaded surplus should overtake us, if we delay it a little longer. This is not the first time that we have heard about "a surplus in the treasury," and the embarrassments it might produce in our devising ways and means to get rid of it. Why, sir, I have heard about it, and read about it, ever since I was old enough to read the newspapers, but have never been able to find it, except in the imagination, for the last quarter of a century. I remember reading about it as far back as the administration of Mr. Jefferson; the evil had been anticipated at that day, and Congress had been called upon to devise some plan for disposing of it. The profound statesman (Mr. Jefferson) then at the head of the Government, advised Congress, that when a surplus should really be found in the treasury, it should be expended in works of internal improvement, either under the present constitutional powers, or under such new grants as might be imparted to the federal compact. But we have grown wiser than Mr. Jefferson, or think we have. No one is now so unfashionable as to propose that the surplus revenues should be so used; in our estimate of fifteen millions we do not mean to have any of it distributed in that way. And lest we should happen to have an excess, we are perplexed as to the mode of avoiding it. It was the burden of complaint at the last session; it met us during the recess, in staring capitals, in the publications of the day; and since we have been here this winter, it has been rung and echoed in our ears, in all the sameness of the cuckoo's note—"surplus—surplus—surplus!" Gentlemen will insist upon it that the body politic is in danger of immediate death from plethora, and the political doctors who gather around in consultation, instead of tapping a vein, are for cutting the arteries. Let me advise them to stay their hand before they use the knife thus freely. Let us see how the truth is about this much talked of surplus—this moneyed plethora that threatens so many ills. The examination will no doubt be dull, dry, and uninteresting; but it is one which every statesman must make before he can be prepared to vote on this bill.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, has informed the House that there would be on the first of the present month a surplus, speaking in round numbers, of $1,600,000. Taking this report of the Secretary in our hands, let us open his strong box and count its contents. If you will do so, you will find, that of this amount of $1,600,000, the sum of $1,400,000 consists of what is called "unavailable funds." These unavailable funds are principally made up of the bills of broken banks—local banks which have failed years ago. You received them when the State banks were used as places of deposit for the national funds, and before the incorporation of the present Bank of the United States. And permit me to add, if some of the present schemes of the day should take effect—if we should withdraw our deposits from the vaults of the United States Bank, and again trust them to the safe keeping of the local institutions, whatever may become of our other funds, we shall at least have one, the fund "unavailable," that will be always on the increase. However, it may not be worth while to dwell upon that topic just now. My first business is with the surplus. If these rotten bank notes are taken out of the account, we shall have left, in sound funds, but two hundred thousand instead of sixteen hundred thousand dollars. Nor does this give us the true state of the case. Turn back to the Secretary's report, and you will find that, to make up this excess, he has reckoned in the money which we received from the Government of Denmark for spoiliations on our commerce, amounting to not far from 700,000 dollars, every dollar of which belongs to our merchants, and may be by them, either now, or in a few weeks, drawn out. This money makes no part of the legitimate funds of the treasury; it is merely there in trust for others, whose private property it is. Allow for this, and, instead of a surplus in the treasury, we are deficit, on the 1st of January, to the amount of nearly half a million of dollars. But if we go a little deeper into this business we shall find, that besides the deficiency just alluded to, there are, of the appropriations of the last session, and former sessions of Congress, now remaining unsatisfied, but which will hereafter have to be paid, nearly five and a half millions of dollars, or, to speak with mathematical precision, the sum of $5,476,202 26. These claims must be regarded by every honorable man in as sacred a light as the funded debt. Instead, therefore, of the much talked of surplus, there is now an actual deficit of nearly a half million of dollars, and outstanding demands amounting to almost five and a half millions more; making, together, not far from six millions to be provided for beyond the means now in the treasury. Then, in addition to these six millions, there is owing to the public creditors on the funded debt, seven millions more; making, in all, on the 1st day of the present month, a round sum of about thirteen millions of dollars. This being the condition of the treasury at the present time, we need not yet trouble ourselves about disposing of the surplus.

But it probably might, and will, be said by the friends of the bill, that, to meet all this, we shall have an immense influx coming in from the customs during the current year; and though we are now so far behind, there will be, on the 1st of January next, certainly, "a large surplus in the treasury. Let us see: The Secretary has informed Congress that the whole receipts for the year 1833, from the customs, from the public lands, and from the stock held by Government in the United States Bank, and from all other incidental sources, will amount to twenty-four millions of dollars. With this sum, what have we to pay? Take the Secretary's own statement to answer this question. He has told you, in his official report, that the expenditures of the nation during the year will be, exclusive of the principal of the public debt, and exclusive of the Danish claim, seventeen millions six hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars. Deducting this from the twenty-four millions, and also allowing for the payment of the Danish indemnity, which must be taken from the receipts of the present year, and you will have left about five million eight hundred thousand, and will, at the same time, owe to the holders of the public stocks seven millions, and have another floating mass of unsatisfied appropriations at the end of the year, which, if they should be as large at the end of this year as they were at the end of the last, would leave you still about seven millions to be provided for. There can be no surplus, therefore, on the 1st of January, 1834; but we must then, as now, lag still behind the sum of our indebtedness.

But perhaps there will be a surplus two years hence, that is, in January, 1835. This, too, shall be looked into, if the committee will but have patience to go through the examination. It is a dry subject, very dry, and can only be elucidated by speeches of figures, not by figures of speech. During the year 1834, the act of July last, reducing the duties, will be in full operation, and the receipts from the customs under it are estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury to be eighteen millions of dollars; in addition to which we may receive from the public lands, and from the United States Bank stock, three millions; (if the bank should not by that time stop payment;) making the whole revenues of the year 1834 amount to twenty-one millions. The expenditures of the same year, exclusive of the debt, are estimated by the Committee of Ways and Means, at fifteen millions of dollars, and that is putting them a million and a half less than they were during the last year, and two and a half millions less than the estimate for the current year—but say fifteen millions, if you please, exclusive of the debt. As, however, it has been shown that we must commence the year 1834 with a balance of funded debt, and the usual floating mass of unsatisfied appropriations, amounting together to nearly seven millions against us, you must, to ascertain our true condition, add to this amount to the fifteen millions required for ordinary expenses, making not far from twenty-two millions to be provided for in that year; to meet which you can have but twenty-one millions of receipts, thus leaving a balance still against you on the 1st of January, 1835.

I am aware that we are not obliged to take money out of the treasury on the first of each year to meet the unsatisfied appropriations that are then outstanding; but if we owe the money—and there can be no higher claim than an appropriation by Congress—will any man say that we should not always be ready to meet these demands, however and whenever they may come? Can you, at any rate, talk of having a surplus, when the very money which you call surplus is liable to be taken in payment of debts that you have made yourselves liable for? It has been the general policy of our Government, as it is of every other that can do it, to retain enough in its treasury to set off against all ordinary contingencies and unsatisfied appropriations. It is peculiarly proper, in a Government like ours, where the revenue is mainly dependent on foreign commerce, and of course liable to be lessened by the vicissitudes of trade. Looking, therefore, at the matter in either light, whether the money is considered as actually to be taken out of the treasury, or to be reserved in it, to meet existing demands, it is manifest that, instead of a "surplus" on the 1st of January, 1835, there would be a probable balance against us, reckoning on the one side the cash in the treasury, and on the other the ordinary expenses, the remnant of the debt, and the unsatisfied appropriations.

To all this it may be, and probably will be, answered, that the Government owns stock in the Bank of the United States to the amount of seven millions; and this stock may be brought under the hammer, and should we get par for it, then we should have the glorious surplus completely within our grasp, perhaps in some two years hence. The proposition is, that we should sell our stock in the Bank of the United States, which now yields an interest of seven per cent., for the purpose of buying our own debt not due, the greater part of it, till 1835, and on which we are paying but four and a half and five per cent. The bank stock, seven millions of it, if forced into the market in a mass, must go at a great discount, if sold at all; while the public creditors would not part with the scrip which they hold against you, unless you paid them an advance; and yet the proposal is coolly made that we should sell our seven per cent. bank stock at a discount, to buy up our own debts at a premium, and on which we pay but four and a half and five per cent.

JAN. 10, 1833.]

The Tariff.

[H. OF R.]

This would be a general financial operation, indeed! Would any gentleman pursue such a course in his own private concerns? If he did it in the part of the country from whence I came, he would have a conservator put over him as an insane person. And dare we do that with the people's money which no individual in his senses would do with his own? But suppose you should send this bank stock into the market, are you quite sure that it could be now sold at any price? Must not any man who has watched the thermometer in Wall street, know that the moment the Government should enter the stock market with these seven millions, there would be a general panic, and a rush from all the holders to get rid of their shares also? Let the bank be ever so sound, if the Government should thus send its stock to be sold, it would necessarily enter a glutted market, with the death mark upon the face of it. In a market thus glutted, it could not fetch the half of its original cost. Who would buy it? Capitalists do not desire to buy up the stock of banks that are about to wind up their concerns; they do not wish to buy debts scattered all over the Union; their object is to get interest regularly paid for their investments. It was the most idle thing in the world to suppose that this stock could be sold at pleasure, unless at an enormous sacrifice. A gentleman near me says we could sell our canal stock: surely the gentleman must be in jest. In regard to that species of property, if we continue to be the holders of it, my own opinion is, that it will be eventually productive; but you might as well throw it to the winds as now to throw it into the market. The United States Bank must begin to wind up its concerns at farthest in 1836. It will probably require from five to ten years to bring its affairs to a close. We should not receive the principal sum in a lump, but by instalments of a million or a half million at a time, and this, put into the mass of the national funds, never would be sufficient to cause a troublesome "surplus in the treasury." Besides, there is no proposition yet before us to sell out our bank stock, and, till one shall be presented in a tangible form, it should not be taken into the account. True, the President of the United States has recommended that "provision be made to dispose of all stocks now held by the Government in corporations." But we should do injustice to the President to suppose that he meant by this to hurry the bank stock to a forced sale, without any regard to the price it could command: no such thing could have been intended, nor do the words of his message justify such an inference. But suppose the President had so recommended—and I wish to treat his recommendations with all the respect due to the Executive of my country—has not the President also recommended other measures that have an important bearing on this question? He has told us that we ought not to rely on the public lands as a permanent source of revenue; and in this I agree with him, though we may differ as to the best mode of disposing of them.

He has also recommended that teas and coffee, those articles of necessity, should be imported at mere nominal duties, or duty free, as we said they should be, last July. He has also recommended that we should hold out adequate protection to those branches of industry necessary to our security and independence in war. Why have not you carried out these wholesome recommendations in the bill now before us? These are Executive recommendations into which I should probably more thoroughly enter than even my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.] When gentlemen would, therefore, quote upon me the Executive recommendations as their guide, they should take them as a whole; they should take all that has relation to the same subject, and not cut out here a passage, and there a passage, as may happen to suit their particular views, and discard the rest as worthless.

If the views which have been now presented in relation to the finances of the country, present and future, are correct, we cannot rid ourselves of the conclusion that the amount of revenue, as it is expected to accrue from the act of July, 1832, will all be wanted for the two ensuing years at least. Why, then, are we urged in this hasty and unprecedented manner, to uproot that act? Why unsettle all that has been established with so much care and so much labor? Why was the odious gag applied to the very outset of this discussion? Why not debate this interesting subject in a liberal spirit? and why meet us at every turn, not by argument, but by silent, sullen votes? Ought not the House, ought not the country, to see what will be the operation of the act of July last, which was adopted by such a great majority, before we again meddle with the disturbing topic? Will you not see the working of it for a single year? Have we committed such an offence by the passing of that law, that we must now atone for it, not by eating our own act, but by having it crammed down our throats while it is yet wet with the ink with which it is written.

But suppose the views which have been presented in reference to the finances, are all wrong; suppose there is, or shortly will be, the much talked of surplus; that it is necessary, therefore, to reduce the revenue, and that this is the proper time. Then I have to say that this is not the proper bill. It is partial, unjust, and inequitable in its bearings on the diversified interests of the country affected by it. Aside from this, no permanent system should be settled, by which we are to rely on the public lands after the payment of the debt for which they were originally pledged. The scheme now offered does so rely on the lands for a large portion of the treasury receipts. There is, to be sure, in the report, some qualification about purchasing Indian titles, and paying revolutionary pensions, but that limit as to the land income, does not amount to much; for I presume we shall have Indian titles to extinguish, and annuities to pay to the tribes, to use an Indian comparison, "as long as water runs or grass grows." And then, as to our revolutionary worthies, who have at last received their long deferred dues, it is to be hoped that death will not have disposed of them as soon as the report seems to apprehend. I hope they may remain among us many, many years longer. And if, as some predict, and many fear, the fabric of our Union which they assisted to raise, is to be destroyed, then, with the good Lafayette, I pray that the evil hour may be at least delayed, till not one of these venerable men shall be left to mourn over the ruins.

Although no one of the various schemes for disposing of the public lands, has yet united in its favor a majority in both Houses of Congress, yet all parties seem to have agreed, till quite lately, that they should not be regarded as a source of revenue in peace, after the payment of the debt. The friends and opponents of the tariff formerly united very generally in this, and there seemed to be a struggle as to who should go farthest. In the "great debate" which took place in the other wing of this building it was generally conceded that the public domain should not contribute to the public treasury, after we should once get clear of debt. The Eastern Senators were rather taunted unjustly, as I think, for holding too firmly to the lands; and as having a disposition to grind and oppress the hardy pioneers, whose industry and enterprise had rendered them productive. No one could have believed that we should have so soon have a proposition, especially from the quarter whence this comes, to fix the present land system more firmly on us. It seems almost impossible that any man who has watched the signs of the times, either in this House or out of it, could expect to rely upon the lands for two or three millions of dollars a year, after the payment of the public debt. We must all see that, assure as time, some scheme will soon be devised, that will put them out of the question for ordinary revenue purposes. The President has told you so in the most explicit manner. Let me read from the message sent to us at the opening of our present session, a document that I trust will be considered good authority by those who framed this bill: "It seems to me to be our true policy, (says the President,) that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising out of our Indian compacts." "The adventurers and hardy population of the West, besides contributing their share of taxation under our impost system, have, in the progress of our Government for the lands they occupy, paid into the treasury a large proportion of forty millions of dollars, and of the revenue received therefrom, but a small part has been expended amongst them. When, to the disadvantage of their situation in this respect, we add the consideration that it is their labor alone which gives real value to the lands, and that the proceeds arising from their sale are distributed chiefly among States which had not originally any claim to them, and which have enjoyed the undivided emoluments arising from the sale of their own lands, it cannot be expected that the new States will remain longer contented with the present policy after the payment of the public debt. To avert the consequences which may be apprehended from this cause, to put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on this subject, and to afford to every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report a year ago, which I have not by me, also recommended another mode of getting rid of the lands. But the plan of the present bill is still to draw two or three millions annually from them. Are the Western gentlemen ready for this? Do they think that the present land system is the best that can be devised, and are they anxious now to rivet it on themselves? For such will be the effect of their votes, if they are recorded in favor of this bill. This is an objection which strikes to the root of the present scheme. Let us, when we come to fix our permanent system, draw our fifteen millions, or whatever sum may be necessary, exclusively from the customs, leaving the public domain to be equitably disposed of as the wisdom of Congress may devise, or the wants of the people may require.

There are other objections to this bill which shall not be noticed. Its very details are so unjust and unequal in their bearings, (though doubtless not so considered by the committee,) that I should be willing to submit the question of their inequality to the opponents of the protective system, to those even who hold to the doctrine of State nullification; and, from the votes we have taken, there is some reason to believe that these questions are to be yet decided in this House by the opponents of the tariff rather than its friends. We have here a bill in which the report that accompanies it, informs us the duties are generally averaged from ten to twenty per cent.; and as woollen and cotton goods stand at twenty in the bill, one would suppose that they have been favored with a place on the outside of the average. Now, how is the fact? What are the great articles of dutiable imports? They are principally iron, dry goods of various kinds, sugars, teas, spirits, salt, &c. We will see how the duties on these things compare with the ten and twenty per cent. average. First, we have iron, an article which all friends of the tariff will say should be well protected, and the duties on which far be it from me to complain of, you give by the bill on hammered iron a duty of fifteen dollars the ton, which is equal to twenty-eight per cent.; on rolled iron, twenty-four dollars the ton, which is equal to seventy-six per cent.; on pig iron, a specific duty equal to thirty-five per cent.; and on sheet and hoop iron a specific duty, which is equal to ninety-three per cent. So much for the protection of iron: On coal, another most valuable product of Pennsylvania and Virginia, the duty is proposed to be five cents the bushel, which is equal to forty-seven per cent. On salt, an important product of the "empire State," the duty will still be equal to thirty-nine per cent., though reduced from what it was before. On cordage, by way of favoring free trade, as we are to presume, or the shipping interest, the duties will be equal to forty-one and fifty per cent. On spirits, (to encourage the manufacture of whiskey,) they amount to sixty-four per cent. On brown sugar, at two cents the pound, which is equal to about forty-six per cent. Molasses, four cents the gallon, which is equal to twenty-eight per cent. Hemp, for the special benefit of our beloved sister Kentucky, twenty-six per cent., which is not quite so bad as the wollens. On cotton goods, the duty is to be but twenty per cent.; and on wollens, some of them (those costing thirty-five cents the square yard) the duty is to be but five per cent., and on the residue twenty per cent. Is there any thing like an average, or approaching it, in all these arrangements? Then we have teas, an unprotected article, on which the committee have assessed a mere revenue duty of thirty per cent.: so that, according to this rule, if thirty per cent. is a fair revenue rate, throwing out of the question the protective principle, you have placed the great interests of cotton and wollen manufactures, not only below every other protected article, but you have put them far below the mere revenue standard that you have applied to teas.

The President has said, and the Committee of Ways and Means, in their report, admit, that on articles necessary to our independence in war, it is proper to put higher duties than on others. But is not the blanket of the soldier, and the clothing which he wears, necessary for him in time of war? How was it in the last war? Ask any man who was on the Northern frontier—ask my honorable friend from Pennsylvania (Col. WATKINSON) who was there, and who, amid the snows of a Canadian winter, bore the hardships, as he now bears the honorable scars, of that trying service. He will tell you that the men were more distressed from the want of comfortable woollens than from any other cause. Why, sir, it is notorious that you had not blankets to issue to the shivering savages who sought your protection. We had iron enough and lead enough. It is true we occasionally wanted some of the well-made manufactures of iron, well-finished muskets, but we had the raw material, and should have had no difficulty as to muskets at any time, if you had given that encouragement to your enterprising citizens engaged in making them, which sound policy required long before the war. And how is it as to coal, protected by a duty of 47 per cent.? Is that, too, one of the things necessary to our independence in war? There is much of it used among us, "Yankees;" we are probably the best customers for this article, for we live in a cold climate. It goes into all our factories and workshops, and into most of our dwellings on the sea board, on the banks of our rivers, and the margins of our canals, wherever you can penetrate by water. We take immense quantities of it from Pennsylvania, and pay her well for it. We do not object to the duty, because it is a part of the entire system. But, sir, there are immense beds of the richest coal in the neighboring British province of Nova Scotia, convenient to water, and which would supply, to a very great extent, the demands of the New England States, and a considerable part of New York, if this duty were removed, or even if it should be put as low as you have, by this bill, put the duties on woollens. As to spirits, no one thinks that "the ardent," in this form at least, is necessary as a war article. The Secretaries of War and of the Navy have adopted the best way of promoting national independence in regard to that, by discontinuing the allowance of grog to the rank and file of the army and the sailors of our public ships, and substituting more substantial comforts in its stead. There is one general remark that applies to the bulky articles of iron, coal, salt, sugar, and molasses; it is this, that a given rate of duty on either of them affords a much greater protection than the same rate assessed upon the light dry goods, such as cottons and woollens, or on paper; and for the obvious reason, that the freight, cartage, wharfage, and other expenses of such heavy articles, are, of themselves, a great protection, compared with which the foreign light goods pay but little when brought from abroad. Let me not be understood as objecting to any or either of these duties: I go for them all. I would not pull them down to the humble level assigned to the woollens, the cottons, and the paper, but prefer raising these last towards the more favored rank of the first. But if you insist upon giving us what you call free trade, give it with an impartial hand—why not give it in iron, which enters so largely into the construction of those gallant ships that swell their canvass in every sea, and bear your flag to every quarter of the globe? Why discriminate in the long list of other articles which we have just been examining?

It is intimated in the report, that the act of 1816 has been taken as the basis of this bill; and it may be said that, inasmuch as there were inequalities in the former, they had been adopted here. But there is a great mistake in this. The truth is, that iron and some other articles are more highly protected by this bill than they were by the act of 1816, whereas both cottons and woollens are put materially lower. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] shakes his head, but I repeat it, the cottons and woollens are put lower than they were in the tariff of 1816; and he shall yet be convinced of it, if he will favor me a little longer with his attention. To get at the truth of this matter, you must look beneath the surface of this bill. You must bear in mind that the duties on iron now, as in 1816, are at a named sum on the ton, or hundred weight; as for instance, 24 dollars the ton on rolled, and 15 dollars the ton on hammered iron; and they stand at that sum year in and year out, without any reference to the fall of price in the foreign market; consequently, if iron was worth 60 dollars the ton in England in 1816, and but 30 dollars there at the present time, a fixed duty of 24 dollars would be double the protection now that it was then. Well, sir, this is very nearly the fact as to some descriptions of the article. There is now in my hand a copy of the invoices of importations made in New York, from which it appears that certain kinds of iron were selling in England, in 1816, at from ten to twelve pounds sterling the ton, which, in 1831, were selling in the English market for about five pounds ten shillings the ton. So that, with the same nominal duty on the ton, at the two periods, you give altogether a different rate of protection. As has been before observed, I do not complain of the iron duties; on the contrary, my doctrine is, that an effectual protection, by promoting home competition, gives us a cheaper article in the end, and by checking excessive importations from abroad, may tend to lower the prices there. But this is as applicable to other articles, to woollen goods, as to iron.

The report informs us that the committee have arranged the iron duties partly in reference to the act of 1816, and partly by what they call the supplemental act of 1818. But the act of 1818 was no more supplemental to that of 1816, than was the act of '24, or '28, '32. It did not purport, in its title, to be a supplement to the one which went before it, or an addition to it, but a distinct, independent, law, to raise the duties on certain articles of import, which were, iron and alum. Can it then be denied that iron is better protected by this bill than it was in 1816? The same remarks are applicable to sugar, and to molasses; the duty of two cents on the former, and four on the latter, affords a higher protection to them now, under the present prices in the foreign market, than they had with three and five cents in 1816, as prices then ranged. But it is all the other way with cottons and woollens. The duties on this description of goods are not fixed at a particular sum on the yard, but at a particular rate on the foreign cost. They are here ad valorem duties of twenty per cent. on the foreign value, and the sum to be paid at the custom-house depends not on the weight or measure, but on what they cost in the foreign country; it rises and falls with the foreign prices; and it shall now be shown that a less protection is given on these articles than they had in 1816:

First, as to woollens. By the act of 1816 all woollen goods were to pay 25 per cent. for three years, and then come down to 20 per cent. ad valorem. But Congress interposed before the three years, and held them up. How is it with them in this bill? All woollen goods costing, in the foreign market not over 35 cents the yard, are to be put at five per cent., and all others at 20 per cent. in two years from next March. Say not that no woollens can be imported costing 35 cents or less the yard, and therefore the five per cent. is of no consequence. You will find, on looking at the treasury returns, that there were imported during the last year, one million of dollars worth of this very description of goods, and that, too, under the old rates of duty. It is a class of goods which interferes directly with our satinets. And who can calculate the amount that will be crowded in upon us by means of false invoices and otherwise, when they can be entered at the nominal duty of five per cent.? No such discrimination as this was made in 1816: on the contrary, it was under that act that our satinet establishments began to take root. Some one near me says it was the act of 1832 that opened the door to the cheap woollens at 5 per cent. to favor what are called the negro cloths. It did so; but the bill of 1832 protects the other woollen interests; it does not put them at 20 per cent. where they are placed here. That was a bill of compromise; much was given up; but we will abide by it as it is, entire as to woollens, though you cannot expect us to be satisfied with it, after you have mutilated its most important features. It is a remarkable circumstance, that in this bill there is not an article, in the whole list of imports, on which a duty is assessed at so low a rate as the five per cent. woollens, except one, and that is straw matting, which we trample under foot, and it pays a duty of five per cent. on importation. All the mere revenue duties stand far above it. Is this equal and exact justice? Is it distributing benefits and burdens with an impartial hand? Let the most determined enemy of protection answer the inquiry; it admits of but one response.

Now for the cottons: Compare the protection given here with that in the act of '16. By that act it is well known that the minimum principle was first applied as a regulator of the duties on cottons. It was of immense service; it drew millions of capital into that branch of manufacture, and has given us a cheaper and better article than we ever had before. But it is stricken out of the bill now before us, and of course leaves that manufacture at a lower protection than it had in 1816. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee now satisfied that woollens and cottons are put lower in the bill than they were in the act of '16? Has it not been demonstrated? And why has this invidious distinction found a place here? The protective tariff was not put upon the country by New England votes; they stand recorded against it at the beginning, though they have since sustained it. It was first adopted when commerce was the idol of the East, and free trade the motto inscribed upon her banner. The policy of others, and the votes of others, drove the people of that section of the country from their ships to the workshops, where they have invested their property, relying upon the public faith to maintain the system as to the settled policy of the country; and you are now for turning them back to their ships, to learn something of free trade again. Such injustice surely can be sanctioned by no portion of the House or the country. Pennsylvania cannot and will not be detached from her fixed policy by such a bill as this; no matter under what political flag she contends, she always carries the flag of American industry hoisted higher. I do not believe that she will see that flag lowered in the present contest, or permit a single stripe upon it to be stained by a faithless act. The protective system has been upheld by that respectable commonwealth from the days of McKean and of Snyder to the present time, and it will not be abandoned now.

It was, too, the doctrine of the "empire State," in the days of George Clinton, of his distinguished nephew, De Wit Clinton, and of the patriotic Tompkins. The Legislature of New York used formerly to adopt resolutions favoring the tariff as regularly as they assembled in Albany. So completely was the protective system identified in those times with the democracy of the country, that it was the doctrine of Tammany Hall in its earliest and purest days. Even in the commercial emporium, the republican candidates were selected always from the friends of domestic industry. The honorable gentleman now at the head of the Committee of Commerce, [Mr. CAMBRELEN], was the first candidate ever nominated at Tammany Hall for Congress, of free trade principles; and the difficulties which he had to contend with, when first announced as a candidate, were almost insurmountable. There was a muttering in the Tammany ranks, indicating a strong disposition to revolt against the regular nomination; and, but for the timely and untiring aid which he received from the leading free trade federal press, then edited by the late William Coleman, he might have been defeated. It is very much to his credit that he has sustained himself, at every subsequent election; and not only so, but the city is now very thoroughly of his own way of thinking, and I believe some districts in the interior.

But, to return to what the committee have considered the average rate of the duties under their bill, from 10 to 20 per cent. They have probably been led into error here by the tabular statements prepared at the Treasury Department, and appended to the report, in which an average is stated as applicable to the bill, of 16 or 18 per cent. and some fractions. But this statement is delusive, though the Secretary may not be in fault for it; for he had been obliged, from the press of business, to intrust that work to another person. The error is brought about, first, by making the calculations on the imports of a single year, and that year of excessive importation; and, second, by not making a proper allowance for goods re-exported, and for those made free under the act of 1832, and the present bill. The only fair way is to take a series of years, and strike a general average. The memorial of the Free Trade Convention, penned by an experienced financier, [Mr. Gallatin,] a document wrong in its theories, but strong in its statistics, estimates our dutiable imports at 57½ millions of dollars in value, after deducting free goods of course from the gross amount, and also deducting the large amount of foreign goods re-exported with drawbacks. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. VERPLANCK] is undoubtedly right when he says that our imports will generally increase 6½ per cent. in a series of six years of regular trade. But, under this bill, to be liberal, say the increase will be 10 per cent., which add to Mr. Gallatin's estimate, and you will then have $63,250,000 as the basis of the calculation. But from this an allowance must be made for goods made free, either under the act of 1832, or this bill, amounting to about 4,800,000 dollars, which will leave the dutiable imports at about 58,450,000 dollars, instead of the sum assumed by the committee. The duties accruing under this bill, if averaged on this amount, would be about 25 per cent., including the expense of collection, instead of from 10 to 20. The woollens and cottons, therefore, are worse off under the bill reported, than they would be if the principle promulgated last year by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] should be applied to them; that is, if all dutiable imports should be brought to a common ad valorem level, they would, in that way, get 25 per cent. at least; but now they are below the general average they get but 20, or less than 20. Even the Free Trade Convention gave us better encouragement than this. Mr. Gallatin's memorial says: "The average duty required to produce a net revenue of 13,000,000, would amount to near 27 per cent., if wines, teas, coffee, cocos, spices, and fruits were exempted from duty. A net revenue of 15,000,000 would require, in that case, an average duty of 31 per cent., and of 27 per cent. if those articles were subject to the same duty as every other import."

Thus much for the details of the bill, so far as the protected interests are concerned. But there is an amendment submitted by my colleague, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] about which I will say something before I sit down. This amendment proposes to strike tea and coffee from the bill, and reinstate them to the free list, where they were placed by the act of last July. I shall vote for the amendment, and do so under the hope that when these articles are erased, the duties which they do not require may be transferred to the woollens, the cottons, and other suffering interests, and thus contribute something towards the general policy of protection, if this bill, or any thing like it, is to be carried through.

These articles, tea and coffee, six months ago, were made free from March next; and the most humiliating part of the business is, that now, even before our act of the last session has taken effect, we should be required to tread back our steps, and acknowledge ourselves wrong. And why is this required? Surely it cannot be by the advice of the officer at the head of the treasury, for he sent us last year the projet of a bill in which a mere nominal duty of a half a cent a pound on coffee, and a cent on tea was proposed; not enough to yield any thing worth naming to the treasury, after deducting the custom-house fees: but it was thought best to make them free in name as well as free in fact, and we stripped these little incumbrances from the bill. Should the friends of free trade complain of this? Let me read to you, for the benefit of the committee, what the President has told us on this point: it is better than any language of my own. In his message of December, 1829, he uses this language: "Looking forward to that period, not far distant, when a sinking fund will no longer be required, the duties on those articles which cannot come in competion with our own productions, are the first that should engage the attention of Congress, in the modification of the tariff. Of these, tea and coffee are the most prominent; they enter largely into the consumption of the country, and have become articles of necessity to all classes. A reduction, therefore, of the existing duties will be felt as a common benefit; but, like all other legislation connected with commerce, to be efficacious and not injurious, it should be gradual and certain." We accordingly commenced the reduction then, and finished it last July. Do any of the friends of this bill wish other authority than this? If they do, it is ready for them. They will find it in a speech of one of Virginia's most able sons, whose shrill and piercing eloquence was, at the session of 1830, put forth in favor of making these articles free. The committee have doubtless anticipated the name of the honorable Philip P. Barbour, of Virginia, the president of the Free Trade Convention, which assembled in Philadelphia in the autumn of '31, and since a candidate for the Vice Presidency of those portions of the friends of free trade who thought Mr. Van Buren's sentiments too much tainted with the tariff. Here is his reported speech:

The Tariff.

He says in it that "the report from the treasury informs us that the duties, to an amount exceeding seven and a half millions of dollars, may be repealed upon articles not at all produced or manufactured in the United States, or, in so inconsiderable a degree, as to be utterly unworthy of notice; and, indeed, I have reason to believe, sir, that the repeal may be extended to ten millions, without materially affecting any manufacturing interest." He then appealed to the tariff members, and used this emphatic language: "To this extent, then, I have a right to expect the aid even of the tariff members of this House." Aye, "the tariff members" of the House were called upon by this distinguished Virginia statesman to aid him in removing the duties from these very articles which this bill now proposes to tax again, after they have been declared free. Who could then have expected that, in three years afterwards, we should have such a division as we now have, and on such a question? Some political economists, it is said, have since discovered, or think they have discovered, that tea and coffee are received in exchange exclusively for Northern products, and that has, on some occasions, been assigned as a reason why they should not go free. But this is all a mistake. Whoever will look at the course of our foreign trade, will see that these articles are not purchased with the exclusive products of any section of the country. How do we get our teas? Not as formerly, when we sent dollars, and hardly any thing else, to China. The course of the business is now entirely different: the merchant usually now sends his ship first to Europe with a cargo that can make funds in England, and we all know that cotton is the great article for that purpose: the avails of this cargo, when realized, are left in England, and from thence the vessel proceeds to China, where teas are purchased, and paid for by bills on Liverpool or London. Thus the ship starts with cotton and returns with tea. These indirect outward voyages are now the usual ones for the India trade. Our exports direct to China are very small compared with our imports, as you will see by the commercial statements, and it is owing to this indirect route, touching at Europe, now pursued. In the occasional direct voyages made, we sometimes send a few cotton goods, amounting, in the last year, to less than one hundred thousand dollars. But they are made of the Southern staple: we also send ginseng, which is as much a Southern product as of any other part of the country. But the bulk of the trade takes the European route in the outward voyage as just described. Our teas, therefore, instead of being purchased by the products of the Northern or manufacturing States, are, in the main, procured by means of the Southern products, because none but Southern staples are favored to any considerable extent in Europe, where funds must first be made.

Now for the coffee: We get more of that from the island of Cuba than from any other place. And let me tell the gentlemen of the South that that island takes more of their rice than any nation in Europe except one. It is the second market in the world for Southern rice. It also receives from us a large amount of debenture goods, in some years reaching as high as two millions and a half, and seldom, if ever, less than one million and a half; the greater part of which are brought here from Europe, in exchange for the cotton, rice, and tobacco of the plantation States, and then reshipped for Cuba, after drawing back the duties. Have not the Southern States, therefore, a deep interest in the coffee trade of Cuba? More than this: the same island is a most important market for the flour of Virginia, the corn and lumber of North Carolina, and their herring fisheries formerly, and probably to a considerable extent now. It may also be added that the lumber of Maine, the salted provisions that float down the Mississippi from the Western States, and the bread-stuffs generally of the Middle States, as well as live stock from the East, all meet with a good market in this same island of Cuba. Every portion of the country has an interest in this trade, and all classes of our citizens are consumers of its returns. We get coffee also from Brazil in exchange for flour, debenture goods, and bills on England, and from Hayti, where the exchanges are similar to Cuba, though, of course, on a much smaller scale. Is not this amendment, therefore, the last that should be objected to on sectional grounds? Ought it not rather to draw to its support the votes of every State in the Union? Much more might be said, but surely it cannot be necessary, nor have I the strength to say much more, if it was necessary. Having already gone beyond the limit that I had prescribed for myself when I rose, the best return I can make for the attention I have received, is to trespass no longer on the patience of those who have been kind enough to listen to me.

Mr. CRAWFORD next rose. He said he had always risen in this House with some degree of embarrassment and misgiving, but never with such a sense of despondency and responsibility as at this moment. Is it matter of wonder (said he) that any considerate man should be appalled by the reflections that must crowd upon him during the discussion of the bill before the committee, and look with intense anxiety to its decision? On either hand the most weighty considerations arrest his attention; here we see interests larger than I dare sacrifice—there we are told of the dismemberment of the Union. I have brought to the consideration of this question the most dispassionate judgment, and have exercised upon it the best powers, poor though they be, of which I am possessed. It is a subject upon which I claim to be disinterested, not perhaps in a greater, but certainly, in as great a degree as any gentleman on this floor; for I am not only not concerned in any manufactory of any description, but of the many owners and proprietors, and occupants of iron and other establishments in my district, so far as I know them, every individual is my political opponent and enemy: this shall not, however, operate to their prejudice here or elsewhere; they have but exercised the right of freemen—a right which, as I claim it, and will on no consideration yield its exercise, I most cheerfully accord to others. If I could be actuated by any unworthy motive, drawn from such a source, I should lose my own sense of self-respect, and feel that I deserved the reprobation and contempt of others.

The despondency to which I have referred, arises from the apparent determination of a majority of this honorable body to hurry this bill through its various stages. It is a little more than a month since we assembled in this hall, and a committee, organized but about eighteen days, have reported a bill on the most important subject that can engage our deliberations; a subject on which another committee, after more than five months deliberation at the last session of Congress reported very differently, and whose bill, with such modifications as we thought fit to make, was then adopted; a subject on which the Secretary of the Treasury endeavored to inform himself for more than three months before he would spread his suggestions before this House; and then, not because he had brought the light upon it of which it was capable, but because of the advanced state of the session, (27th April,) and the desire, on his part, to comply with a resolution of this body. I mention these facts for no purpose of censure on the members of the honorable committee that reported this bill, for whom I entertain, as public and private gentlemen, the highest respect, but to show that this subject demands, as I trust it will receive, the most serious consideration, and to bespeak the patience of those who advocate the measure before us.

The Tariff.

It is no intention of mine, Mr. Chairman, to debate either the constitutional power which some honorable gentlemen think is involved in this question, or to enter upon general inquiries of political economy; that question and these inquiries have often been argued and prosecuted in this hall, and were most elaborately considered in this Congress but a few months ago. Thinking, as I do, that this Government has the clear power, under the constitution, to countervail the commercial regulations of other nations, which may prove injurious to any branch of American industry, and so to protect it; and that, in raising revenue, you may so arrange the means of doing it as to foster and encourage any branch of the arts or industry of the country. I admit that, in a strictly revenue bill, more money should not be provided than the Government, under an economical and prudent administration of public affairs, may require. It is, however, and will probably always be more or less, an open question, what the wants of the Government may justly demand.

What does the bill of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. VERPLANCK] propose? To reduce the duties on the importation of foreign merchandise generally, to the scale of 1816, and, in some instances, below it. I desire the members of this committee to pause, and reflect. The most extensive operation of this Government is upon property, and the wider the range of our laws, the more studious, the more cautious should we be to do no act which may be detrimental to the great interests committed to our charge. We are placed here as trustees, to the extent of the powers confided, whose solemn duty it is to advance, by all the means we have, the prosperity of this nation; so to shape the action of the Government that the citizen may receive no injury, and that, while we do justice to all, we sacrifice none. Will we be fulfilling this high trust by rendering valueless two hundred and fifty to three hundred millions of property? for at no less sum are the manufacturing establishments of this country computed. Sir, I know of no measure more likely to be extensively ruinous--irreparably ruinous--to our great and leading interests, running through all the ramifications of society. If you break down a large establishment of iron, or wool, or cotton, you prostrate not its owner alone, but you reach every mechanic, every farmer, every laborer, in his neighborhood. If it was wise and statesmanlike in 1816 to regulate your duties, with a view to your existing manufactures, amounting then probably to not more than thirty millions of dollars, (though I have no means of ascertaining accurately,) can it be judicious in 1832 to throw out of consideration interests ten times as great? I speak not now of the amount of revenue; that shall be thought of presently.

To see the full operation of the proposed reduction, it is all-important that we should bear in mind what the duties have been on the various articles to be affected by it. I ask the members of this committee to recur to the legislation on this subject, and contrast the various enactments with the bill submitted. By the law of 1816, you imposed a duty on woollen manufactures generally of twenty-five per cent. until the 30th June, 1819, and afterwards of twenty per cent.; by that of 1824, a duty of thirty per cent. until 1825, and subsequently thirty-three and one-third per cent.; by the provisions of 1828, forty-five per cent. on cloths under four dollars in price, and fifty per cent. on all exceeding that value; and the law of 1832 imposed fifty per cent. ad valorem, and abolished, on this article, the system of minimums. It will be seen, at once, that the measure now under debate, reaches, by a single bound, the regulation adopted seventeen years ago; for I regard as of no consequence the retention of forty per cent. until March, 1834, and of thirty per cent. until 1835. You had as well seal their fate at once. It is like the gradual extinction of human life, and, on a level of kindness, with the lopping off a man's legs and arms before you strike a vital part. How are hundreds of millions to be arranged in two years to prevent the crash which the provision seems to admit must follow if the change were immediate? On cottons, the change is still more to be regretted; for it will be soon perceived that it sweeps from under their feet the ground upon which those concerned stood in 1816, and leaves them in an infinitely worse situation. By the law of that year, foreign cottons paid twenty-five per cent. for three years, with a provision that if they cost less than twenty-five cents per yard, they were to be rated as worth that sum, and afterwards a duty of twenty per cent. By the regulation of 1824, they were charged with a duty of twenty-five per cent. with an increased minimum, from which the enactment of the last session did not materially vary, and the law of 1828 did not touch cottons. I request gentlemen to look for a moment seriously at the change they are about to effect, and inquire if they have examined narrowly into the certainly destructive consequences which must follow if this project be consummated. You have, heretofore, deemed a certain degree of protection necessary, not to the profitable and thrifty condition of your cotton manufactures, but to their existence; and of that duty so deemed by the very body I am addressing, and so deemed not six months ago, it is now sought to take away three-fourths. Can any pursuit or occupation bear such an application of the retrenching knife? I believe there is no mistake in my proposition. The present duty on cottons, under and not exceeding thirty cents the square yard, is seven cents and one-half; on those over that value, eight and three-fourth cents. What is the rate provided by the bill? The duty of 1816, which was five cents per yard? No, sir. But to bring down the duty to twenty per cent. ad valorem, abolishing the minimum that was adopted in that year, which will leave you about one-fourth the present duty. On articles costing ten cents the square yard, two cents is charged; on those of the value of eight cents, one cent and six mills; and on those priced at six cents, one cent and two mills. The finest will not cost, in England, above sixteen cents; and as the coarsest are most used, the probable average value will be about ten cents, and the whole range of duty about two cents the square yard. Those manufactures which you have invited into existence, and reared in a hot-bed if you please, you now seem disposed to abandon to their fate. Is this, can it be, right? At the last session, as an inducement to the passage of the pending bill, it was said it would give permanency to the system; and, to my own knowledge, some gentlemen then, and not until then, regarded the policy of the Government as settled, and embarked their means in this species of property.

Of iron, the article made to the greatest extent in my own State, the same observations are true. It is intended to reduce the duty on the most important branch of its manufacture, I mean rolled iron, below the standard of 1816, on manufactures of this material and most of its branches, to the scale of that year, and on all of them to the duty of 1818. This metal, so necessary in war as well as peace, it is vitally important to the country that we should have the means of making at home. It was from the conviction that it was indispensable that we should supply ourselves, and because of the difficulty of procuring it, even at the most enormous prices during the last war, that the attention of those then entrusted with the Government was drawn to it, and the duty of 1816 imposed, which has been continually since on the increase until last session, when a majority of this House decided that there should be a small reduction. More than one-half of all the iron establishments have sprung up since 1824, and especially since 1828, with the happiest effects upon the price and accommodation of the public. In my own district there are, as well as I can reckon them, fourteen furnaces, and as many forges, besides other very numerous manufactures of iron in almost every shape. My honorable friends from Connecticut [Messrs. HUNTINGTON and IWEASOLL] observed, in the course of their remarks yesterday and to-day, that iron was a favored article, and intimated that it was so favored to propitiate a large State with a large vote. I think they labor under a mistake as to the supposed liberality of the bill; for, like cottons, this article is less kindly treated in its most important feature, than it was in 1816.

On spirits distilled from grain, the contemplated change is not of less injurious consequence. The present duty is fifty-seven, sixty, sixty-three, sixty-seven, seventy-five, and ninety cents per gallon, according to the proof, amounting to an exclusion almost of the foreign article— which it is proposed to cut down to twenty, twenty-three, twenty-six, thirty, thirty-four, and forty cents; making an alteration of from sixty to seventy per cent.; and on all other spirits a similar reduction. Not less than one million of bushels of grain, probably many more, are consumed in Pennsylvania annually at her distilleries, which must and will be severely crippled, if not destroyed, by this bill, if it shall become a law. At our extensive and very valuable paper manufactories, an equally fatal blow is struck, without the smallest conceivable advantage to the public, or any portion of it.

I will not, Mr. Chairman, fatigue the committee and myself, by remarking upon any of the other very many and very useful manufactories with which our country abounds, and which have been erected at the expense of many millions. What is to be gained by their prostration? A reduced revenue it is said. We complain of a plethora which has afflicted no other people. Will the remedy exhibited be efficacious? I do not doubt the skill of the physician, but I shall have no difficulty in showing, before I take my seat, that as the practitioners of the medical art have a proverbial tendency to disagreement, so the political doctors of the present day differ widely about the mode of treating this same malady which preys upon the United States.

The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. VERPLANCK] informed this committee that this bill was framed, with a view to the production of eleven million of dollars from customs, and that the foundation of his calculation was the importation of last year. I do not think any just calculations can be made upon the imports of any one year, more than that an increase of duty, judging from experience, is followed by an increase of revenue; though I believe that an increase of imports will be the consequence of a diminution of duty, and that the revenue will be enlarged, instead of lessened. The Europeans who find a market in this country, are so situated that they must export, to a certain extent, under almost any circumstances—less, however, when the duties are high—and the increased quantity, at the lowest rate, will often pour more money into the treasury than when the duties are higher. And I believe it is morally certain that it will always do it, so long as you vibrate between two medium points; say, in reference to the present inquiry, between twenty and forty per cent. It is true, you may reach a point so low that more than a certain amount of revenue cannot be raised, or so high as to amount to a prohibition; and either way you will not be burdened by money. I dread the disclosure of the fact, which the operation of this bill, if enacted into a law, will probably make, that the revenue is larger, instead of smaller; and then will come the necessity, as it will be called, of falling to this minimum duty, to prevent an accumulation of money into the treasury. As proof of the correctness of these remarks, look at the product of your custom-house at various periods, and under different rates of duty; in 1826, your revenue from customs was greater than it has been at any time since, except the two last years, although the law of 1828 was passed increasing greatly your imposts.

In the year first named, it amounted to $23,341,331 77; in the year 1828, (the law of that year did not go into operation until the first of September, and could have little or no effect, as the annual treasury accounts are made up to the 30th September,) to $23,205,523 64; in 1829, to $22,681,965 91; in 1830, to $21,922,391 39; and, even in the year 1831, it exceeded the produce of 1826 by only $883,110. The additional imports of the two last years have been made, I imagine, with a view to aid the extinguishment of the public debt and other causes, in effecting a reduction of the tariff. Circumstances will vary your revenue; I mean the circumstances of your citizens, of the commercial world, and of all the world, more than your enactments. Look at your public income from 1816 to 1821: from customs you derived in 1816, $27,569,769 71; in 1817, $17,547,540 89; in 1818, $21,828,451 48; in 1819, $17,116,702 96; in 1820, $12,449,556 15, and in 1821, $13,400,447 15; reducing your treasury so low, that by an act of Congress of the 3d March, 1821, a loan of five million of dollars was authorized "to be applied, in addition to the moneys now (then) in the treasury, or which may be received thereon from other sources during the present (then) year, to defray any of the public expenses which are, or may be, authorized by law;" and yet, during all this time, the duties (except some small additions, and, it is a remarkable fact, that the revenue was lowest after those deductions were made) remained the same, while your revenue varied more than fourteen millions, and at last sunk so low as to oblige you to borrow. Examine your treasury books throughout, and you will find every where evidence that a diminution of duty is by no means certainly, or, I think, usually followed by a reduction of revenue; on the contrary, I believe it will, in the circumstances of this country and Great Britain, be the cause of an increase of your funds. There is another view of this matter: It is thought that you will destroy, if you pass this bill, many manufactories, and if you do not wholly prostrate them, you will, at all events, limit their business both in quantity and kind. Take cotton for example, of which there are now worked up in the United States seventy-five millions of pounds and upwards, which will yield 225 millions of yards; allow twenty-five millions for domestic or household consumption; of the remainder you will curtail and destroy to the amount of one-half that is, one hundred millions, which must be supplied from abroad, and, at the average duty of two cents per yard, will increase your revenue by two millions beyond the calculation of the committee. The same remarks are true of all other manufactures in the country. I leave this branch of the subject.

This House called on the Secretary of the Treasury on the 19th day of January, 1832, to collect information, and make such suggestions as it occurred to him would be useful in adjusting the tariff. This officer, in whom, I take this occasion to say, I have every confidence, on the 27th April following, made a communication to this body, founded on the best information he could obtain, and suggesting such provisions as the duties of his office, in its every day exercise, must peculiarly qualify him for arranging wisely and usefully to the interests of the country. I request the particular attention of the committee to the report of this high officer and talented man, made after more than three months diligent inquiry and deliberation on this great question. What does he propose? That the revenue should be reduced on the importations of 1830, ten millions of dollars, and brought down to twelve millions from customs, and estimating three from lands and other sources, making an aggregate of fifteen millions as the proper annual provision for the expenditures of the Government. In his report, we find the following:

The Tariff.

"For the objects mainly intended to be provided for, an annual revenue of 15,000,000 dollars is estimated to be necessary. Of this amount, until Congress shall otherwise determine, the sum of 3,000,000 dollars may be estimated to be received from the public lands. Should Congress hereafter determine to dispense with this source of revenue, any deficiency thereby occasioned, may readily be raised by a small augmentation of the duties proposed by the bill upon the class of articles which are taxed solely for the purposes of revenue, or may be distributed among the whole."

"The remaining 12,000,000 dollars, it is proposed to raise exclusively from duties on imports in the manner particularly provided for in the bill. It is estimated that, by this mode, the whole annual revenue from customs, calculated upon the importations of the year ending on the 30th September, 1830, after deducting re-exportations, will be reduced more than 10,000,000 dollars, and, upon that portion of them commonly called protected articles, more than 3,000,000 dollars. And, also, that the rate of the whole duty from customs, calculated upon the cost of the imported merchandise paying duties in the same year, exclusive of all charges, will be reduced from about forty-five per cent. to about twenty-seven per cent. The difference, however, between the rate of duties since 1830, and that under the bill, will not be quite so great, owing to the reductions already made on the duties on tea, coffee, molasses, and salt."

Having brought into view the fact, that the revenue from customs was, in the year 1830, $21,922,391 39, we have an outline of the Secretary's plan of finance in relation to the matter in hand. Accompanying the above report, was a bill prepared at the Treasury Department to carry the plan into effect, and to recommend it to the favorable consideration of this House, as adequate to the end proposed; calculations and tables made at the same office, were laid on our desks a few days afterwards, by which it appeared that the revenue would be brought down to 11,512,839 dollars, showing a reduction of $10,409,522 39. Now, I request the attention of the honorable gentleman for a few minutes, to the labors of the Committee of Ways and Means, and their results. They inform us that, in their estimation, 15,000,000 dollars is a liberal and just annual provision for the purposes of Government. So far, they and the Secretary agree; beyond this they are widely separated. The honorable chairman, [Mr. VERPLANCE,] in his opening speech on this bill, assumed nineteen millions as the probable future revenue from customs; but this is no otherwise material to the present inquiry, than as enabling the financier to determine the amount of reduction; for, whether you place the public income at nineteen or thirty millions, raised by the same rate of duty, is wholly indifferent, in devising the means of effecting a specific reduction in the amount of that revenue. The diminution intended, is eight millions of dollars, and the bill informs us how the committee design it shall be made. Here, then, is the outline of the project submitted, exhibited in connexion with a general view of that of the treasury; both are based upon precisely the same laws, the general one of 1828, and the three laws of the 20th and the 29th May, 1830, reducing the duties on coffee, cocoa, molasses, and salt, (except such parts of the law of 1832 as are retained, and will be spoken of presently.) The bill reported by the Secretary was to go into operation on the 3d of March next; that of the committee on the same day. The law of 14th July, 1832, has not yet been in force, so far as the imposition of duties is concerned; as to them, if this bill shall become a law, it will be as inoperative as if it had never been enacted; for that part of the 15th section, and the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th sections, which are retained, relate to the time and manner of securing and paying duties, appraising merchandise, and providing against frauds, except the 16th, which fixes the value of the pound sterling at four dollars and eighty cents; the 17th paragraph, of the first section of the bill, which subjects manufactures of iron and steel not enumerated, and the 37th paragraph, of the same section, which makes all non-enumerated articles liable to the lowest rate of duty, payable under the law of 27th April, 1816, or that of 14th July, 1832, will not have much material to work upon; for the articles are few and inconsiderable upon which the law of 1832 fixes a lower rate of duty than that of 1816; the second section of the bill will have the most extensive operation, for it incorporates, as one of its provisions, the third section of the law of 1832, by which many articles are relieved from all duty.

These are, it is believed, the only parts of the law of 1832 that are preserved in this bill, and they do not shake the position that the calculation of the officer, at the head of the treasury, and that of the committee, must be based substantially upon the same laws; for, let it be remembered, that the former proposed a reduction of 1,000,000 dollars, and his tables state that the bill he presented would reduce the revenue $10,409,523 39; and that the latter contemplates a diminution to the amount of 8,000,000 dollars; the release of the free articles, (exclusive of teas and coffee,) and the reduction of the duties on wines, under the law of 1832, will lessen the receipts into the treasury about, or according to my estimate, a little less than two millions; against this, and the other reductions (which will be very small) under the law of 1832, you may fairly place $2,409,522 39, the difference between what the treasury told us would have been the effect of the bill emanating from that department, and the proposed reduction of this bill; and if you cannot balance the account so, you are entitled to add the duties on tea and coffee, with which those articles, made free by the law of 1832, are again to be burdened, and the great increase of duty on silks over that, charged by it. The facts exhibited will place the two propositions on the same, or very nearly the same footing; for allowing the committee to have gained two millions and one-half, by such parts of the laws of 1832 as they have adopted, still the Secretary proposes to cut off eight millions beyond that sum, and tells you his bill would have effected it. The object of each is to arrive at the same end. Now let us see how they have severally proposed to reach it: The Secretary tells us, in his report, that his system of duties will range at about twenty-seven per cent., or a little above it; the committee say they "have endeavored to arrange the duties at from ten to twenty per cent." Suppose you allow the bill an average duty of eighteen per cent., which is as much as it can claim, and the duties fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury are fifty per cent. higher than those under consideration. Is it not so, sir? On wollens, the bill proposes a duty of twenty per cent.; that of the treasury charged thirty per cent. On cottons, the latter imposed precisely the present rate of duty, which is, on an average, three hundred per cent. higher, or four times as great as the rate proposed. On iron, the department was less favorable; but still allowing a duty on its most important branch twenty-five per cent. higher than that now before us, with one or two trifling exceptions, this difference will be found to run through the whole bill, varying on the average at least fifty per cent.

Florida Claims.

Which of these projects is to determine your action on the present occasion? Ought you even to agitate a great question, with such uncertainty around it, at the imminent hazard, and the probable destruction of leading interests? Surely not. What light are you to follow? I confess, if I must choose, I prefer relying upon the Secretary. With every possible respect for the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, I believe the head of the treasury has had opportunities, facilities, time, and many other advantages for his communication, which never can belong to any committee of this House; but I am not for following either; if you cannot see through the mist before you, do not move until the sun has dispersed it.

What, I ask gentlemen, has occurred to make legislative action necessary? Does it not look—I say it with great respect—like the play of children, to pass a law at one session, and, at the next, and before it has gone into operation, or any experiment been made of its effects, to enact another; and all this vacillation in relation to an immense national interest? Has any call been made upon us to act now? Has any State, any Legislature, any large body of the people, petitioned us on the subject? Not a word is heard from any quarter. I beg pardon, I did hear a petition from one county of my own State, against the tariff, read by the Clerk of this House a few days ago; but whether it was signed by many or few names, I do not know; whether it was got up by half a dozen or fifty men, we are not informed; whether they all lived in one township of the county, or were scattered over it, is uncertain; nor is it very material to the present purpose; for most certainly, if there is one subject on which the people of Pennsylvania are more united than on any other, it is in the desire to see an adherence to the protective policy. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] will prevail, and that afterwards this bill, unsolicited at our hands, putting aside, untried, a measure of very recent adoption; hastily matured, and unexpectedly brought into this House not calculated, in my judgment, to effect its avowed end, and which will be, as I am fully convinced, destructive of great interests, spread widely over a fair and large part of the United States, indebted, in a good degree, to those interests for its flourishing condition, which is destined to endure, if they are sustained, and to be blighted and withered if they fall, will be rejected.

There remains, Mr. Chairman, one other reason, which I am conscious should be touched with the most delicate hand, why I would decline legislating on this subject now. Need I say I refer to the situation of a portion of our country. Looking to the permanency of this confederacy, and believing that if any State can assume an attitude which will change the legislation of Congress, the Union is gone, I am compelled to avoid any step which will lead to such a result. On this grave subject I differ with honorable gentlemen who are as conscientious in the discharge of what they believe to be their duty, as I am in the performance of what I judge to be mine. Our several convictions are the guide of the conduct of each. I trust, and fervently pray, that the impending storm will pass over us without material injury. The present condition of our country is to be deplored by every patriot.

It is appalling to reflect upon what may be the consequences; but I hope never to see the day when brother shall be arrayed against brother, and that blood, which should be poured out freely, and shed, almost unwept, in a conflict with a common enemy, flow after the blade drawn by citizen against citizen. The exciting topics of debate; the conflict of opinion; the position of men and of affairs; all are calculated to give a deep tone, and to lend roused feelings to the occasion. Heaven forbid that I should so far forget my duty as to say or do aught calculated to estrange, excite, or to wound the feelings of any! What I have said has been a part of the faithful, and what I deemed the necessary, discharge of the highest and most responsible duty of my station.

On motion of Mr. ELLSWORTH, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 11.

The bill for the relief of General Macomb next coming up for consideration—

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to commit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, moved to substitute the Committee on Claims, and supported his motion by a speech. The discussion was further continued by Messrs. WILLIAMS, SPEIGHT, R. M. JOHNSON, DRAPER, ELLSWORTH and BURD, when the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was adopted: Yeas 62, nays 52. So the bill is referred to the Committee on Claims.

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOFFMAN in the chair, on sundry bills, amongst them the bill for the relief of certain inhabitants of East Florida.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, being decidedly opposed to the bill, moved to strike out the enacting clause, in effect to destroy the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said the claimants for whose indemnity the bill now under consideration provided, had been petitioners here since the cession of the Floridas to the United States, and he had some reason to congratulate them and himself that the bill had at last been reached on the calendar. That the nature of the claim set up might be properly understood, he should be obliged to go into a short historical detail of the events, and incidents with which they were connected, and the principles of international law on which they are founded.

On the 15th of January, 1811, an act was passed by the two Houses of Congress, in which it is declared "that the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot, without serious inquietude, see the Floridas pass into the hands of a foreign power;" and "that, under existing circumstances, they will take temporary possession of that territory, and hold it, subject to future negotiations." On the same day another act was approved, giving to the President the authority to occupy, at his discretion, the country east of the river Perdido, with an armed force, on the happening of either two contingencies: 1st. If it shall be rendered up by the local authorities. 2d. If any attempt to occupy it shall be made by a foreign power. This last act makes a large appropriation for effecting its provisions, and invests the President with a legislative authority over the country to be acquired in pursuance thereof. On the 26th of January, 1811, instructions were issued to General Matthews, of Georgia, and to Colonel McKee, of which the laws above cited, were assumed as a basis. (9vol. Waitt's S. P. p. 41.) It will be seen by the letter of Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of State, that the powers conferred on these commissioners are almost discretionary. It is melancholy to discover in this first document the commencement of all the American aggressions against the provinces of the Floridas; to see the Secretary of State dictating to his agent the quibbles to which he should have recourse, and recommending the first of those baseless promises to be so worded as to deceive the Spanish authorities, who should rely upon them, without being binding upon him who made them. If the Governors will peaceably "surrender the territory they were entrusted to protect, we will pay the debts of the Spanish King to his Spanish subjects." If you are driven to force, "you will exercise a sound discretion in applying the power given with respect to debts, titles to lands, &c., taking care to commit the Government on no point further than may be necessary."

I will not comment on the consistency of promising then to pay the debts of Spain, and refusing now to pay our own to the same creditors. I will say nothing of that morality which seizes on a moment of weakness to invade the province of an ally; which offers a reward to vice, and renders justice as a bribe to treason. I cite this passage to prove "that the operations" of the American Government in the Floridas, had a beginning ominous to just and honest claimants. "Commit the Government on no point further than may be necessary." But, sir, here is the important postscript to this preliminary document: "If Governor Folk should obstinately require, and pertinaciously insist, that the stipulation for the redelivery of the province should also include that portion of the country which is situated west of the river Perdido, you are, in yielding to such demand, only to use general words that may, by implication, comprehend that portion of the territory." This doctrine of implication was most beautifully and practically commented upon by the Sultan Mahomet, who, as we are told by Grotius, "upon the taking of Eubœa, cut a person asunder in the middle of his waist, to whom he had made a promise that he would not hurt a hair of his head." I have cited these passages, as well to show the whole uniform tendency of the measures taken and pursued by the United States in her operations in the Floridas, as to prove that Matthews was justified by his instructions in the course he adopted—instructions, as I have said before, mostly discretionary, and seldom specific, unless to dictate a promise that may deceive, without being obligatory on the maker. With such instructions before him, it is not to be wondered at that the acts of Matthews were such as could not be openly justified by our Government. Suffice it to say, that, on the reception of a letter from that officer, dated the 14th of March, he was immediately notified from the Department of State, in a despatch of the 4th of April, "that the measures he had adopted were not authorized by the law of the United States, or the instructions founded on it, under which he had acted," and the powers of which he is divested, are bestowed on Governor Mitchell, of Georgia. The Governor is directed to surrender Ferdinandina, &c. on terms, viz: that the inhabitants should be protected from the vengeance of the Spanish authorities, and not to withdraw his troops until that security is guaranteed. "You are to report to the Government the result of your conferences with the Spanish authorities, with your opinion of their views, holding, in the mean time, the ground occupied." And so fully was Mitchell persuaded of the intention of the Government, on this point, that he writes expressly to the Secretary of State, "that he knew it had never entered into the contemplation of the Executive to have the troops withdrawn from Florida." "In the measures lately adopted by General Matthews, (says Mr. Monroe to Governor Mitchell, 10th April, 1812,) to take possession, it is probable that much reliance has been placed by the people who acted in it, on the countenance and support of the United States. It will be impossible to expose these people to the resentment of the Spanish authorities," &c.; "you will, however, come to a full understanding with the Spanish Governor on this subject, and not fail to obtain from him the most explicit and satisfactory assurances respecting it." From this it appears, 1st. That, though we disavow the acts of Matthews, we are determined to retain possession of that portion of Spanish territory which he had seized on; and, 2d. That the disavowal does not extend so far as to prevent us from obtaining the most full and perfect indemnity for those who had assisted him, though it does extend to exempt us from all, and every obligation, to make satisfaction to those who had suffered by his acts; in other words, the acts of Matthews, though unauthorized, are obligatory on us to protect those who were deceived by him, but not to indemnify those who were injured by him. An unauthorized adventurer, holding an American commission, at the head of American troops, marches into a neutral country and lays it waste; his acts are disavowed by the Government, but the Government is bound to protect those who joined him, relying on their support against the vengeance of their offended laws. But he who resists their advances, acting as they were against the laws of Spain, and the force of treaties; he who resists, and is ruined, can demand no satisfaction. "The United States are only responsible for their own acts—and this is an act of Matthews. True, if you have been a wrong doer with him, we will see that no power can harm you: thus far are we bound; but if you have been injured by him who bears our commission, and commands our troops, or by his associates whom we protect, we cannot remunerate you; we are not bound by the acts of Matthews." By the laws of nations he is deemed a principal offender "who is guilty of certain acts of negligence to prevent them, as well as by actual commission; that urges to the commission of it; that gives all possible consent; that aids, abets, or in any shape is a partner in the perpetration of it." (Gro. B. C. 17, 5, 6.) Vattel ranks all as associates "who are really united in a warlike association with our enemy; who makes a common cause with him." (B. 3, 6.) It is idle to quote passages of law on a point as plain as this is. If a nation would disavow the acts of her officer, she must punish the offender; she must cause him to make satisfaction if he is able, and if not, she must do it for him." Sovereign princes are answerable for their neglect, if they use not all the means within their power for suppressing piracy and robbery." (Gro. 2, 17, 20.) It even frequently happens that the injury is done by minor persons, without their sovereign having any share in it; and, on these occasions, it is natural to presume that he will not refuse us a just satisfaction. When some petty officers, not long since, violated the territories of Savoy, in order to carry off from thence a noted smuggling chief, the King of Sardinia caused his complaint to be laid before the King of France, and Louis XVI. thought it no degradation to his greatness to send an ambassador extraordinary to give satisfaction for this violence. (Vattel, B. 2. C. 18, 8, 338; see further on this subject, Vattel, B. 2. C. 6. Sec. 76, 77, and 78; same author, B. 4, 7, 84, and Gro. B. 2, C. 18, 5, 4.) It is idle, then, to disavow responsibility. The injury is the act of our troops under our own officer. We retain the possession of the country occupied; we protect those who aided us—subjects, patriots, and all; and the law is every where recognized in the books, that, if we protect the wrong-doers, we are responsible for the wrongs done.

Whilst our troops were thus sustained in a foreign territory, whose inhabitants, using every effort of which they were capable, to repel an invasion which our relations with the mother country rendered more unjust and oppressive, it was to be expected that much violence should be used on both sides; that much oppression of persons, and destruction of private property should result. In this individual instance, it is believed that the waste of private property was wanton and extensive. The letter of Colonel Smith uses the strongest language to show the ruin following in the train of our armies: "The inhabitants have all abandoned their houses, and as much of their immovables as they could carry with them." And further, "the province will soon become a desert." And the investigations had before the courts in that territory, in pursuance of an act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1823, prove that the inhabitants of East Florida were driven from their homes by the American soldiery; that their houses, farms, and orange groves were wasted; that their stock was destroyed, and their slaves, to a large amount, were enticed or forced away, and many driven to seek protection amongst the Indian tribes, from whom they never have been reclaimed. Such are the facts in the case of the inhabitants of East Florida. These sufferers are now no longer foreign subjects. They have now no separate Government to which to appeal for a redress of grievances. They had fondly hoped, that when their impotent master had transferred them over to a free and growing republic, that a full adjustment of their claims, a full security for payment and satisfaction, was guaranteed by the treaty of cession: And they might still more fondly have hoped, that, if any doubt could arise in the construction of a clause so remedied and so just, that our Government would allow some little weight to the equity of the claim; that we would not construe an ambiguous promise to pay, "a promise by implication," into a total release from an obligation so cogent and so binding before the promise was made; but, alas! they are deceived. Two succeeding administrations have construed the treaty so as to close against them the door of hope. Thus, sir, are these people injured and deceived; ruined by our arms when Spanish subjects transferred to us their debtors; they have none to intercede for them. The transfer, from which they had hoped so much, has betrayed them; because, in the language of poetry, "it has held the word of promise to the ear, and broke it to the hope." It has made us their creditors by our wrong, and then closed against them the avenues of redress, by purchasing themselves and their territory from a master who would have vindicated their claims to justice.

These, sir, are the facts upon which the inhabitants of East Florida rest their claims to indemnity for the spoliation of the American army. From these facts I shall attempt to prove that these people are entitled to remuneration; either first, as Spanish subjects; second, as American citizens, though no treaty had ever been made to secure them; thirdly, that the treaty was meant to embrace their case, and does, if properly interpreted, fully secure their indemnity; and, fourthly, that if there is nothing in the law of nations, nor in the treaty to secure them, some provision should now be made by Congress for that purpose.

First. There is no proposition so clear as that principle, recognized by all law, common, civil, and national, that every damage done to an individual gives him a right to a remedy and redress. All "penalties incurred by particular offences are considered debts." Blackstone, in the 3 B. 9 cap. of his commentaries, after proving the application of this rule to individuals, adds further: "The case is the same between nations, in this respect, as between individuals. One power is bound to repair the injuries which its own subjects have done to those of another. This indemnity or satisfaction is a debt which justice requires that power to discharge." It is no defence to say, that, as the Spanish Government is, or was too imbecile to enforce this demand, the United States are released from all obligation to pay it. It would be a monstrous assertion, on the part of a rising republic, whose avowed policy is justice to all, and oppression to none, that she claimed the right, by the law of power, to send her armies into a neutral province, there to pillage, burn, and plunder, without responsibility, because, forsooth, she has the physical force to effect it. All civilized nations, at the present day, by the modern construction of international law, are compelled to make full and ample remuneration for spoliation done by their armies on the private property of a people with whom they are engaged in actual war. It would be useless in me to cite to you cases of that sort. They are of too frequent occurrence to require specification, and if a doubt had ever existed on the subject, it is effectually removed by the decision of the late Emperor of Russia, on this very point. I will not waste your time by a reference to the books on the law of nations, and quote you passages with which they term, to prove the position here advanced. It is too clear to admit a doubt in the nineteenth century, that nations at war must pay for all damages done to private property, and Grotius, in his second book, labors to prove that the damages should be vindictive. And, now, sir, shall we be told, by way of justification, that we were not at war with Spain! That we are released from all responsibility, because the invasion was made when we were at peace! When the King of Spain was in a French prison, and his kingdom one universal French encampment! Shall we justify our acts because we magnanimously availed ourselves of a moment of imbecility, when none could oppose us, to seize on the possessions of an ally? Shall we justify, by the example of the partition of Poland, and avow our intention in the then contemplated division of Spanish spoil, to get the Floridas as our portion? Surely we will not aver that an act of invasion against the inhabitants of a foreign country is justifiable in peace, but not in war; that the property of your allies, if they are weak, may be destroyed, otherwise of your enemies, if they are strong. But, sir, this is too plain to discuss it longer. Don Onis always pressed on us the adjustment of these claims "for the wars in East Florida," and I affirm that, if the Floridas had remained under the dominion of the King of Spain, they would long since have been settled, or if not settled, at least not disputed. It is not because the claimants were Spanish subjects that the justice of their demand is denied; they were never denied to Don Onis. It is because they are no longer Spanish subjects, but American citizens, that justice is withheld from them. It is because they present that amphibious relation, in which, by our acts, they are made to stand, of claimants as Spaniards, against another Government of which they have become citizens. They are complaining to their present friends and masters, for acts done to them as aliens, by those to whom they complain. They are petitioning their present Government for redress of wrongs done to the past.

Let us then see, if, by changing their political character, they have so far lost their identity as individuals, that what was once due them is due them no longer. Viewed in their new character of American citizens, appealing to the American Government for the redress of wrongs done by American soldiery, it would seem enough to point to your tables, groaning with petitions of a similar kind from every quarter of the Union. If a horse has been impressed, or a bullock eaten by our troops in the last war, Congress has been petitioned to pay for it, and has never refused. If damage is done to the citizen by the soldier, and that damage was even indispensable to the defence of our common country, the Government is bound to pay for it. It would seem to be enough for these people, that they had been wronged, and by us, to entitle them to indemnity. That they had now no sovereign to whose political interposition they might appeal for redress. That they had first been ruined by American arms, then bought by American money before compensation was made them. If the King of Spain did not guarantee their full indemnity in the terms of the transfer he has made of them, the obligation to do so has accrued to the purchaser. Suppose the King of Spain had sold the Floridas with all their demands against the United States, to Great Britain or to Napolean, would we have disputed with them our obligation to make reparation for spoliations in 1812 and '14? And what is the worth of justice when it is granted only to the strong, and denied to the helpless? It is an obligation imposed on that power which has done the injury, to redress the damages that have been sustained by individuals for individual benefit, and the right of redress results, and remains indefeasible in the sufferers, to whom soever they may be transferred. If Spain has abandoned their interests, it is the duty of the transferee to maintain them. Spain has no motive in securing the rights of subjects no longer belonging to her crown, and guarding the American citizen from poverty and ruin resulting from American aggression.

It is our duty to prove to the remnant of the Spaniards in Florida that the principle of republics is justice; that we will not withhold from our citizens that justice which was never refused to them, when demanded by their King, nor make them beggars when we made them free; that we will not free ourselves from a debt, by buying those to whom it is due, nor plead the omissions of an imbecile monarch to release us from the most solemn of all obligations—that of redressing those whom we had injured, and whom, by our own act, we had rendered unable to redress themselves. These people have on us a four fold claim; we have done them wrong; we have deprived them of their natural protector by the treaty of cession; we have become their avengers, by every tie of justice and equity to protect the weak, when we have made them so, and to right the injured when we have done them wrong.

3. I come, now, sir, to the third division—to the ninth article of our treaty with Spain. In my letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, which was laid before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I attempted to show what I then, and still do deem, a manifest discrepancy between the Spanish and the English copy of that article, in the total omission, in the former, of the word "late," which has been considered so important to the construction of this part of the treaty. It is true, as we are told by the committee, that both Spanish and English copies of the treaty are originals; and it is also true, that, if there be a difference in the two, in this place, the Spanish copy furnishes the only proper point of reference for construction; here is contained an express promise of satisfaction to Spain for wrongs done her, and we are bound by that phraseology by which Spain was satisfied. She did not understand the English. The promise was exacted in Spanish; in Spanish it was understood; in Spanish it was satisfactory. If we have altered the English copy, so as to convey a different meaning from that understood, we have, by satisfying the claims of Spain, by quieting their complaints in one language, and evading them in another, been guilty of a fraud, which would disgrace an individual, and will be another instance of a "promise by implication," in our intercourse with Spain. Suppose a Spaniard and an Englishman enter into a contract for the exchange of property; suppose there be two articles of agreement, one in each language; suppose the Spanish copy is fair and equitable, mature in its terms and contains the only grant made to the Spaniard, as an equivalent for his concessions; and suppose the English copy was so worded as to get all and pay nothing: I ask, would it not be considered an unprincipled attempt to deceive, by making a promise satisfactory to a man in a language he understands, and construing the meaning of the contract from another language which he does not understand, so as to get his property without a price? "The obligation of promises depends on the expectation which we knowingly excite. Consequently, any action or conduct towards another which we are sensible excites expectations in that other, is as much a promise, and creates as strict an obligation, as the most express assurances."

(Paley's Moral Phil. vol. 1, 126.) Grotius and Vattel are conclusive on the same point. Shall we then be told that, because they are both originals, the moral obligation to perform a promise, as it was understood by the promise to satisfy his just expectations, and to gather those expectations from the words in which they were conveyed to him, are no longer binding on us? If, then, the word "late" is omitted in the Spanish copy—and that it is a bare inspection of the paper itself sufficiently manifests—I do humbly conceive that the question should be at an end. But I come to the construction of the ninth article of the treaty, by which the people of East Florida have been barred of what they deem their rights. I endeavored to show that the word, on which the whole construction was based, was not in the Spanish copy of the treaty; and that, even if it were not an interpolation, and if it were of doubtful interpretation, it should be taken more strongly against the grantor.

I urged that this was one of the very few grants in favor of Spain; and, for this reason, if there was no other, should be liberally interpreted. That it was a grant prescribing a remedy for a wrong already done; and that, as such, it was entitled to an equitable and enlarged construction in favor of the injured party. I urged, further, that, as there were no "operations" of our army in the province of East Florida in the year 1818, to limit the application of the phrase to that particular year, would be to constitute a remedy when the injury had been done, and to shut out all redress for actual and positive damage. I urged that this could not be the meaning of the high contracting parties, because, if they meant any thing, the clause was nugatory, and if they meant nothing, it was nonsense; because, in a word, they gave a remedy where there was no wrong, and left a wrong without a remedy. And, sir, how am I answered? Simply that two administrations had decided that the word "late" meant—what? "The latest or last!" That it does not mean a thing recent, and of short intervention of time, but that it means what I had thought could only be expressed by the superlative degree of the adjective, the very last act of a continued series.

Thus, sir, by authoritative construction, the positive degree, in an article of a treaty, is merged in the superlative, and that the word "late," so plain to be understood when applied to a plural noun, no longer expresses, as it was wont to do, the whole of a consecutive series of acts, done within a recent period, but means exclusively that which plain men would express by the superlative, the latest or last act done of that series. When we tell them, under their own interpretation, that the very last acts of the American armies in East Florida, were done in the years 1812 and 1814, we are again told that the operations spoken of are those of 1818, and no others. Now, sir, to come to the conclusion of the preceding administration, it is not only necessary to make the word "late" synonymous with "last," but you must emphatically declare that the word "operations" means nothing, if applied to any year other than 1818. It does seem to me strange, sir, that we should have so strong a sympathy with the sufferers of that year, to the exclusion of all others from justice, when the "operations" of that year were confined to West Florida, and were directed against the savage Indian, who was harbored there to annoy us. We had pursued our foe, yet reeking with the blood of helpless women and children, into the territories of Spain, in West Florida, and found them there. In punishing these wretches, some injury was necessarily done. And is it not strange that we, the United States of America, should torture the English language and violate every principle of English grammar and moral justice, to make an exception in favor of those against whom we had strong cause for the injuries we had done them, and to the exclusion and ruin of others, against whom we had none?

Florida Claims.

General Jackson would never have crossed the line in pursuit of the Seminoles, had he not well known that they were encouraged to commit the outrages of which they had been guilty. Yet, for some slight damage done by our armies to the people of West Florida in 1818, ample redress is guaranteed, and satisfaction had been made; whilst the harmless and unoffending citizen of East Florida, against whom no complaint was ever alleged, in the moment of profound peace, is driven by the invading armies of the United States from his home, and, on his return, finds himself a beggar, his houses burnt, his crops and groves, the labor of a life, destroyed; his stock and his slaves stolen away, or driven into the woods; and, when he asks redress at the hands of the wrong doer, he is told "that he is too late;" that he is barred by a constructive act of limitations, and that the wrongs of which he complains, are not late enough to be remedied. When he answers that they are not only late, but the very last, in East Florida, of which he is a citizen, he is again told that the word "operations" is limited to 1818, and means nothing if applied to any other year. But, sir, let us grant the construction contended for, in its fullest extent, that the word "late" is in the Spanish copy as well as in the English; let us grant the grammar of the Government to be good, that their definition of the word is correct; in a word, let us admit that the word "late," when applied to operations, does not mean the very latest, or last thing, done; and then let us go to the sages of national law to construe the meaning of the text. "Where we have no other conjecture to guide us," says Grotius, B. 2, C. 16, "words are not to be construed in their original or grammatical sense, but in their common acceptance: for it is the arbitrary rules of custom which direct the laws and rules of speech." Now, if the grammar of the restrictionist be correct—if, in the definition of the word, they are strictly right—I appeal to every man of common sense, if the "common acceptance" of the word "late," as fixed by the "arbitrary custom," be not, as I have defined it, something recent and of short date, something done not long since?

"In all human affairs, where absolute certainty is not at hand to point out the way, we must take probability for our guide." "In most cases it is extremely probable, that the parties have expressed themselves according to established usage; and such probability ever affords a strong presumption, which cannot be overruled but by a still stronger presumption." (Vat. 2, 17, 271.) I need not here stop to inquire if it is the established usage of language to confound the positive with the superlative? Let us for a moment test the construction of a treaty by these presumptions and probabilities. Now, is it probable, is it to be "presumed," that Spain would pertinaciously adhere to the interests of those of her subjects, against whom we had a good cause of aggression, and abandon to their fate a larger portion of claimants, who had never offended? Did she consider her honor bound by geographical limits, and did she feel solicitous to wipe from her escutcheon only that part of the stain which had attached on the west of the Suwannee? Again, is it probable that the United States would make this distinction under the existing circumstances of the case? Are these the probabilities and presumptions required by the law of nations? It is extremely probable that the parties have expressed themselves conformably to established usage.

Is it established usage for a nation, in making a treaty with another, to secure indemnity to one-half of her citizens or subjects, and leave the other half, more innocent and more suffering, to irremediable ruin? Is it established usage for a nation to stipulate redress to one-half of the subjects of another, for wrongs done by herself, after the great national council had solemnly resolved, that, against that portion, so redressed, we had just cause of war, and refuse it to the otherhalf, whom she had more grievously injured, and against whom, so far from having a cause of aggression, she became ashamed of the acts of her officer, and disavowed and dismissed him? Enough, sir: I am ashamed to be guilty of what I fear is almost tautology; but this is a subject so important to the very subsistence of a large portion of my constituents, that I deem it my duty to present it to the committee in every possible aspect that it will bear, even at the hazard of repetition. Sir, so novel and ruinous to a number of citizens is the present construction of the treaty, the present definitions of the word "late," that I thought it best to attempt to show, that in every possible bearing of the subject, the construction was wrong, the definition erroneous, and the consequences monstrous. If, in presenting this subject in so many points of view, I have been compelled to use twice the same ideas, or the same expression, I plead my apology in the nature of the question, and the novelty of the controversy.

We are further told, sir, that "in the construction of a doubtful treaty, we are to have recourse to conjectures, which are to be found in the subject-matter, and in the consequences, and the circumstances and connexions." The subject-matter is redress of wrongs done to the private property of Spanish subjects in Florida by the American army. The object of Spain was to vindicate her sullied honor, and to secure indemnity to her injured subjects; and what are the consequences of this construction of the treaty? Spain was not interested in securing a full satisfaction to the people of Florida; they were her subjects no longer, and it was to the mother country a matter of pecuniary indifference, whether they remained citizens of the United States, the beggars we had made them, or not. But the honor of Spain was pledged to see them redressed: and is this effected by the course we pursue? Are these the consequences naturally desired by both parties? And when the honor of Spain, if these are the consequences of this treaty, is still sullied, what becomes of our own? To redress by treaty those wrongs which Congress solemnly resolved that General Jackson was right in doing, and to leave those unredressed that Aury or McGregor would blush at. Again, sir, we learn from Blackstone, Intro. to Com. c. ii. p. 16, that "the most universal and effectual mode of discovering the true meaning of a law, when the words are dubious, is, by considering the reason or spirit of it, or the cause which moved the legislator to enact it."
